This conclusion renders it necessary to consider whether the Statute of Frauds affords a defence to the plaintiff's claim. The section relied upon is 7, which has been judicially interpreted in Forster v. Hale, and Smith v. Matthews. According to these authorities, it is necessary to prove by some writing or writings signed by the defendant, not only that the conveyance to him was subject to some trust, but also what that trust was. But it is not necessary that the trust should have been declared by such a writing in the first instance; it is sufficient if the trust can be proved by some writing signed by the defendant, and the date of the writing is immaterial. It is further established by a series of cases, the propriety of which cannot now be questioned, that the Statute of Frauds does not prevent the proof of a fraud; and that it is a fraud on the part of a person to whom land is conveyed as a trustee, and who knows it was so conveyed, to deny the trust and claim the land himself. Consequently, notwithstanding the statute, it is competent for a person claiming land conveyed to another to prove by parol evidence that it was so conveyed upon trust for the claimant, and that the grantee, knowing the facts, is denying the trust and relying upon the form of conveyance and the statute in order to keep the land himself. This doctrine was not established until some time after the statute was passed. In Bartlett v. Pickersgill the trust was proved, and the defendant, who denied it, was tried for perjury and convicted, and yet it was held that the statute prevented the court from affording relief to the plaintiff. But this cannot be regarded as law at the present day. The case was referred to in James v. Smith, and was treated as still law by Kekewich, J., but his attention does not appear to have been called to Booth v. Turle nor to Davies v. Otty, both of which are quite opposed to Bartlett v. Pickersgill. So is Haigh v. Kaye. The late Lord Justice Giffard, one of the best lawyers of modern times, speaking of Bartlett v. Pickersgill, said, "It seems inconsistent with all the authorities of this court which proceed on the footing that it will not allow the Statute of Frauds to be made an instrument of fraud." See Heard v. Pilley. The case not only seems to be, but is, inconsistent with all modern decisions on the subject. See, in addition to those already mentioned, Lincoln v. Wright, where a conveyance absolute in form was held to be a mortgage only. See also Davis v. Whitehead, in which Stirling, J., examined the authorities and held that an assignment absolute in form was subject to a trust for the plaintiff. The defence, based on the Statute of Frauds, is met by the plaintiff in two ways. First, she says that the documents signed by the defendant prove the existence of the trust alleged; secondly, she says that if those documents do not prove what the trust is with sufficient fulness and precision the case is one of fraud which lets in other evidence, and that with the aid of other evidence the plaintiff's case is established. In our opinion the plaintiff is correct in this contention. [His lordship then referred to certain letters signed by the defendant, and continued:] We are by no means satisfied that they do not contain enough to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. Whether this is so or not, the other evidence is admissible in order to prevent the statute from being used in order to commit a fraud, and such other evidence proves the plaintiff's case completely.

Counsel for the plaintiff contended that the Statute of Frauds had no application to lands in Ceylon. But, having regard to Leroux v. Brown and to the language of section 7 of the Statute of Frauds, we are unable to see why the defendant should not be able to rely on that statute as a defence to any proceedings in this country having for their object the proof and enforcing of a trust, even of lands abroad. The statute relates to the kind of proof required in this country to enable a plaintiff suing here to establish his case here. It does not relate to lands abroad in any other sense than this; it regulates procedure here, not titles to land in other countries. If, therefore, the statute afforded the defendant a defence he would be entitled to the benefit of it. But for the reasons above given, the statute affords him no protection.

Having come to the conclusion that the plaintiff has proved her case by evidence admissible by our law, it is necessary to consider the other defences raised. The first is bankruptcy. The defendant became bankrupt in 1879, and he obtained his discharge in May, 1880. The Bankruptcy Act then in force was the Act of 1869, and by section 49 of that Act bankrupt trustees were not discharged from the claims of their cestuis que trustent. This defence, therefore, fails. The next defence is the Statute of Limitations. The trust which the plaintiff has established is clearly an express trust within the meaning of that expression as explained in Soar v. Ashwell. The trust is one which both plaintiff and defendant intended to create. This case is not one in which an equitable obligation arises, although there may have been no intention to create a trust. The intention to create a trust existed from the first. The defendant is not able in this case to claim the benefit of section 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), and the statute which is applicable is the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, clause 2, which enacts as follows: "No claim of a cestui que trust against his trustee for any property held on an express trust, or in respect of any breach of such trust, shall be held to be barred by any Statute of Limitations." The Statutes of Limitations, therefore, afford no defence if the plaintiff's action is to be regarded as one brought by a cestui que trust against his trustee, seeking for an account of trust property. It was, however, urged by the defendant's counsel that this action was really one for an account by a mortgagor against a mortgagee in possession, and that so regarded one of the Statutes of Limitations was a bar to it. In support of this contention counsel cited Locking v. Parker, In re Alison. These cases undoubtedly show that a conveyance upon trust for sale to secure a sum advanced is regarded as a mortgage, and that although there may be a trust declared of the surplus in favour of the mortgagor the Statute of Limitations is a bar to an action brought by him for the surplus, if his title to the land is barred before a sale by the mortgagee. The ground of these decisions is that the trusts were such that the mortgagor could not enforce them and compel a sale, but could only redeem. Those cases, however, show that the mortgagor can as cestui que trust enforce the trust of the surplus after a sale if his title to the land is not barred before the sale takes place as it was in Alison's case. Banner v. Berridge, which was also cited to support the view we are considering, merely shows that a mortgagee selling under a power of sale is not an express trustee of the surplus for the mortgagor in the absence of words creating a trust for him. The mortgagee in that case was a mortgagee of a ship, and he sold as such under his statutory power. The real transactions in those cases were mortgages, and were very different from the real transaction in this case. The real transaction here was a purchase by the defendant for the plaintiff; she claims relief, not as mortgagor, but as the defendant's cestui que trust, although she admits his lien on the property for his advances; she claims an account of his dealings and transactions with her property, and in particular an account of the money which he has obtained from it. This being the real nature of her claim, the cases to which we have alluded are not applicable to it, and the Statutes of Limitations are no bar to the action.

We come now to the last ground of defence—viz., laches and lapse of time apart from the Statutes of Limitations. This is the most difficult part of the case. The time which has elapsed since the plaintiff knew that her claim to the estate was disputed is so considerable that, before giving the plaintiff the relief to which she would otherwise be entitled, it is necessary to consider what her conduct has been and whether anything has happened to render it unjust to the defendant to compel him to account now. On the 7th of January, 1880, Mr. Sabonadiere wrote a letter to the plaintiff and told her that the estates belonged to the defendant's creditors, on the 9th of August, 1880, the plaintiff, by her then solicitor, Mr. Lake, wrote to Mr. Cooper, the defendant's trustee in bankruptcy, claiming the estates as her own. On the 29th of October, 1880, Mr. Cooper wrote to Mr. Lake and disputed this claim, and asserted the rights of the defendant's creditors to the estates, stating that the defendant had bought them with his own money, and had mortgaged them and dealt with them as his own. It is to be inferred from another letter of Lake's, dated the 30th of October, 1880, that he communicated the position of affairs to the plaintiff, and explained to her the necessity of making up her mind whether she would or would not embark in a very serious and expensive litigation with the defendant's trustee in bankruptcy. It is also to be inferred from her subsequent letters that she preferred not to do so, but to wait and see whether the defendant would not be able to make some arrangement with his creditors which would enable him to regain control over the estate and then recognize her claims to them. She was unquestionably encouraged to do this by the defendant himself. The estates had not then been sold, but were still being carried on. We can find nothing since 1882 which was in any way calculated to induce the plaintiff to believe that her claims would ever be recognized. On the other hand, the defendant, as distinguished from his trustee in bankruptcy, never repudiated them. This suit was not instituted until the 24th of October, 1894, twelve years after the correspondence between the plaintiff and the defendant practically ceased. The principle applicable to cases in which equitable relief is sought after long delay is well expressed in Lord Blackburn's judgment in Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Co.; citing Lindsay Petroleum Co. v. Hurd, he says: "The doctrine of laches in courts of equity is not an arbitrary or a technical doctrine. Where it would be practically unjust to give a remedy either because the party has by his conduct done that which might fairly be regarded as equivalent to a waiver of it, or where by his conduct and neglect he has, though perhaps not waiving that remedy, yet put the other party in a situation in which it would not be reasonable to place him if the remedy were afterwards to be asserted, in either of these cases lapse of time and delay are most material. But in every case, if an argument against relief which otherwise would be just is founded upon mere delay—that delay, of course not amounting to a bar by any Statute of Limitations—the validity of that defence must be tried upon principles substantially equitable. Two circumstances always important in such cases are the length of the delay and the nature of the acts done during the interval which might affect either party and cause a balance of justice or injustice in taking the one course or the other, so far as relates to the remedy." Lord Blackburn goes on to say: "I have looked in vain for any authority which gives a more distinct and definite rule than this; and I think from the nature of the inquiry it must always be a question of more or less, depending on the degree of diligence which might reasonably be required, and the degree of change which has occurred, whether the balance of justice or injustice is in favour of granting the remedy or withholding it. The determination of such a question must largely depend on the turn of mind of those who have to decide, and must, therefore, be subject to uncertainty; but that, I think, is inherent in the nature of the inquiry." In questions of this kind it is not only time, but the conduct of the parties which has to be considered. Before 1882 the defendant had mortgaged the estates as if they were his own, but he concealed such mortgages from the plaintiff. Since 1882 the estates have been sold, and he has received the moneys arising from their sale, but he concealed these transactions from the plaintiff. The defendant also destroyed the books containing the accounts of these estates. He says he did this, not because the plaintiff abandoned her claims, but because he had no room for the books. Under these circumstances he can hardly invoke the loss of the books as a reason for refusing relief to the plaintiff. But, as already stated, since 1882 the defendant has done nothing to induce the plaintiff not to sue him nor to lead her to believe that any claim by her would be recognized. On the other hand, the plaintiff has done nothing actively to lead the defendant to suppose that she abandoned any claim she might have against him as her trustee. There is nothing to be said against her except that she has forborne to sue for twelve years. In 1884 she wrote a letter to Mr. Hollams asserting her rights, but she did no more. Under these circumstances, to hold that time is a bar to the plaintiff's claim would be to decide that although the Statute of Limitations is no bar to a suit by a cestui que trust against a trustee in a case of express trust, yet that lapse of time without more, is a bar. Such a conclusion cannot be correct, and it was decided to be inadmissible in In re Cross. Even where there is an express trust lapse of time, coupled with other circumstances which render it unjust to give the plaintiff relief against the defendant, will induce the court to refuse the relief, although no Statute of Limitations might bar his claim: see Bright v. Legerton and In re Cross. But in this case, which is one of express trust, there is nothing except time, and that without more, is not sufficient apart from some Statute of Limitations. This view of the case renders it unnecessary to examine the excuses given by the plaintiff for not instituting proceedings sooner.

The appeal must be allowed, and the judgment be reversed. It must be declared that the defendant purchased the Delmar estates as a trustee for the plaintiff, but subject to a charge for the amount paid to the Dutch company. An account must, then, be directed of the defendant's dealings and transactions with the Delmar estates. The account will be an account as between a trustee and his cestui que trust, not an account as between mortgagor and mortgagee, and there must be no account on the footing of wilful default. The defendant must be allowed all his advances and outlays, with colonial interest; but he ought only to be charged simple interest at 4 per cent. on balances in his hands, unless it appears that he has made more. Minutes had better be prepared and signed, and, if necessary, they can be mentioned to the court. The defendant must pay the costs of the action up to the hearing, and the costs of the appeal.

CLUTTON v. ATTENBOROUGH. (a.)

Bill of exchange—Cheque—Payee a fictitious or non-existing person—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), ss. 2, 7, sub-section 3.

Cheques payable to the order of a fictitious or non-existing payee, signed by the drawer and handed by him to his clerk to be posted, must be considered as issued by the drawer, and should they be received by a bonâ fide holder for value the drawer will be liable on them as payable to bearer. And this is so although the drawer was unaware that the payee was a fictitious or non-existing person, and was misled by the fraud of his clerk, who stole the cheques and having indorsed them in the name of the fictitious or non-existing payee handed them to the holders for value.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 44 W. R. 114, [1895] 2 Q. B. 707, affirmed.

This was an appeal by Messrs. Clutton from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.) reported 44 W. R. 114, [1895] 2 Q. B. 707, where the facts are set out in detail.

Following the routine of Messrs. Clutton's office, a clerk named Piper laid before one of his principals a number of cheques filled up, payable to George Brett or order. The cheques were signed by one of the principals and handed back to the clerk Piper for the purpose of being used. The name George Brett, the payee on the cheques, was a fictitious name inserted by Piper, who after the cheques had been signed by the principals, fraudulently indorsed the cheques in the name of George Brett, and took them to Messrs. Attenborough, who gave value for them, and were unaware of any forgery or irregularity whatever.

The clerk Piper was known to Messrs. Attenborough as George Brett.

Messrs. Clutton's bankers paid the amount of the cheques in due course to Messrs. Attenborough's bankers; after the discovery of the fraud Messrs. Clutton brought this action against Messrs. Attenborough to recover the money which they had been paid on these cheques.

By section 7 (3) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, it is enacted that "where the payee is a fictitious or non-existing person the bill may be treated as payable to bearer."

The Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.) affirmed the decision of Wills, J., who gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and W. A. Meek, for appellants.—These cheques never ceased to be the property of Messrs. Clutton; they were never negotiated. The Vagliano case, 39 W. R. 657, [1891] A. C. 107, was a question between customer and banker. The only question is, Can defendants claim title as upon a cheque payable to bearer? There was no one in whom the property in the cheque vested, for it was not issued. See the definition in the Act, section 21, sub-section 1, as to delivery of such instrument, and section 21, sub-section 2 (b). In Bank of England v. Vagliano the acceptor had put the bills into circulation. The cheque was drawn to order, and so long as it has not got beyond the principals' control, the cheque is not issued. It is just as if it had been stolen out of my pocket: Baxendale v. Bennett, 26 W. R. 899, 3 Q. B. D. 525, Brett, L.J.'s judgment therein. [The Lord CHANCELLOR.—It did not exist as a bill when stolen.]

Ingham v. Primrose, 7 C. B. N. S. 82, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 12, and Scholfield v. Earl of Londesborough, ante, p. 124, [1896] A. C. 514, were also referred to.

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C., Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Macaskie, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Lord HALSBURY, C. — I confess I approach the consideration of this case with some surprise, because it appears to me that every part of it is so far covered by authority that I should have thought it would be impossible to argue it. The facts are now beyond doubt that the person who drew this cheque intended to draw a cheque, that he intended this cheque to be paid, and that he handed this cheque to his clerk. It is perfectly immaterial that he was induced to draw this cheque and to hand it to his clerk by fraud. What has that got to do with the validity of the cheque as against a bonâ fide holder for value when it gets into the hands of that bonâ fide holder for value? It seems to me that if this case was treated as if it were possible to raise that question, it would be a most serious blow against the currency of negotiable instruments—that is to say, if the history of every negotiable instrument, in itself perfectly genuine, in respect of the person who drew it and the person who issued it, has to be inquired into. There is one observation I must make upon the word "issued." If, contrary to the intention of the person who had signed the document, it got out of his possession, it being stolen out of his strong-box or what not, I may or may not have some opinion as to what would be the legal result of that; but that is not the question here, and I therefore absolutely decline to consider it. It would be beside the ground upon which this case ought to be decided, and I think it undesirable to raise new questions on a matter which, as it seems to me on the facts of this case, is so perfectly and manifestly plain. The drawer of these cheques hands them to one of his own clerks, puts them in circulation, and they get into the hands of a bonâ fide holder for value. Now, forsooth, we were treated to a long argument to show what was the intention of the drawer—to make that which is a bill payable to bearer a bill payable to order only. I have nothing to do with the intention of the drawer beyond this, that I find the document is on the face of it made payable to a person who is "non-existing." Whatever might have been said in Vagliano's case, where there were questions raising a doubt upon the applicability of those words, or whatever might be said about the difference between the words "fictitious" and "non-existing," it has in this case never been suggested that on the face of these instruments the name of George Brett is anything other than the name of a non-existing person. Why am I, upon this very plain and manifest state of facts, to inquire into what would be the case if there was a person, as there was in Vagliano's case, who might plausibly be represented as the person intended by the drawer to be the person to whom the payment was to be made? In this case no such question arises at all; and treating, therefore, these cheques as cheques payable to bearer, the broad fact comes that the genuine drawer attached his own signature to cheques perfect in form, that he handed them to his own clerk for the purpose of their being paid away, but by an act of fraud on the part of a clerk they got into the hands of a bonâ fide holder for value; and we are treated to this somewhat protracted argument in order to decide the question whether under these circumstances the drawer of these genuine cheques is liable upon these cheques to a person who has received them in good faith and paid value for them.

I do not profess to differ in any one respect from the judgments which have been delivered by the Court of Appeal; and my opinion is, that it would be treating this case with a respect that it does not deserve if one were to go more elaborately into the question than to say that I entirely concur with what was said by the Court of Appeal, and that I hope we shall not again have an argument of this sort upon a matter which, if it really could be made a matter of question, would throw very considerable difficulty and doubt upon the currency of negotiable instruments. I therefore move your lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. I also think the case too clear for argument. I think Messrs. Attenborough, having taken these cheques in good faith for value and without any notice of any irregularity in their history, are entitled, now that they are called in question, to treat them as payable to bearer.

Lord SHAND.—I am also of opinion that this appeal should be disallowed.

The first question to be determined in this case is whether the cheques in question were or were not, in the language of the statute, to be "treated as payable to bearer." Upon that question I entertain no doubt. Apart from the dicta and authority of the Vagliano case, I should have had no difficulty on the statute. The statute expressly provides that where the payee is a fictitious or non-existent person, the bill (and under the statute a cheque is to be regarded as a bill) may be "treated as a bill payable to bearer." These cheques were in favour of a person of the name of Brett—he was fictitious, because that name had been provided by a person who wished to commit a fraud and to appropriate the money of his employer. He knew no person of that name, and the person who got the cheques knew no one of that name, and, in the language of the statute, I think these were therefore cheques in favour of a fictitious person and a non-existent person. But it appears to me further that the decision and grounds of judgment in Vagliano's case are directly applicable to the present. There is no limitation in the language of the statute of the effect of the insertion of the name of the fictitious or non-existent person as payee of a cheque to the case where this is done with the knowledge of the drawer, and nothing to warrant a judicial interpretation of the statute in this limited way.

Treating these documents, then, as cheques in favour of bearer, what is the other point that has been maintained? It has been said that the cheques were never issued. I do not stop to notice what the special meaning of the word "issued" in the statute is defined to be. The cheques in question were parted with by the employer to his clerks, and it was the employer's desire and intention that they should be sent out as cheques to be paid by the banker in ordinary course. By a system of fraud these cheques passed out of the hands of one clerk into the hands of another, and ultimately into the hands of the respondents in return for full value. It appears to me that cheques which have been signed and intended by the drawer to be issued, and which were parted with by him and so issued, although parted with and issued in consequence of fraud practised on the drawer, must in the hands of a bonâ fide holder for value be valid and effectual.

Counsel for the appellants argued that the case was the same as if the cheques had been stolen from a strong-box in which they had been locked away—as if they had been cheques which it might be the drawer kept in his own repositories, and which were either not intended to be issued at all, or, at all events, to be issued only in certain contingencies. That would, however, be an entirely different case from this. I agree with what the noble and learned lord on the woolsack has said, and with what was said by Kay, L.J., in the Court of Appeal—namely, that if bills under such circumstances were not to have currency and to be negotiable, it would be a very serious blow to the use of negotiable instruments in this country. On these grounds I am of opinion with your lordships that the arguments which have been maintained at the bar are untenable.

Lord DAVEY.—I also think that this case is too clear for serious argument, and I concur in the judgment which your lordships have proposed.

Appeal dismissed.

In re SIMPSON. (a.)

Settled land—English land—Infant beneficiary having Colonial domicile — Sale—Appointment of Colonial trustees—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 2, sub-sections (1), (8); ss. 38, 59, 60.

Where an infant domiciled in a British colony was beneficially entitled to English land under a will which contained no power of sale, and it was for the benefit of the infant that the land should be sold, the court appointed persons resident in that colony trustees of the settlement effected by the will for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

(a.) Reported by J. RITCHIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

Reginald Whitechurch, who died on the 29th of January, 1895, domiciled in New South Wales, was, at the time of his death, beneficially entitled in possession to one twenty-fifth share of certain freehold and leasehold property in England under the will of his aunt, Elizabeth Whitechurch, and to one-thirtieth share of certain other freehold and leasehold property also in England, under the will of his aunt, Margaret Whitechurch.

By his will dated the 25th of January, 1895, he devised and bequeathed to Marie Simpson, an infant, domiciled in New South Wales, any interest which he might be entitled to under the said wills for her sole and separate use, any moneys received during her minority to be expended towards her education and maintenance and on her attaining the age of twenty-one, or marrying with the consent of her trustee before that age, the corpus to be handed to her for her separate use, and he appointed E. H. Simpson executor and trustee of his will.

The will was proved by E. H. Simpson in Sydney, and a copy of the probate was sealed in the Probate Registry in England.

An agreement was entered into by E. H. Simpson for the sale of the testator's shares in the above-mentioned properties to certain of the co-owners of such properties. These shares being settled land within section 59 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, by reason of the infancy of the said Marie Simpson, it was necessary that trustees thereof, for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, should be appointed.

An originating summons in the matter of the said shares and in the matter of the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, was accordingly taken out by the said Marie Simpson by her next friend to have the said E. H. Simpson and P. S. Selfe, of Sydney, appointed trustees under the above-mentioned settlement for the purposes of the said Acts.

North, J., in chambers, dismissed the summons on the ground that, in his opinion, the court ought not to sanction a proceeding by which the proceeds of sale of an infant's estate would pass into the hands of trustees out of the jurisdiction of the court, who might invest them in unauthorized securities.

Notice of appeal was given on behalf of the said Marie Simpson.

Vaughan Hawkins, in support of the application.—By section 38 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, the court has power to appoint trustees of a settlement for the purposes of the Act. The court has jurisdiction to appoint persons resident in a colony. The definition in section 2, sub-section (8), is wide enough to include such persons. The order should be that the persons approved are appointed trustees of the settlement effected by the will for the purpose of the Act: In re Morgan, 31 W. R. 948, 24 Ch. D. 114; In re Wright's Trusts, 24 Ch. D. 662, 32 W. R. Dig. 214.

LINDLEY, L.J.—We think that there is jurisdiction to make the order, and the only question, therefore, is whether we ought to make it. No doubt the court does not in general appoint persons out of its jurisdiction to be trustees, and if in this case the infant was domiciled in England we should not make the appointment. But she is domiciled in New South Wales, and all her friends and connections are there. Her estate consists of undivided shares in freehold and leasehold property in England. The co-owners of the property have agreed to purchase these shares on fair terms. The persons whom it is proposed to appoint trustees, and who, if appointed, will receive the proceeds of sale, are resident in the same colony as the infant. In these circumstances the business-like course seems to be to make the order. It is clearly for the benefit of the infant that it should be made.

The order should be that the persons proposed are appointed trustees of the settlement effected by the will for the purposes of the Act.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I agree.

RIGBY, L.J.—I agree.

JONES v. GERMAN. (a.)

Justices—Jurisdiction—Search warrant—Information—Reasonable suspicion of felony—Sufficiency of information.

The information on which a search warrant for goods is applied for need not allege the actual commission of a larceny. It is sufficient if the information alleges, either directly or by fair intendment, that the informant has reasonable grounds for suspecting that a larceny has been committed.

Appeal from the judgment of Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., reported ante, p. 112, [1896] 2 Q. B. 418.

The action was brought to recover damages for false imprisonment and trespass to goods.

The plaintiff was employed as butler and bailiff to Thomas Wood, of Brasted, Kent, and the defendant was a justice of the peace for Kent.

Wood swore an information before the defendant that "he hath just and reasonable cause to suspect, and doth suspect, that William Jones (the plaintiff), of Brasted, has in his possession certain property belonging to the said Thomas Wood, and upon his oath doth depose and say that the said William Jones has been in his employ for five years and is now under notice to quit, and that he has requested the said William Jones to allow him to search several boxes which the said William Jones has had packed ready to be taken away, but which he refuses to be looked through."

The defendant thereupon granted a warrant authorizing a constable to enter the premises occupied by the plaintiff, and there search for the goods, and if the same or any part be found upon such search to bring the goods so found, and also the body of the plaintiff, before him (the defendant) or some other justice of the county to be disposed of and dealt with according to law.

In pursuance of the warrant a search was made in the presence of the plaintiff and Wood, and Wood identified and claimed as his property certain articles which were found packed in the plaintiff's boxes, and the plaintiff was thereupon taken into custody upon a charge of stealing them.

Subsequently the plaintiff was charged before the defendant with stealing the said goods, and was committed for trial at the quarter sessions, and the grand jury returned a true bill. An agreement was arrived at under which Wood offered no evidence against the plaintiff, and certain of the articles were given up to Wood, the plaintiff undertaking to take no proceedings for false imprisonment or malicious prosecution against Wood. A verdict of not guilty was returned.

The plaintiff then brought this action against the magistrate, alleging that the search warrant was issued without jurisdiction, because the information did not charge the commission of any criminal offence, and did not specify the goods for which search was desired.

The jury assessed the damages at £15 if the defendant was liable only in respect of the search, and at £75 if he was liable for the arrest and imprisonment until the committal for trial.

The Lord Chief Justice held that it was sufficient if the information alleged reasonable grounds for suspecting that the goods were being feloniously dealt with by the plaintiff, and that this information could reasonably be so interpreted; and that the warrant need not specify the goods. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

J. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and A. E. Gill, for the plaintiff.—The defendant had no jurisdiction to issue this search warrant. The information upon which a search warrant is founded must allege that a felony has been committed. At any rate it must allege that the informant has reasonable grounds for suspecting, and does suspect, a felony to have been committed. Here the information does not allege either of those things. There is nothing in it which is not consistent with an honest possession of the goods by the plaintiff. The old authorities lay down that there must be an allegation that a felony has been committed: 2 Hale's Pleas of the Crown, 150; 4 Co. Inst. C. 31, p. 176; Entick v. Carrington, 19 Howell's State Trials, 1029, at p. 1067. Those authorities were followed in M'Donald v. Bulwer, 13 Ir. C. L. R. 549; and the forms in the text-books agree therewith. In Elsee v. Smith, 1 Dow. & Ry. 97, it was held that an information is sufficient if it states that the goods are in possession of the accused and that the informant reasonably suspects that they have been stolen. That case only modifies to that extent the rule laid down by the older authorities. Here the information does not allege any suspicion of a felony, nor does it allege a felony.

They also referred to Lindsay v. Leigh, 11 Q. B. 455; Lawrenson v. Hill, 10 Ir. C. L. R. 177; Hope v. Evered, 34 W. R. 742; 17 Q. B. 338; Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 112), s. 16; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 103.

Carson, Q.C. (Hohler with him), for the defendant.—If there are facts stated in the information from which the magistrate can reasonably treat it as conveying a charge of suspicion of felony, that is sufficient: Elsee v. Smith; Lawrenson v. Hill, 10 Ir. C. L. R. at p. 194; and merely committing an error of judgment will not make the magistrate liable: Mills v. Collett, 6 Bing. 85, at p. 92; Cave v. Mountain, 1 Man. & G. 257. This information complies with that test.

J. Lawson Walton, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I agree with the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice. In my opinion the defendant was acting within his jurisdiction as a magistrate when he granted the search warrant. It is immaterial whether he made an error in the exercise of that jurisdiction. There was enough upon the face of this information to give him jurisdiction to issue a search warrant. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—This search warrant was issued under the general inherent jurisdiction of the defendant as a justice of the peace. It was argued that the defendant had no jurisdiction upon the information laid before him to issue the search warrant, because the information did not allege that any larceny had been committed, and did not specify the goods to be searched for. In my opinion, if, by any reasonable intendment, it can be collected from the information that the informant had reasonable grounds for suspecting and did suspect that the goods had been stolen, that is sufficient. The authority for that proposition in Elsee v. Smith. That case shows that a positive averment that a felony has been committed is not necessary, but that an averment that the informant reasonably suspects the goods to have been stolen is sufficient. The question, therefore, is, Can this information be fairly construed as alleging that the informant reasonably suspected the goods to have been stolen. The test, adopted by the Lord Chief Justice, may be applied. Supposing the same language were the subject of an action for libel, and there was an innuendo that the defendant meant thereby that he had reason to suspect the goods to have been stolen, in my opinion the jury might properly find that the words were capable of that meaning. I think that the fair intendment of this information is that the informant had reasonable grounds for suspecting and did suspect that a felony had been committed. In my opinion, therefore, the judgment is right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (Appellants) v. GROVE, SURVEYOR OF TAXES (Respondent). (a.)

Inland revenue—Income tax—County council—Interest received by county council on loans to other public bodies—Deductions—16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, Schedule D.

The London County Council, under powers given them by various statutes, borrowed large sums of money and created stock on which they paid interest to the stockholders, income tax being deducted by the Bank of England on behalf of the Commissioners of Income Tax before such payment. The London County Council also, under powers given them by various statutes, advanced sums of money by way of loan to certain public bodies from whom they received interest in full without deduction of income tax. The London County Council were held liable by the surveyor of taxes to pay income tax on such last aforesaid interest, and he assessed them under Schedule D. On appeal to the Commissioners, and subsequently to the Divisional Court, but not when before the surveyor, the London County Council contended that if they were so liable they were entitled to certain deductions in respect of income tax paid by them in other transactions.

Held, that the London County Council were properly assessed, and that they were liable to pay income tax on the sums received by them in full without deduction of income tax by way of interest on loans made by them.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was the only question before the surveyor, and therefore the only question the court had jurisdiction to deal with, and any other transactions by the London County Council could not be taken into consideration.

Decision of the Divisional Court, 44 W. R. 599, affirmed.

This was an appeal by the London County Council from the decision of the Divisional Court (Pollock, B., and Bruce, J.)—see 44 W. R. 599—on a special case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the District of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, in the County of London, upon the determination of an appeal to them under the Income Tax Acts, which appeal related to a claim for the payment of income tax upon the sum of £352,021 6s. 10d., the interest received in 1892-93, in full without deduction of income tax, by the London County Council upon loans advanced by them to the School Board for London and other local bodies.

The appellants contended that no duty was payable in respect of such sum, but only on such part of it as was profit (if any); and that if duty was payable on such sum or any part thereof then they were entitled to make deductions in respect of other transactions in which they had borrowed money on which they paid interest, from which interest income tax was deducted on behalf of the Commissioners, and in respect of transactions relating to certain lands the rents of which the appellants, as owners, received.

The Divisional Court held that the appellants were properly assessed under Schedule D of the Income Tax Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34) in respect of the aforesaid sum, such sum being part of their funds and part of the corpus of their property; and further that the appellants could not be treated as a trading concern so as to bring the money they borrowed, on the one side, and the money they lent, on the other side, into an account.

From this decision the London County Council now appealed.

The full facts as set out in the special case will be found in the report of the case in the Divisional Court (44 W. R. 599).

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C., Bosanquet, Q.C., and English Harrison, for the appellants.

Sir R. Webster, A.G., and Danckwerts, for the respondent.

The arguments of counsel sufficiently appear in the stated case and in the following judgments:

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case a surveyor of taxes applied to the county council for payment of the income tax in respect of interest which they had received from certain parties to whom they had lent money. That interest, which they received in the course of the year, amounted to £352,021. The surveyor of taxes demanded income tax in respect of that, and that is all he asked for. The county council took objection to the assessment on the ground that no part of the sum of sum of £352,021 was or is assessable or chargeable under the Income Tax Acts, and that no duty was or is payable by the London County Council in respect thereof. That was the case before the surveyor. Nothing was then said about any other transactions, nor was this claim made in respect of any other transactions. The claim and the assessment were in respect of the receipt by the county council of that interest, and their answer was that that interest was not assessable at all. Upon that the surveyor insisted on his right to assess them, and then they appealed against that decision of the surveyor to the Commissioners—that is, against the decision of his that they were assessable and should be charged in respect of that interest which they had received in the year amounting to £352,000, and thereupon they went before the Commissioners. Now the only question before the Commissioners upon that appeal was whether that amount was assessable. The Commissioners have held that it was assessable, and when the appeal went to the Divisional Court that was the question really before the Divisional Court. The main question, I may say, was, Was the interest so received assessable?

Now, before the surveyor, they did not mention any question of deductions, they could not have done so before him upon the simple question which they were disputing. There could be no deduction from that amount of interest which was to be assessed under the circumstances which were before him. No deduction had been made at all; the county council had received the whole, had not paid or dealt with any deduction, they had received the whole and therefore it was held by him that they were assessable to the whole amount.

When the case came before the Commissioners what the county council did was this: They still maintained that upon those facts which were before the surveyor (the only facts which were before the surveyor) they were not bound to pay anything. But they endeavoured to bring in another view, which is this. They said: Supposing we are assessable on that interest and that in respect of that transaction there is no deduction which can be claimed, we now, before you, the Commissioners, bring in a history of other transactions which we had, not with these people who paid us interest, but other wholly independent transactions with wholly different people and with two sets of different people. We were owners of certain property, and we let that property to tenants who were to pay us, in respect of their occupation, ground-rent; we bring in that transaction and we say: Upon that transaction, by reason of certain sections in the Income Tax Acts, we paid income tax for those tenants, and we are entitled to deduct it. That is in regard to the tenants. Then they said: We had transactions wholly independent of the people from whom we claimed interest and to whom we had lent money, which was this—We borrowed money from certain people, as we were entitled to do by our Act of Parliament, to the extent of £28,000,000, and according to our agreement with them we were bound to pay them interest amounting to £966,000.

Now, that is a wholly separate transaction with different people; with different people from the tenants, with different people from those to whom we had lent money—we lent it to the stockholders—and we say that the surveyor of taxes, when he made his claim against us, ought to have entered upon those two transactions, he ought to have inquired into them, and if we had endeavoured to bring them before him, he would have been bound to entertain them, and if he found, that as far as the Government was concerned, we might have claimed some reduction of the income tax or property tax, in respect of those separate transactions, he ought to have taken these claims which we had against the Government for reduction upon those transactions into consideration and have applied them to this transaction and made a deduction in respect of this transaction.

The answer given to that on behalf of the Crown is this: You have no right to put upon the surveyor such an inquiry as that; and if you had put it before him he was not bound to entertain it; he had a simple case before him. He had asked you for the income tax on the interest that you had received. That is all he had to do. If you could have shown that, according to any of the statutes, there was this deduction to be made, well and good, then you would have been entitled to deduction in respect of that assessment which he had made, but you had no right to ask the surveyor of taxes to go out of that transaction, and to go into transactions wholly independent of it; to ask whether there was a claim for reduction in those transactions as against the Crown, and then to apply it to this, because to do that is only to say that as between you and the Crown there is a set-off, and there is nothing in any one of the Acts which allows you to say that you can put forward against a claim for assessment, which is a valid claim, a set-off as against the Crown in respect of other transactions. The judgment of the Divisional Court is that, at the most, if you do make out your other cases, they only amount to a set-off, and there is no such thing as a set-off in such a case as this. Your claims in respect of the other transactions cannot be set off at all. This transaction in which the Crown claims this interest is a simple transaction, a transaction not mixed up with any other, and therefore, even if you could make out a case upon the others, you cannot bring that in here.

Now, that is the judgment of the Divisional Court, and we have to say whether we agree with or differ from that decision, and the grounds on which it was given.

Then the Crown go further, by way of caution, and say that, with regard to those other cases, the county council have no claim for reduction, even if, as between themselves and their own tenants, they had made out, or were entitled to make out, in this case that they had paid the whole, when they ought not. I should have thought they were entitled to a reduction in respect of those rents received by them; but, it is said, they have not made that out. With regard to the other case—that is, to any claim which they had to deduct anything in respect of the money which they were paying to the stockholders for money borrowed from the stockholders, it is not within any one part of these Income Tax Acts. The 10th rule or section may apply to the case of the rents—it cannot apply to this case of the stockholders—they do not come within any words of it, and, as far as I am concerned, I could not get myself to bring this case of the payment to the stockholders within any part of the 10th rule. Then it was said: But you can bring it within the 24th rule. That, it seems to me, depends entirely upon whether the conditions of the 24th rule were complied with. I do not wish to decide either of those points at present; but to say that I have not a very strong opinion about them would be wrong. I have a very strong opinion that they are not within the 10th rule nor within the 24th rule. The 24th rule was not complied with. The conditions precedent to allowing a deduction under the 24th rule were not complied with. But supposing they were, then there might be, with regard to any assessment of income tax, or of any deduction in respect of the money paid by them to the persons from whom they borrowed moneys, an allowance on that transaction. If there were any allowance to be made in respect of the tenants of the property and a payment of rent by them, that would be a transaction between them. Whenever a surveyor comes to deal with the county council in respect of those matters, he may have to deal with those deductions; but the surveyor here, in my opinion, had nothing to do with those separate and independent transactions, and ought not to be called upon to entertain them. The Commissioners pressed, no doubt, as we have been pressed by powerful and vigorous counsel, seemed to have entertained questions which they need not have entertained.

The Divisional Court, when the case came before them, seem to me to have rejected these arguments as not being relevant to the only question, which was before them, which was whether the decision of the surveyor in this case was right, and whether the adoption by the Commissioners of his decision was also right. That left the only question to be the one which the county council brought forward at first—namely, that they were not liable for income tax in respect of the interest which they have received.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the decision of the Divisional Court was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I think that in this case there is really only one question raised, and that is this, whether the county council are liable to pay income tax in respect of interest that they have received from persons to whom they have lent money, which has not already been subjected to income tax. I am clearly of opinion that they are liable. I think the case is covered by the words of the Act of Parliament, and by authority. Now that is all that I propose to decide in this case. It has been said and argued with great force that, even assuming the county council are so liable as I have stated, they are entitled as against the Crown to make certain deductions. Now, I am bound to say that that is a matter to my mind of very considerable difficulty. I have felt that there is very great force in the way in which it has been put by Sir Edward Clarke. If I were compelled to express my opinion with regard to that matter, I should desire to take time to consider the question. It is a matter of great difficulty, and a matter about which I wish it to be clearly understood that I express no opinion at the present moment one way or the other. I merely decide this case on the ground that there is only one question raised—namely, the question to which I have alluded, that is, whether or not the county council are liable to pay income tax on the interest received by them from the persons to whom they have lent money which has not already been subject to income tax.

I understand Sir Edward Clarke to put the other point in this way, that if no deduction is to be allowed then they are not called upon to pay income tax out of the money which has already been subjected to income tax. That, I again say, is a question about which I express no opinion, and which in all probability will have to be decided in the future.

RIGBY, L.J.—In this case the question arises whether the London County Council is chargeable in respect of a sum of £352,000 odd, the amount of moneys which they received from various bodies to whom under their powers they had lent money, by way of interest in the year ending the 31st of March, 1893. In the ordinary way the bodies who were paying that interest ought to have deducted the income tax. Then the county council would have received it less income tax, and the only reason why that was not done apparently was that the county council suggested to them that this was an exceptional case, and that income tax was not payable in respect of those sums, and therefore would not allow them to deduct it, saying that they had no power to absolutely compel them to pay the extra money. That was the position they took. They said, you are not liable to pay us the whole of the moneys; but the whole of the moneys were paid apparently for some time. This was the course of dealing that had taken place, and the Crown had not objected; but the point was clearly raised in respect of that year ending the 31st of March, 1893, and then the surveyor of taxes, whose duty it was to deal with it, decided that inasmuch as the borrowers of the money from the county council had not deducted the income tax, the whole of it having passed into the hands of the county council they must pay it; and as far as appears to me that was the only matter he had jurisdiction over. What has the surveyor of taxes to do with a demand which anybody may have, or may think he has against the Crown for repayment of money overpaid? It has not been suggested that he has any jurisdiction. The only decision was that they must pay duty on the £352,000, and against that decision the county council appealed to the Commissioners, stating as their ground that no tax was payable on the sum or any part of it.

Now apparently before the Commissioners they brought in, as the Master of the Rolls has said, two other questions which do appear to me to be quite foreign to that question as to whether £352,000 in their hands was taxable. First of all as to the lands. Now about them undoubtedly they paid tax, but as I understand the facts they had not raised any demand against the Crown; they did not raise any question at all about being entitled to any deduction in respect of those lands. Of course apparently—I say "apparently" because I do not wish to decide any point which is not now before us—apparently the case as regards the lands was the same in principle as that with regard to the money—I mean as regards deduction. What took place was this (and I consider it somewhat unfortunate): The county council, choosing to rely upon the position which they throughout took, that they were not liable in respect to the £352,000, permitted the deduction which by law must be made from the sums paid to the stockholders for income tax to go to the Crown account, and the Crown have received the whole of it. It was suggested that our law is in that peculiar position, that if you employ the Bank of England that must take place. Until I have that matter thoroughly investigated and argued I decline to assume that it must be so. I have no doubt that the Bank of England is, as a rule, bound by Act of Parliament to deduct from all dividends that it pays, the amount of income tax; but to say that if they have a client who has already paid the income tax they are nevertheless bound to ignore that fact whilst deducting the income tax from the person to whom they pay, and pay it over to the Crown, is to my mind so remarkable a statement that until that is clearly proved I should be sorry to assent to it.

However, we have not to do with that. The county council permitted that to be done without protest, without any claim being made as against the Crown, and it was attempted before the Commissioners to agree that there was a set-off. I suppose it would not be put in that way, but that there was some equitable sort of claim against the Crown to have a return of moneys they had received because the county council had taken a wrong view of their position; they thought they were entirely exempt, and having been beaten, or feeling themselves liable or likely to be beaten upon that point, they wanted to raise that claim. It has not been shown to me that the Commissioners had any jurisdiction whatever to deal with the question. They did find that the county council were not entitled to any return of that duty, and of course that was right. I cannot see any foundation whatever for suggesting that that duty, or any part of that duty, was returnable. The fact that the Commissioners allowed matters to come into the case which were irrelevant to the appeal before them, and which are irrelevant to the appeal now before us, cannot give us jurisdiction. We have had a very able argument on both sides with reference to that point, and I regret very much that it does not appear to be within the scope of our duty here. We might have determined it now, perhaps—we shall probably never have it better argued—but it is not before us. I agree in the view taken by the Master of the Rolls, and it was so treated by the Divisional Court. Of course Pollock, B.'s, judgment is a great deal criticized on the assumption that he had decided what he never attempted to decide. He said, and he said with truth, that if a man has got an income of a thousand a year, and has charged it, say, to the extent of £300, so that really his beneficial enjoyment is only £700 a year; nevertheless, that is no answer whatever, and is not relevant to the question whether he is to be charged on a thousand. That is perfectly true, and it is only by twisting that into what certainly it does not in itself mean—that is, into saying that he never under any circumstances can get a deduction from anybody else, that you can make that which is correct in point of law, and correct as regards the real facts in issue in this case, wrong. I understand the Divisional Court to mean, "We can only ask whether the tax ought to be payable in the first instance, we decide that we have nothing to do with the rest of the case at all." I take the same view of it, and, of course, coincide with the view that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

DIDCOT, NEWBURY, AND SOUTHAMPTON RAILWAY CO. v. GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY CO. AND LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway—Through booking—Reasonable facility—Consideration of public interest—Railway and Canal Traffic Acts, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31), s. 2, and 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 25), s. 25.

Upon an application for through booking over continuous lines of railway belonging to different companies the Commissioners must take into consideration the requirements specified in section 25, sub-section 5, of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888—namely, whether the granting thereof is a reasonable facility in the interest of the public, and whether the route is a reasonable one.

Appeal from an order of the Railway and Canal Commission.

The Didcot, Newbury, and Southampton Railway Co. applied (so far as material) for an order for through rates for goods and through booking for passengers viâ their railway between Southampton on the London and South-Western Co.'s line and Paddington on the Great Western Co.'s line.

The Great Western Railway Co. did not oppose the application.

Sir Frederick Peel came to the conclusion, on the facts, that the application should be granted, Lord Cobham dissenting so far as regards the through rates for goods.

Collins, J., in delivering his judgment, after saying that he agreed with the judgment of Sir Frederick Peel, added: "I regard the decisions in this court since its commencement as binding on this court, and sitting here it seems to me that in view of those decisions there is practically no alternative but to hold, as Sir Frederick Peel has held, that the rates must be granted. . . . It is, further, clear law that through booking as distinguished from through rates is for all practical purposes a matter of right. . . . It is pointed out by Mr. Commissioner Miller in the case of Great Western Railway Co. v. Severn and Wye Railway Co., 5 Ry. Traff. Cas. 170, that through booking between certain points being practically a matter of right as a reasonable facility, it is only when you come to deal with the question of rate, and thereby force a company to take something less than it is by law entitled to demand, that the considerations which are introduced under section 25 of the Act of 1888—namely, the advantage to the public and the reasonableness of the route, come into question. . . . This practically, in my judgment, brings the case down to something very little more than an application for through booking, and a very slight primâ facie case of advantage to the public, I think, would suffice on the authorities, as they exist in this court, to entitle the applicants to the orders which they ask for."

The London and South-Western Railway Co. appealed.

Cripps, Q.C., and E. Moon, for the appellants.—Two of the commissioners having differed, Collins, J., decided the case upon a point of law. He held that through booking is a matter of right, and that the interest of the public and the reasonableness of the route are only to be taken in consideration under section 25, sub-section 5, of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, when a through rate is applied for. In so holding he merely followed the decision of Mr. Commissioner Miller in Great Western Railway Co. v. Severn and Wye Railway Co. That decision is wrong. A through booking necessarily involves a through rate, and an order for a through booking involves a through rate. In both cases the considerations specified in section 25, sub-section 5, of the Act of 1888 must be taken into account.

They also referred to South-Eastern Railway Co. v. Railway Commissioners, 6 Q. B. D. 586, 29 W. R. Dig. 109.

Littler, Q.C., and W. M. Acworth (Balfour Browne, Q.C., with them), for the Didcot, Newbury, and Southampton Railway Co.—A through booking is a reasonable facility within section 2 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854: Sussex County Council v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co., 8 Ry. Traff. Cas. 17; and the commissioners can order it, but it is not contended that they can do so without any consideration of the interest of the public. On the facts Collins, J., agreed with Sir Frederick Peel,* and no appeal lies from their decision on the facts.

They also referred to Barret v. Great Northern and Midland Railway Companies, 1 C. B. N. S. 423, 5 W. R. C. L. Dig. 229.

Cripps, Q.C., replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the application is substantially that the London and South-Western Railway Co. (the Great Western Railway Co. not objecting) be ordered to give through booking for passengers and goods between Southampton and Paddington viâ the applicants' line, and through rates for goods. The Railway Commissioners inquired into the whole matter, and Sir Frederick Peel came to the conclusion that it would be for the advantage of the public that there should be through booking and through rates between those stations, and he had jurisdiction to do that under the Railway and Canal Traffic Acts, 1854, s. 2, and 1888, s. 25. Collins, J., went through the same process as Sir Frederick Peel and came to the same conclusion on the questions of fact. Lord Cobham differed upon the facts. There was, therefore, a majority one way, and we cannot interfere. Collins, J., however, finding that the two commissioners differed upon the facts, thought that it would be better (so he has told me), besides agreeing with Sir Frederick Peel upon the facts, if he could support Sir Frederick Peel's decision in another way than by merely agreeing with him on the facts. He thought that he, in his capacity as legal member of the court, by deciding a question of law, could make the difference between his colleagues less than it otherwise would be, or make it vanish altogether.

Now, the question of law which he decided, and intended to decide, was, that in considering the question of through booking he was not bound by the consideration of public interest, or the other considerations and limitations mentioned in section 25 of the Act of 1888. He thinks that it is right, for the purpose of comity, for the legal member of the court to follow the decision in point of law of a former legal member of the court until it is overruled. Therefore he followed the decision of Mr. Commissioner Miller as he understood him, and as I also understand him, that the court could consider and determine the question of through booking without the considerations and limitations which it would be bound to give to a question of a through rate; and the learned judge said that as a matter of law he must allow the through booking, and that it required a very slight primâ facie case of advantage to the public to entitle the applicants to a through rate. Understanding Mr. Commissioner Miller's judgment to be what I have stated, and considering the judgment of Collins, J., to be, as he says it was, intended to follow the decision of Mr. Commissioner Miller, I think that in this court we ought to say what we think of that proposition of law—namely, that the court can grant through booking without any of the considerations or limitations which are necessary as to the grant of a through rate. In my opinion that proposition is wrong, and therefore the point of law decided by Collins, J., is wrong. An applicant can apply to the commissioners for a through rate. They may grant a through rate, but before they can do so they must go into the consideration of the public interest. If they grant a through rate it seems to me to follow, as a matter of necessity, that they must allow a through booking. If a through rate is granted either for goods or for passengers from Southampton to Paddington at a less amount than the aggregate of the local rates, the moment that is done the applicant will ask to have his goods or himself booked. It follows of necessity that if a through rate is granted, a through booking must be granted also. The converse seems to me to be equally true, that if an applicant asks for a through booking, and the court grants it, it follows that they grant a through rate. If the Railway Commissioners think that a through booking is for the advantage of the public, and they don't wish to interfere with the aggregate of the local rates, they will, by granting the through booking, be granting a through rate in ordinary language—that is, a rate payable for the through journey. That is a new rate; it is one instead of several rates. If they lessen the aggregate of the local rates they equally grant a through rate. If they grant a rate less than the aggregate of the local rates, it may be that in railway language that is the only rate that is called a through rate. But if they grant a through booking and leave the rate at the aggregate of the local rates, it is still, in my opinion, a through rate. I think that, subject to the consideration of the conditions and the limitations mentioned in the Act of 1888, they can either grant that by saying that they grant a through booking or a through rate. If they grant either the one or the other they must of necessity grant both.

* The court stated that Collins, J., had informed them that he concurred with Sir Frederick Peel on the facts, but that he also gave judgment upon the point of law.

Collins, J., as I understand, wished us to express an opinion upon this point, and I have expressed my opinion. I have some hope that we shall be found differing only in words and that we shall agree as to substance. As, however, Collins, J., agreed with Sir Frederick Peel upon the questions of fact, that is sufficient to carry the decision below, and we have no jurisdiction to interfere with it.

LOPES, L.J.—It was unnecessary for Collins, J., to have dealt with the law at all, because it is now clear that he agreed with Sir Frederick Peel upon the facts. But, having done so, it seems that he desires that this court should state its opinion upon the law. Now, in my opinion, through booking is a reasonable facility, and it cannot be granted as a matter of right unless evidence is given which brings it within the purview of the statutes which allow reasonable facilities to be given. I think that Mr. Commissioner Miller did hold that the granting of through booking was a matter of right, but I am not quite certain that Collins, J., adopted that view. I rather gather that he meant to decide that provided a certain amount of evidence is given in favour of a through booking, and that evidence is not met or rebutted on the other side, that would be sufficient to justify the court in coming to the conclusion that it would be a reasonable facility, and that it ought to be granted. I cannot myself think that a through booking may not be granted without a through rate. I can imagine cases of this kind. If there are three railways, a passenger might find it extremely inconvenient when he gets to the end of the first railway to find that he has to take another ticket, and again at the end of the second railway. If the railway companies did not act harmoniously to prevent that state of things, it would be right and proper that an application should be made to the commissioners for a through booking. I believe that was one of the main objects for which the Railway Commissioners' Court was established. I am of opinion, therefore, that there may be through booking without a through rate. It may be, as the Master of the Rolls has said, that it is only a distinction in words. I admit that, if there is through booking, the aggregate of the local rates would be the amount to be paid. But I do not understand that to be what is generally called a through rate. I cannot understand any traders or other persons going to the Commissioners' Court and asking for a rate of that kind. If they had obtained through booking, it follows, as a matter of course, that the rate which they have to pay will be the aggregate of the local rates. The object of the application for a through rate, as I understand it, is to obtain something less than the aggregate of the local rates. It may be that that is a distinction in terms rather than in substance, but that is the view I have always heard applied to "through rate." However, that is a proposition which does not refer to the present case. I only wish distinctly to say this, that I think a through booking may be granted by itself without a through rate, and I think a through booking is a reasonable facility, as laid down by Wills, J., in Sussex County Council v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co.

RIGBY, L.J.—Agreeing as I do with the Master of the Rolls in the judgment which he has delivered, I shall add very few words. Upon the question as to the point of law laid down by Collins, J., I am unable to see how there can be a through booking without a through rate, or how a through rate can effectually be granted unless it includes a through booking. I am quite ready to agree that railway managers and others, when they are talking about through rates, very generally mean reduced rates. But that there is a legal meaning of that word as being only applicable to a reduced rate I have not heard anything to induce me to believe. When a person takes his ticket or pays the price demanded for the carriage of goods from one place to another, assuming the carriage to be over different railways, he pays one sum. He probably knows nothing about the way in which that sum may have to be divided. That may be a matter of arrangement between the railway companies, or by an order of the Railway Commissioners. He only knows that he is entitled for that one payment to have himself or his goods, as the case may be, carried over the whole distance. He has paid for through carriage, and anyone would consider it a through rate, whether it was the sum of the local rates, or whether it was a smaller sum. I think it follows from that that it is quite impossible that there should be a through booking or a through rate granted, except upon the considerations that would authorize the granting of a through rate. It appears to me that the same considerations ought to be given to whether a through booking should be granted as would be given to the question of a through rate being granted.

In re STEVENS.
COOKE v. STEVENS. (a.)

Executor—Acting before probate—Delay in proving will—Wilful default.

A testator died in 1882, and his will was proved (by one only of three executors named in the will) in 1889. A policy on the testator's life could not be got in until probate was obtained, and meanwhile interest at the rate of 5 per cent. was paid upon a debt of the testator.

Held, that this delay in proving the will and getting in the money due upon the policy did not amount to wilful default.

Two persons named as executors in the will wrote a letter in conjunction with the executor who eventually proved asking the assurance office to pay the policy money to a creditor of the testator.

Held, that all three had acted as executors.

Action.

Gardner Christopher Stevens made his will on the 12th of February, 1880, and appointed Charles Frederick Stevens, Matthew Tallitt Emerson, and John Sewell executors thereof. The testator died on the 23rd of December, 1882, and the will was proved by C. F. Stevens alone on the 15th of October, 1889. The testator was entitled to a policy for £676 in the Scottish Widows' Assurance Office, which became payable upon the 21st of March, 1883. This sum was paid upon the 18th of November, 1889, with £45 1s. 4d., being interest at the rate of one per cent. from the 21st of March, 1883, to the 21st of November, 1889. Meanwhile five per cent. was paid upon a debt due by the testator.

This was an action for administration of the estate of the testator, and it was sought to have the defendants Stevens and Emerson declared liable to account on the footing of wilful default. There was a dispute as to whether Emerson, who was a solicitor, had acted as executor. The acts relied upon as showing that he acted as an executor were:

(1.) Coleman, who claimed to be a creditor of the testator when the will was in Emerson's possession, as he said as solicitor for Stevens, obtained a subpœna in the usual form requiring Stevens and Emerson to lodge the will with the registrar.

(2.) Pyecroft, a simple contract creditor of the testator in September, 1886, four years after the testator's death, issued a writ against Stevens and Emerson as executors de son tort. The writ was taken to Emerson and an undertaking to appear asked for. The parties came to some arrangement and the creditor accepted a bill.

(3.) In January, 1883, Mann issued a writ for administration of the testator's estate, making all the executors named in the will defendants. An appearance was entered on behalf of all the defendants, but the action was not proceeded with.

(4.) On the 28th of July, 1883, all the executors named in the will wrote to the Scottish Widows' Assurance Office requesting that the money due upon the policy might be paid to Messrs. Gurney, who were creditors of the testator. The entry in Emerson's bill of costs with regard to this was, "Writing letter for your signature as arranged."

Everitt, Q.C., and Butcher, for the plaintiff, one of the residuary legatees.—We ask for an account against the defendants upon the footing of wilful default. There was a breach of trust in not getting in the policy-money sooner—the death was in 1882 and the money was not got in till 1889. Meanwhile the estate had to pay interest at 5 per cent. It is clear that Emerson acted as executor. In Mann's case all the executors entered an appearance, and pleading in the character of an executor is an admission that a man is an executor (Williams on Executors, p. 210), and entering an appearance as an executor must have the same effect.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and C. James.—No case of wilful default is made out. No money has been lost that might have been recovered. As regards the policy, it is said that there is a loss of interest between the date at which the policy was payable and the date at which it was actually paid. As 1 per cent. interest was paid, the plaintiff only claims the difference between that and the 5 per cent. paid upon the testator's debts. But this interest never became part of the testator's estate. It cannot be said that not proving the will earlier was wilful default. [They cited: Lowry v. Fulton, 9 Sim. 104; Orr v. Newton, 2 Cox. 274; Vickers v. Bell, 12 W. R. 589, 4 De G. J. & S. 274.] Emerson, as a matter of law, is only liable for what he received: Watkins v. Brent, 1 My. & Cr. 97. The simple omission of an executor to clothe himself with the legal title to get in a debt is not wilful default. The money obtained from the insurance office might have been applied in paying a debt that did not bear interest, and if that had been done the estate would have suffered no loss.

They also referred to Stacey v. Elph, 1 My. & K. 195.

Everitt, Q.C., replied.

NORTH, J., after stating the facts, said: The insurance company might safely have paid the executors, as any executor, even before probate is taken out, can give a valid receipt (Williams on Executors, p. 249). It is equally clear that the executors could not compel payment before they proved the will. The bill of costs clearly shows that in this matter they all acted as executors and nothing else. The cases referred to are all cases in which there was a principal for whom an agent might act. This case might be similar if Stevens had then proved the will, in that case it might be well that Emerson would have acted as his agent. But here there was no principal; how could any of the three who signed the letter be said to act as agent for the others? In my opinion it is clear what was done was to give the executors' authority to the insurance company to pay over the money to Messrs. Gurney. It is a clear case of acting as executors. I need not go into the other instances of Emerson's acting as executor, though the same considerations apply. I must direct an account against Emerson, similar to that directed in James v. Frearson, 1 Y. & C. C. C. 370. An inquiry is asked on the footing of wilful default. This would be a very severe order, and up to the present wilful default has not been shown, which is necessary to obtain such an order. The passage quoted by Lord Hatherley in Partington v. Reynolds, 6 W. R. 388, 4 Drew. 253, p. 256 —"the plaintiff must allege and prove that there is some part of the deceased's personal estate which ought to have been, and might have been, received by the defendant, and which he has omitted to receive by his own wilful neglect or default"—describes the law. A case must be shown; it is not enough that wilful default may possibly be arrived at as a result of an inquiry. It was first said that rents had been received and not accounted for, but this was not proved. It was said that a debt due from a creditor was not got in, but it was not proved that there was a loss to the estate by reason of the executors' action. Then it was said an alleged surplus of £180, arising from proceeds of sale, might have been applied in paying a debt bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent. But paying a wrong creditor is not wilful default. It is said that there was wilful default in not getting in the money on the policy earlier, but no loss to the estate resulted, as the whole sum has been received. But it is said there was a breach of trust, as if the money had been got in it might have been applied in paying a debt or have produced interest. That does not seem to me to amount to wilful default. Not proving the will certainly is not wilful default, and the damages said to result from the delay are too remote. I must direct an account against both defendants. I dismiss the action so far as it asks for an account on the footing of wilful default, with costs. Both defendants resisted an administration decree, so they must pay the costs of their resistance, and the costs must be set off.

discontinued—Judicature Act, 1875 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 77), s. 21—R. S. C., ord. 26, r. 1; ord. 78, r. 2.

When a plaintiff is made a party to an action without his authority there is jurisdiction to order the solicitors so using the plaintiff's name to pay the plaintiff's costs, although before a motion for that purpose and to strike out the plaintiff's name from the writ can be made, the action has been discontinued.

Motion.

This was a motion by a company that the name of the company might be struck out of the writ in the action, on the ground that the solicitors had no authority to make the company a party to the proceedings, and that the solicitors by whom the writ had been issued might be ordered to pay the company's costs as between solicitor and client, both of the action and of this motion.

The action had been commenced in the name of the company, two directors, and two shareholders to restrain further proceedings in a voluntary winding up. An application for an injunction to this effect had been made, and had been dismissed, and the plaintiffs ordered to pay the costs. On this coming to the notice of the company this motion was launched, and two days after this motion had been served the solicitors who acted for the plaintiffs gave to the defendants a formal notice that they discontinued the action. The solicitors now took the objection that as the action was gone, the court had no jurisdiction to make the order.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Duke, for the motion.—Under the old practice of the Court of Chancery the court would have jurisdiction. Hood v. Phillips, 6 Beav. 176; Wade v. Stanley, 1 J. & W. 674; Nurse v. Durnford, 28 W. R. 145, 13 Ch. D. 764; Fricker v. Van Grutten, [1896] 2 Ch. 649, are to the same effect. Bolton v. Bolton, 24 W. R. 663, 3 Ch. D. 276; In re Savage, 29 W. R. 348, 15 Ch. D. 557, were also cited.

Kenyon Parker, for the solicitors.—The old practice of the Court of Chancery has no application. The matter turns on the true construction of ord. 26, r. 1: Newby v. Harrison, 9 W. R. 849, 3 De G. F. & J. 287; Farquharson v. Pitcher, 4 Russ. 510; Conybeare v. Lewis, 28 W. R. 330, 13 Ch. D. 469.

NORTH, J.—In my opinion the discontinuance of an action cannot have any larger effect than the dismissal with costs of a bill under the old practice. It was well settled that after the dismissal of a bill with costs, a person whose name had been used as a plaintiff without authority could get an order to strike out his name, and that the solicitors should indemnify him against costs. This has not been altered in express terms by ord. 26, r. 1. It would be surprising if such an application as this could be evaded by the solicitors putting an end to the action in this way. There is nothing in the rules altering the old practice in this respect., (Reads section 21 of the Judicature Act, 1875, and R. S. C., ord. 78, r. 2.) I cannot find any provision in the Acts or rules as to what is to be done when a solicitor uses a plaintiff's name without his authority, I think, therefore, that the old practice still prevails.

BOWEN v. PHILLIPS. (a.)

Executor—Injunction restraining bankrupt executor from acting—Application by co-executor—No receiver.

Upon the application of one executor for an injunction to restrain his bankrupt and defaulting co-executor from acting, the court has jurisdiction to grant the injunction without having recourse at the same time to the appointment of a receiver of the testator's estate.

Motion by the plaintiff, William Bowen, one of the executors of the will of Daniel Roberts (deceased) to restrain his co-executor, Daniel Phillips, the defendant, from receiving, dealing with, or managing the testator's estate.

The testator died in August, 1891, having by his will bequeathed a life interest in his estate to his wife, who was still alive.

The plaintiff and defendant had acted as executors of the will down to the present time, and had paid the yearly income of the estate to the widow. The testator had not appointed trustees of his will.

From the evidence it appeared that the defendant had misappropriated moneys belonging to the estate, and had been adjudicated bankrupt in July, 1896.

Greig, for the motion.—I do not ask for a receiver in this case; there is no need of one, for the plaintiff will continue to administer the estate as executor. I submit that your lordship has power to grant the injunction although the appointment of a receiver is not asked for. I refer to Williams on Executors, 9th ed., vol. 1, p. 187-8, and to the cases of Utterson v. Mair, 2 Ves. jun. 95; and Gladdon v. Stoneman, 1 Madd. 143, there cited.

The defendant did not appear.

AIREY v. STAPLETON. (a.)

Deed—Presumption of law—Deed more than thirty years old—Marriage settlement purporting to exercise power of appointment—Execution by attorney of appointor—Mere production of deed insufficient evidence—Invalid exercise.

On the mere production of a deed more than thirty years old purporting to exercise a power of appointment and executed by the attorney of the appointor, the presumption of law that a deed more than thirty years old and produced from an unsuspected repository proves itself does not, in the absence of other evidence, warrant the court in coming to the conclusion that the attorney was properly constituted and authorized to execute the deed, and, consequently, the power of appointment will not be deemed to have been validly exercised.

Adjourned summons.

On the hearing of this summons a question arose as to whether or not a power of appointment purporting to have been exercised by a marriage settl ment executed by the attorney of the appointor had in fact been validly exercised.

The facts were as follows: George Dennis Walsh and his wife, Amelia Sarsfield Walsh, were parties to the settlement, dated the 19th of December, 1851, and made upon the marriage of their daughter Amelia Walsh with John Moore Cole Airey, and by the settlement Mrs. Walsh purported to exercise in favour of her daughter a power of appointment of which she was the donee. At the date of the settlement Mr. and Mrs. Walsh were resident abroad. The deed was executed by their attorney, and the attestation clause duly testified to such execution by him. The remaining parties to the deed executed it in person.

There was no reference in the body of the settlement to the appointment of the attorney. The power of attorney was not produced, and no evidence was tendered to show that the attorney was properly constituted or authorized to execute the deed.

In the events which had happened, if the appointment was good, Mrs. Airey's statutory next of kin were entitled to the fund in question, but if not, her husband's executors were entitled to it.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Stokes, for the trustee of the marriage settlement.

Spence, for one of the next of kin.—The settlement is more than forty years old, and therefore it proves itself, and must be taken to have been properly executed by the attorney under the power of attorney. The fact that a deed proves itself must establish the deed and all things necessary to its validity.

P. O. Lawrence, Q.C., and George Henderson; Beaumont; and Musgrave, for other next of kin, adopted the same argument.

Warrington, Q.C., and Howard Wright, for the executors of the husband.

KEKEWICH, J.—It has been argued that, as the rule of law is in favour of deeds which have been executed more than thirty years, I ought to consider that this deed was a proper execution by Mrs. Walsh of her power of appointment. The rule is clearly stated in Broom's Legal Maxims (6th ed., p. 898), under the heading "Omnia praesumuntur rite et solemniter esse acta," in the following manner: "Upon the same principle proceeds the rule that deeds, wills, and other attested documents which are more than thirty years old, and are produced from an unsuspected repository, prove themselves." Now, in the present case I have before me a deed which purports to have been executed by the parties thereto (except Mr. and Mrs. Walsh) in person; I must accordingly conclude that those parties did in fact properly execute the deed at that time—i.e., on the date of the deed. This settlement also purports to have been executed by the attorney of Mr. and Mrs. Walsh, as appears in the attestation clause. I do not, however, find any rule of presumption which countenances me in coming to the conclusion that the attorney of these parties was properly constituted ad hoc, and, bearing in mind the rule against delegation of discretionary powers, I do not think that in the circumstances I should be justified in concluding that the attorney was authorized to execute this deed. I am therefore of opinion that the power of appointment was not validly exercised.

MANDERS v. MANDERS. (a.)

Justices—Married woman——Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 39)—Order of justices under section 5—Mode of appeal—Section 11.

The only mode of appeal from the decision of a court of summary jurisdiction on an application made for an order under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, is, under section 11 of that Act, to the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division. A court of summary jurisdiction has no power in such a case to state a case for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Divisional Court.

This was an appeal by way of a case stated to the Queen's Bench Division by the justices for the borough of Louth under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting in the said borough on the 5th of November, 1896, an application of Jane Manders, wife of Matthew Manders, for an order under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, was heard and determined.

The justices made an order that the said Jane Manders be no longer bound to cohabit with the said Matthew Manders, and providing for a weekly payment for maintenance and costs. The justices at the request of the husband stated a case for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division.

The facts of the case are immaterial to the present decision.

Section 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 39), provides as follows: "Save as hereinbefore provided, an appeal shall lie from any order by a court of summary jurisdiction under this Act to the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice . . ."

M. Shearman, for the respondent, raised a preliminary objection. No appeal lies in this case to a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench. An appeal will only lie to the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division. This is expressly provided in section 11.

T. Hollis Walker, for the appellant.—This case was stated under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, section 33 of which gives "any person aggrieved who desires to question a conviction, order, determination, or other proceeding of a court of summary jurisdiction" the right to have a special case stated. The right there given is not taken away by the Act of 1895, but only a further mode of appeal provided for. The two concurrent remedies are not inconsistent: Hetherington v. Hetherington, 36 W. R. 12, 51 J. P. 294. See also the case of Power v. Wigmore, L. R. 7 C. P. 386, where Willes, J., at p. 391, says: "The fact of parties having a right of appeal under section 106 of the Building Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122) and the fact of the magistrate having jurisdiction to allow an appeal, if he thinks proper, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, are by no means inconsistent; the two powers may well co-exist."

WRIGHT, J.—I think it is extremely difficult to say what the proper construction of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, as regards an appeal is, but I think the common sense point of view is that the Legislature intended that the only mode of appeal should be to the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Division, as the judges of that division have the greater experience in matrimonial cases. However, this Act creates a new jurisdiction, and where that is the case there is no appeal from the tribunal on which such new jurisdiction is conferred unless the Act expressly so states, or unless such right of appeal is given by some subsequent Act. The Act we are dealing with expressly gives, by section 11, a right of appeal to the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, and I should say that the reasonable construction is that no right of appeal to any other court was intended to be given. It is contended, however, that the mere mention of and reference in several sections to the Summary Jurisdiction Acts imports and implies in this Act the right given in the Summary Jurisdiction Acts to have a case stated for the opinion of this division of the High Court. I cannot think that is so. If that were so it would give a right of appeal to quarter sessions. I do not think that would be right, except in the case of a conviction for assault.

The references to the Summary Jurisdiction Acts are carefully limited as in sections 1, 4, 7, and 8, the last of which enacts that all applications under the Act shall be made in accordance with the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, which, if there were no further provision, might imply that there is power to state a case for the opinion of this division. Section 10 contains a very peculiar enactment—namely, that the court may refuse to make an order in cases which would be more conveniently dealt with by the High Court, and that in such case no appeal shall lie from the decision of the Court of Summary Jurisdiction. Section 11, however, contains the specific provision that "save as hereinbefore provided, an appeal shall lie from any order or the refusal of any order by a court of summary jurisdiction under this Act, to the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice."

I am of opinion that the right construction of that section is that there is no other right of appeal. However, it is quite possible that there may be two co-existing modes of appeal from this court of summary jurisdiction, and therefore we shall give leave to appeal.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the reasonable construction of section 11 is that only one mode of appeal was intended, and that to the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division.

MOUNTIFIELD v. WARD. (a.)

Licensing law—Sale during prohibited hours—Bonâ fide traveller — Consumption off the premises — Licensing Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), ss. 9, 10.

The provisions of section 10 of the Licensing Act, 1874, as to the sale of intoxicating liquor to a bonâ fide traveller during prohibited hours do not exempt a licensed victualler from being convicted under section 9 for selling intoxicating liquor during prohibited hours if the sale was for consumption off the premises; and it is no defence in such a case that the defendant truly believed that the person supplied with liquor was a bonâ fide traveller.

Special case stated by justices for Middlesex.

An information was preferred against the respondent charging him that he did, on the 19th of July, 1896, sell beer at the Duke's Head public-house during the time at which premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors are directed to be closed, contrary to section 9 of the Licensing Act, 1874.

The respondent was, on Sunday, the 19th of July, 1896, the landlord of the Duke's Head, holding under a protection order. The house was licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors for consumption on or off the premises. On the day in question, shortly before 11 a.m., two men came to the house, carrying two empty bottles. They spoke to the respondent, who was standing in the doorway, and were admitted into the house. They were, during prohibited hours, served with a pint of beer each, which they drank, and the bottles were filled with beer. The men paid for the beer and carried away the bottles to a public park in the neighbourhood, and, in company with other men there assembled, consumed the beer.

The justices found as a fact that the respondent truly believed that the men were bonâ fide travellers, and that he took all reasonable precautions to ascertain whether or not they were such travellers. The justices also found as a fact that the beer in the bottles was sold for the purpose of being consumed off the premises.

The justices dismissed the information.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether they were right in so doing.

The Licensing Act, 1874, s. 9, enacts that: "Any person who, during the time at which premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors are directed to be closed by or in pursuance of this Act, sells or exposes for sale in such premises any intoxicating liquor, or opens or keeps open such premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors, or allows any intoxicating liquors, although purchased before the hours of closing, to be consumed in such premises, shall . . . be liable to a penalty . . ."

Section 10 (1): "Nothing in this Act or in the principal Act contained shall preclude a person licensed to sell any intoxicating liquor to be consumed on the premises from selling such liquor at any time to bonâ fide travellers . . ."

(3) "If in the course of any proceedings which may be taken against any licensed person for infringing the provisions of this Act or the principal Act relating to closing, such person (in this section referred to as the defendant) fails to prove that the person to whom the intoxicating liquor was sold (in this section referred to as the purchaser) is a bonâ fide traveller, but the justices are satisfied that the defendant truly believed that the purchaser was a bonâ fide traveller, and further, that the defendant took all reasonable precautions to ascertain whether or not the purchaser was such a traveller, the justices shall dismiss the case as against the defendant . . ."

Danckwerts, for the appellant.—The provisions of section 10 of the Licensing Act, 1874, by which liquor may be sold to bonâ fide travellers during prohibited hours only apply where the bonâ traveller consumes the drink on the premises. The words "such liquor" in the first paragraph of section 10 refer to the previous words "intoxicating liquor to be consumed on the premises." It will be contended that the respondent was rightly acquitted because he truly believed that the purchasers were bonâ fide travellers; but in this case there was unlawful selling quite apart from the question the respondent's belief in the bona fides of the men served. If the respondent is protected by the third paragraph of section 10, the result will be that if there is a sale to a person who is a bonâ fide traveller for consumption off the premises, then the defendant can be convicted, whereas if, in the same circumstances, the purchaser is not in fact a bonâ fide traveller, but the defendant truly believes him to be so, then the defendant would escape conviction. It cannot have been intended that a publican who sells to a person who is not a bonâ fide traveller shall be in a better position than when he sells to a person who is a bonâ fide traveller.

George Elliott, for the respondent.—The decision of the justices was right. There is nothing in section 10 to show that the exemption in favour of a sale to bonâ fide travellers is to be limited in the manner suggested. The words "such liquor" mean intoxicating liquor, and the words "to be consumed on the premises" are not intended to be directory as to where the liquor must be consumed, but are merely descriptive of the licensed premises to which the proviso is confined. Dames v. Bond, 55 J. P. 503, is in the respondent's favour. In that case a man had been performing at a concert at a publican's house. After closing time, and before leaving, he purchased a bottle of whiskey for consumption during the journey home. The court held that no offence had been committed. [WRIGHT, J.—The point was not taken there that even a bonâ fide traveller cannot purchase liquor for consumption off the premises.] The point must have been present to the minds of the judges. A. L. Smith, L.J., said: "I think Colwill was a traveller all the time until he returned home, and therefore there was no evidence of any offence in the appellant selling the liquor to Colwill." As to the second point, the words "in the course of any proceedings" in the third paragraph of section 10 cover this case, and therefore the respondent is protected by the finding of the justices that the respondent truly believed the men to be bonâ fide travellers.

Danckwerts, in reply.—The proviso in section 10 as to honest belief on the part of the defendant was introduced into the Act of 1874 because of the decision in Roberts v. Humphreys, 21 W. R. 885, L. R. 8 Q. B. 483, that the onus of showing that the person supplied with drink was a bonâ fide traveller lay on the defendant. The honest belief of the defendant is no defence in the circumstances of this case.

WRIGHT, J.—On the main question of the construction of section 10—that is to say, whether it extends to the sale of liquor to be consumed off the premises—I am clearly of opinion that the appellant's contention must prevail. If it were permissible to sell liquor to bonâ fide travellers for consumption off the premises, it would be impossible for anyone to see that the liquor was consumed by bonâ fide travellers only. I think that the words "such liquor" refer to the previous words, "liquor to be consumed on the premises." It was argued that they referred only to "intoxicating liquor." I do not think so; and it is important to observe that the words "such liquor" do not occur in any other place in the Act. I think, therefore, that the respondent ought to have been convicted, unless he is protected by the third paragraph of section 10. That paragraph, no doubt, does at first sight look as if it was intended to protect a defendant under all circumstances; but notwithstanding the generality of the language used, I do not think that that can have been the intention. In my opinion that part of the section does not apply to a case such as this, where the defendant cannot show that the sale to the traveller was (apart from the question whether the customer was a bonâ fide traveller) a sale permissible under the Act.

I think that the respondent ought to have been convicted, and the case must be remitted to the justices.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. It was never intended that a bonâ fide traveller should resort to licensed premises during prohibited hours for the purpose of laying in a store of liquor to be consumed at some future time. There is some difficulty in construing the words of section 10, but I think those words must receive a limited construction. Any other construction would result in giving greater privileges in the case of persons who were not bonâ fide travellers than where they were such travellers. That can never have been the intention of the Legislature.

Appeal allowed. Case remitted to justices to convict.

LAMOND v. RICHARD AND THE GORDON HOTELS (LIMITED). (a.)

Innkeeper—Duty to provide accommodation—Traveller—Right to remain in inn.

A common innkeeper is under no legal obligation to receive into his inn a person who is not a traveller, or to permit to remain in his inn, after reasonable notice to quit, a person who, though he came to the inn as a traveller, has ceased to be a traveller.

Appeal of the plaintiff from the Brighton County Court.

The action was brought against the manager and proprietors of the Hôtel Métropole, at Brighton, to recover damages for the illegal expulsion of the plaintiff from the hotel. The plaintiff, who was a young lady of position and good character, went to the hotel in November, 1895, and remained there continuously until the 31st of August, 1896, on which day the defendants refused to re-admit her on her return from a walk. It was admitted by the defendants that there was sufficient accommodation for the plaintiff in the hotel on the day in question, and that she had always paid her bill during her stay.

The county court judge found as a fact that there was nothing in the conduct of the plaintiff to justify the defendants in refusing to supply her with accommodation in the hotel, but he held that she had long ceased to be a traveller or wayfarer, and that the defendants were under no legal obligation to permit her to remain in the hotel after reasonable notice to quit, which he found as a fact had been given. The judge gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

Carson, Q.C. (P. Rose-Innes with him).—The county court judge was wrong in holding that the common law obligation of an innkeeper to afford accommodation only exists in the case of persons who are "travellers or wayfarers." When once a person has been received into an inn as a guest, he is entitled to remain as long as he likes, provided he behaves properly. If the defendants' contention is right, then at some period the innkeeper must lose his common law privileges, such as lien, which are correlative to the obligation to provide accommodation for guests. But, in Allen v. Smith, 10 W. R. 646, 12 C. B. N. S. 638, it was held that an innkeeper had a lien upon the goods of a guest who was not a traveller. In Gordon v. Silber, 39 W. R. 111, 25 Q. B. D. 491, Lopes, L.J., said: "By the common law of England every person who keeps a common inn is under an obligation to receive and afford proper entertainment to everyone who offers himself as a guest, if there be sufficient room for him in the inn, and no good reason for refusing him." In Bacon's Abridgement, Tit. Inns and Innkeepers, c. 5, it is stated that "if A. comes with goods to an inn in London and stays there for a week, month, or longer, and is there robbed of them, he shall have an action against his host; though, perhaps, being at the end of his journey, he cannot then be said to be transeuns, according to the writ in the register." That clearly shows that the innkeeper is still liable for stolen goods, although the guest has ceased to be transeuns. There is no case in which an innkeeper has asserted a right to turn out a guest without excuse, or in which the position of guest has become that of boarder without a special contract.

He also referred to Turrill v. Crawley, 13 Q. B. 197; Medawar v. Grand Hotel Co., [1891] 2 Q. B. 11, 39 W. R. Dig. 94. [WRIGHT, J., referred to Reg. v. Rymer, 25 W. R. 415, 2 Q. B. D. 136.]

Asquith, Q.C. (S. H. Day with him).—This is an entirely novel claim, for which there is no foundation in any decided case or in any dictum in the cases. The policy of the common law was that a traveller, making his way from one place to another and finding an innkeeper holding out an offer of refreshment and accommodation, was entitled to keep the innkeeper to his offer; but the authorities show, beyond all doubt, that the innkeeper was only bound to provide accommodation for persons who were actually travellers. In Bacon's Abridgement, Tit. Inns and Innkeepers, c. 1, the duty of an innkeeper is said to extend chiefly "to the entertaining and harbouring of travellers." In Rex v. Luellin, 12 Mod. 445, an indictment against an innkeeper for refusing to receive a sick person was quashed for not saying he was a traveller. Again, in Holder v. Soulby, 8 C. B. N. S. 254, at p. 264, Erle, C.J., quoting Calye's case, 8 Co. Rep. 32, 1 Sm. L. C., 10th ed., p. 115, says that the liability for the safe keeping of the property of a guest is restricted entirely to the case of an innkeeper keeping a common inn, and the wayfaring traveller using the inn as a wayfarer.

WRIGHT, J.—This case is quite free from doubt. The report of the case of Rex v. Luellin, which was a decision by Lord Holt, is in these words: "The defendant was master of the Bell Inn, in Bristol. He was indicted for not receiving one taken ill with the small-pox, and it was quashed for not saying he was a traveller." That case was cited in Reg. v. Rymer, which was a case of an indictment against an innkeeper for refusing to supply refreshment. Kelly, C.B., there said: "The second question is whether the prosecutor is a traveller. I need hardly cite authorities to show that it is essential to such a prosecution that the prosecutor should be a traveller. If any be wanted the case of Rex v. Luellin, in which an indictment was held bad for want of an allegation to that effect, is an express authority upon the point." In the same case Denman, J., said: "The principles laid down in Burgess v. Clements, 4 M. & S. 306, show that the object of the law upon the subject of an innkeeper's liability is merely to secure that travellers shall not, while upon their journeys, be deprived of necessary food and lodging." That is obviously the principle upon which the law depends; but the obligation on the innkeeper to receive and keep the guest only continues so long as the guest is a traveller. The alternative position is that the innkeeper is under liability to keep the guest in his house for life. No doubt, so long as the guest does remain in the inn, although he may cease to be a traveller, nevertheless the incident of the innkeeper's lien still exists. But the duty to take a person into an inn only exists in case of persons who are travellers.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The authorities clearly show that the obligation only attaches when the person demanding to be received into an inn is a traveller. In Bullen and Leake's Precedents of Pleading (3rd ed.) the form of a count in an action against an innkeeper for refusing to lodge the plaintiff is as follows: "That the defendant was an innkeeper and kept a common inn for the accommodation of travellers, and the plaintiff then being a traveller . . . yet the defendant did not nor would receive and lodge the plaintiff as a guest in the said inn, &c." Reliance was placed in the argument for the plaintiff, on a dictum of Lopes, L.J., in Gordon v. Silber. That dictum, however, was not necessary to the case then under consideration, and I do not think that Lopes, L.J., intended to lay down that the law is in accordance with the view as contended for by the plaintiff.

The plaintiff appealed.

Carson Q.C., and P. Rose-Innes, for the plaintiff.

Asquith, Q.C., and S. H. Day, for the defendants.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff, a young lady, arrived at the defendant's hotel at Brighton, and it is clear that she went there for the purpose of making a considerable stay, and not merely in the course of travelling. She was received into the hotel and provided with accommodation, and stayed there about ten months. The hotel proprietors then gave her notice to quit, but she refused to leave, saying that she would stay there until the hotel was burnt down—that is, as long as she chose. The defendants then, taking the opportunity of her going out for a walk, refused to receive her back again and gave her her luggage. She then brought this action. The action was tried before a county court judge without a jury, and he came to the conclusion that the hotel was an hotel which carried on its business according to the custom of England—that is, that it held itself out as willing to receive any traveller who came. He also came to the conclusion that the plaintiff was received into the hotel as a traveller, but that she had stayed so long at the hotel that she had ceased to be a traveller, and that the defendants were entitled to give her reasonable notice to quit. Now, the findings of the county court judge, in so far as they are findings upon questions of fact, cannot be reviewed upon appeal. His first finding is that the defendants' hotel held itself out to the public as one which would take in any traveller. That seems to me to be a question of fact to be decided upon a consideration of the nature of the hotel, and the intention with which it carries on its business. The county court judge has found in this case that this hotel is such as I have described, but it does not follow from that finding that other great hotels, like those we see in London, are hotels which hold themselves out as ready and willing to receive any traveller, and I cannot help thinking that it will be open to the courts in any future case to hold that such great hotels do not so hold themselves out; but in this case we must take it that this hotel did so hold itself out.

Then comes the next question, Did the plaintiff go there as a traveller? That, I also think, must be a question of fact in each case. We must take it that she did go there as a traveller. The point was not taken at the trial that she made a contract with the defendants as to her stay there, but the action was tried upon the footing that she arrived at the hotel as a traveller, the hotel holding itself out as willing to receive travellers. Then comes this question, is it true as a matter of law that a person who goes to an hotel as a traveller remains there a traveller for ever? If that were the law, it would be contrary to the truth. A person who goes to an hotel for the purpose of staying there and not intending to continue his travels would not be called in ordinary language a traveller. I will be no party to making the law say that which is contrary to the fact. Here, again, it seems to me to be a question of fact whether a person has ceased to be a traveller. Mere length of stay is not conclusive. A person may go to an inn upon a journey, and may become ill, and his remaining there during his illness, however long, will not prevent him being a traveller, as he intends all the time to continue his travels. But length of stay is one of the circumstances to be taken into consideration. If a person stays at an hotel for a time wholly inconsistent with his being a traveller, the judge may act upon that. In the present case the plaintiff said that she was going to stay until the hotel was burnt down. She meant by that that she intended to stay as long as she chose. Therefore it seems to me that there was evidence upon which the county court judge could properly find that the plaintiff had ceased to be a traveller. If that is, as I think it is, a a question of fact, no appeal lies. But I desire to say that, in my opinion, the evidence proved clearly that the plaintiff had ceased to be a traveller. She had no intention of continuing her travels. Therefore the custom of England did not apply, and the relationship founded upon that custom had ceased.

It was contended, as an objection to this view, that if that were so, the rights of the defendants as to lien had also come to an end. For my part I should say that the rights of the innkeeper as against the plaintiff had also ceased quite as much as the rights of the plaintiff against the innkeeper.

Then, as regards the suggested implied contract—namely, that the defendants had contracted to keep the plaintiff as long as she chose to stay, while she, on her part, was under no obligation to stay an hour longer than she chose—such an absurd contract cannot be implied. It never could have been in the contemplation of the parties at the time when the plaintiff went to the hotel.

For these reasons the judgment must be affirmed.

LOPES, L.J.—The law of England has conferred exceptional privileges and exceptional liabilities upon innkeepers, but only in relation to persons who are in the transitory position of travellers. In the old writ, which is set out in Calye's case, the words are "ad hospitandos homines, per partes ubi hujusmodi hospitia existunt transeuntes, et in eisdem hospitantes"; and in Bullen and Leake's Pleadings there is always an averment that the plaintiff came to the inn as a traveller. The plaintiff here resided at the hotel for ten months. She had no idea of leaving it, and she intended to remain there as long as she pleased. A reasonable notice to leave was given to her, and one day, after the expiration of the notice, when she left the hotel for a short time she was refused re-admittance. In these circumstances the county court judge came to the conclusion that this hotel was a common inn, that there was room for the plaintiff in the hotel, and that she had not in any way misconducted herself. That raises the question whether the plaintiff was a traveller at that time, or whether she had ceased to be a traveller. That, I think, is a question of fact, and the finding of the county court judge upon it is conclusive. But I do not desire to decide the case upon that technical ground, but upon the larger ground that the judge was quite right in coming to the conclusion that after having resided for ten months in the hotel she ceased to be a traveller, and that the defendants were entitled to give her reasonable notice to quit.

CHITTY, L.J.—The claim of the plaintiff is founded entirely upon the liability imposed upon innkeepers by the common law of England and not upon any implied contract. The county court judge has found that the hotel was a common inn. The defendants have not appealed from that finding, and we are not called upon to say whether it is right or wrong. The judge then considered the question whether the plaintiff had, after a stay of ten months at the hotel, ceased to be a traveller or wayfarer, in which character she had originally arrived at the hotel, and become a boarder, and he came to the conclusion that she had. If that is a question of fact, there is no more to be said about it. The appellant's counsel tried to treat it as a question of law, and the proposition they advanced came to this, that a person who comes to an inn as a traveller and stays there remains there always as a traveller. There is plenty of authority upon the relation of innkeeper and guest, but not one authority can be cited for such a proposition. It seems to me to be a question of fact when a person ceases to be a traveller and becomes a boarder. Upon the facts in this case I think that the judge was justified in coming to the conclusion that the plaintiff had ceased to be a traveller and had become a boarder. The length of time she stayed at the hotel was a fact for the judge to consider in deciding the question. The argument put forward was that the plaintiff could remain at the hotel as long as she pleased, provided she paid her bill and conducted herself properly, and could leave at any moment she pleased, the landlord on his part being bound to keep her as long as she chose to stay. Such a contention cannot be supported. With reference to the suggested implied contract, I can only say that the action was not founded upon an implied contract, and that, even if it were, to imply such a contract would be monstrous.

Appeal dismissed.

PALLISER v. DALE AND OTHERS. (a.)

Friendly society—Dispute—Expulsion of member—Jurisdiction of court—Friendly Societies Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60), s. 22—Friendly Societies Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 26), s. 10, sub-section 1.

Section 10, sub-section 1, of the Friendly Societies

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Act, 1895—which enacts that section 22 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, providing for the settlement of disputes between a member and the society in the manner directed by the rules of the society, shall apply to every dispute between any person aggrieved, who has for not more than six months ceased to be a member of a society, and the society—does not alter the nature of the dispute, but merely extends the time for settling disputes which come within section 22 of the Act of 1875. The dispute must still be one between the society and a member as a member.

Therefore a dispute whether the society is entitled to treat a person as no longer a member of the society is not a dispute to be settled according to the rules of the society, and the court has jurisdiction to entertain such dispute.

Appeal from an order of Lawrance, J., at chambers refusing an injunction until the trial of the action to restrain the defendants, the trustees of the Northallerton Providential Sick Society, a society registered under the Friendly Societies Acts, from excluding the plaintiff from the meetings and benefits of the society, and from refusing to accept his subscriptions.

The plaintiff was a member of the society, and on the 1st of May, 1896, at a meeting of the management committee he was fined, under rule 25 of the rules of the society, £1 1s. for having, as alleged, said that he had not received the funeral donation due from the society on the death of his wife. The plaintiff denied that he had made any such statement, and refused to pay the fine.

On the 17th of August the secretary of the society sent the plaintiff a notice that the fine of £1 1s. was due last meeting night, the 1st of August, and that if not paid he would subject himself to suspension from all benefits and privileges of the society, as per rules 5 and 26.*

The plaintiff not having paid the fine the society refused to accept his contributions.

Upon the 3rd of November the plaintiff brought an action for an injunction, and applied for an interim injunction as above. Lawrance, J., refused to grant it, on the ground that under section 10 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1895, the dispute had to be decided in the manner directed by the rules of the society, and that therefore he had no jurisdiction in the matter.

Section 22 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875: "Every dispute between a member or person claiming through a member, or under the rules of a registered society, and the society or an officer thereof . . . shall be decided in manner directed by the rules of the society . . ."

Section 10, sub-section 1, of the Friendly Societies Act, 1895: "Section 22 of the principal Act, which relates to the settlement of disputes, shall apply to every dispute between any person aggrieved who has for not more than six months ceased to be a member of a registered society, or any person claiming through such person aggrieved, and the society or an officer thereof, and accordingly in that section after the words 'registered society,' where they first occur, shall be added the words 'or any person aggrieved who has for not more than six months ceased to be a member of a registered society, or any person claiming through such person aggrieved."

These sections have been repealed and re-enacted in section 68 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896.

Scott Fox, for the plaintiff.—The learned judge had jurisdiction to entertain this application. In Prentice v. London, L. R. 10 C. P. 679, 24 W. R. Dig. 8, it was held that section 22 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, does not apply to a dispute as to whether a party is a member of the society or not. To bring the case within the section the dispute must be one arising between the society and a member as a member: Morrison v. Glover, 4 Ex. 430. In Willis v. Wells, 41 W. R. 64, [1892] 2 Q. B. 225, it was held that the section does not apply to a dispute as to whether a person who has been expelled from the society is entitled to be reinstated. The present case exactly comes within those decisions. The learned judge thought that section 10 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1895, had altered the law and brought such a dispute within section 22 of the earlier Act. That section, however, does not alter the nature of the dispute to be referred; it merely enlarges the time for settling disputes which come within the earlier Act. Therefore the judge had jurisdiction to entertain this application. Upon the merits it was clear that the society had no power under rule 25 to impose a fine for what the plaintiff was alleged to have done here, and no power to expel him for non-payment of that fine. The present application will decide the action, as all the facts are before the court.

Manisty, for the defendants.—Section 10 of the Act of 1895 was passed to meet the decisions in Prentice v. London and Willis v. Wells, and to compel a dispute between a person who has been expelled from the society and the society as to whether he is entitled to be a member to be referred to arbitration within six months after he has ceased to be a member. The limit of time is inserted because the reference is generally to the whole body of the society, and it is desirable to have the dispute determined by those who were members when the dispute arose. The plaintiff comes within the description of persons mentioned in section 22 of the Act of 1875, as amended by section 10 of the Act of 1895. The "dispute" also comes within that section, because it is a dispute whether the plaintiff has committed an "offence" against the society within rule 25, and that is a dispute which must be settled according to the rules of the society. The statement of the plaintiff was injurious to the credit and reputation of the society, and it is for the society, and not the courts, to decide whether that is an offence within the rule. The jurisdiction of the courts was therefore ousted. It is not denied that all the facts are now before the court.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The plaintiff, who had been a member of the society for a great many years, was fined by the committee, who purported to act under rule 25, one guinea for having, as they alleged, made certain untrue statements about the society. The plaintiff denied that he had ever made any such statements, and refused to pay the fine. They then, in effect, expelled him from the society. The plaintiff

* By rule 5 of the society's rules "any member allowing his contributions, levies, or fines to exceed twelve weeks shall have a notice sent to him by the secretary stating how much he is in arrears, and, if he does not bring himself into compliance on the following meeting of the society, he shall cease to have any claim upon the society." By rule 25 "any member of this society breaking a rule thereof, or committing any offence to which no specific fine is attached, shall be fined not less than 2s. 6d. and not exceeding the sum of £1 1s., as the majority of the management committee may think fit." By rule 27, "if any dispute shall arise between a member or person claiming through a member or under the rules of the society and the society or any officer thereof, it shall be referred to a summoned meeting of the society," to which every member of the society should be summoned.

thereupon brought this action and applied for an injunction to restrain the society from excluding him from the benefits of the society and from refusing to accept his subscriptions. The learned judge at chambers held that the dispute was one which must be settled according to the rules of the society, and refused the injunction on that ground.

Before the Friendly Societies Act, 1895, it was held that a dispute between a person and the society as to whether he was or was not a member of the society, as in Prentice v. London, or whether the society had a right to expel him, as in Willis v. Wells, was not such a dispute as had to be settled according to the rules of the society under section 22 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875. I agree with those decisions, and with the reasons given for them. A dispute whether a person is still a member of the society or not is not a dispute between a member and the society, and therefore it cannot be settled according to the rules of the society. Those decisions come to this, that if the society assumes to expel a member, it cannot afterwards say that he is a member and bound by the rules. They are estopped from saying that. Has that law been altered by the Friendly Societies Act, 1895? It is contended that section 10 has altered the law. The "dispute" there mentioned must be one between a member and the society, and not one between the society and anybody else. The section is dealing with a dispute which comes within section 22 of the earlier Act, and merely extends the time for deciding that dispute to six months from the time when the person ceased to be a member. The words of the earlier section are not altered; certain words are merely added to it by the later section. Section 10 does not alter the class of disputes to be settled according to the rules of the society. Therefore the dispute must still be one which, under the earlier Act, must be settled as directed by the rules of the society. Upon that ground the plaintiff cannot be shut out from his right to have the dispute adjudicated upon by the court. The learned judge had jurisdiction, therefore, to entertain this application.

That being so, we must now consider, as the learned judge ought to have done, what the dispute was. The dispute was whether the committee had a right to expel him. Now, even if they had a right to fine him, it does not follow that they had the right to expel him. Rule 25 is vouched to show that they had a right to fine him. The word "offence" in that rule must mean an offence against the society. It must be a breach of some rule of the society. What offence has the plaintiff committed here? To my mind none at all. Therefore the society had no jurisdiction to impose a fine upon him according to the true construction of the rule. But, assuming that a fine could have been imposed, its non-payment did not give the society a right to expel him at their own will. By expelling him the plaintiff acquired a right to raise the question in the courts whether the society had a right to expel him.

Therefore, upon the whole case, I come to the conclusion that Lawrance, J., had jurisdiction to entertain this application, and he could only properly come to the conclusion that the society had no right to expel the plaintiff, and must now receive his subscriptions.

The injunction, therefore, must issue.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the learned judge had jurisdiction to grant this injunction. The object of section 22 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, is to provide for the settlement of internal disputes between the society or its officers and the members. If the controversy is whether a party is a member of the society or not, that is not a matter of internal arrangement. There is plenty of authority in support of that proposition. In Prentice v. London it was held that as the trustees of the society denied the right of the plaintiff to be a member of the society they were estopped from saying that the dispute was between them and him as a member. In 1892 the question again came before the court in Willis v. Wells, where it was held that section 22 of the Act of 1875 did not include a dispute as to whether a person who has been expelled from the society was entitled to be considered as a member or not. Those cases show that the court has jurisdiction in cases like this. It is said that section 10 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1895, has altered that, and that, where a member is expelled, the period of membership is extended for six months so as to bring the dispute within section 22 of the Act of 1875. I cannot adopt that view. I do not think that the Legislature intended to make that a "dispute" within section 22 which was not a dispute before the Act of 1895. In my opinion the sections do not include the case of the expulsion of a member, and do not interfere with the law laid down as to estoppel. If the argument above stated were correct, the only effect would be that the present action has been brought too soon, and that the plaintiff ought to have waited some little time longer before bringing it. In my opinion section 10 of the Act of 1895 has not affected the previous decisions. So much for the question of jurisdiction.

Upon the merits, in my opinion, the learned judge ought to have granted the injunction. Looking at rule 25 I cannot think that any offence at all has been committed. All that can be alleged against the plaintiff is that he told a lie. That cannot come within the rule. I do not think that the committee had any power to fine him for that, and even if they had that power, they had no power under the rules to expel him for non-payment of that fine. The injunction must therefore be granted.

ATKINSON v. MORRIS. (a.)

Probate—Will—Revocation—Evidence—Admissibility—Statements of testatrix after date of will.

Under the Wills Act the same formalities are necessary to prove the revocation of a will as to prove the execution of a will.

If a will has been executed in duplicate conformably with the statute, and the possession of the duplicate has been traced to the testator, and after his death it is proved that one of them has been destroyed by the testator or is missing, the destruction of the one part will operate as the destruction of the will itself; but the statement of a testator, made after the execution of his will, that he has executed it in duplicate and has destroyed one of the duplicates is not admissible evidence.

In the Goods of Ripley, 6 W. R. 460, 1 Sw. & Tr. 68, applied and followed.

Appeal by the defendant J. C. Morris to set aside the verdict of the jury at the trial of the action and the judgment of Barnes, J., pronouncing in favour of the will of the testatrix, Mrs. Ann Keble Atkinson, dated the 8th of August, 1878.

By her will the testatrix gave her residuary estate to a nephew of her deceased husband, Chas. Thomas Atkinson, and appointed him and his mother, Mrs. Emma Atkinson, executor and executrix of it. They were the plaintiffs in the action, and propounded the will. The defendants, the next-of-kin of the testatrix, alleged that the will had been revoked, and tendered evidence to the effect that the testatrix had told a friend, Mrs. Lockyer, that she had executed her will in duplicate and had destroyed one copy with the intention of revoking the will. The learned judge at the trial ruled that the evidence was inadmissible. The will, which was admitted to probate, showed that the testatrix had run her pen through her own signature and partly through that of one of the attesting witnesses and had added this note: "Null and void. A. K. A. Through injustice on the part of Mrs. Emma Atkinson and family from time to time."

The defendants appealed on the ground that the learned judge had misdirected the jury and had improperly rejected evidence which was tendered to him.

Bayford, Q.C., and Barnard, for the appellants, cited Barry v. Butlin, 1 Curt. 637, and Tyrrell v. Painton, 42 W. R. 343, [1894] P. 151, on the question of misdirection. They cited Woodward v. Goulstone, 35 W. R. 337, 11 App. Cas. 469; Stobart v. Dryden, 1 M. & W. 615.

Bayford, Q.C., replied.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—Nothing can be clearer than the indication which the testatrix gave of her intention to end her testamentary disposition. And certainly the court will be most anxious, so far as it can consistently with the law, to give effect to her clearly-expressed intention.

The question is whether we can do so in point of law. The first point on the appeal is that of misdirection. [On that point his lordship said that, although he would have preferred rather more emphatic language and more explanation in the summing up, he could not come to the conclusion that there had been any misdirection, and continued:]

I repeat again that no one can doubt that she intended to revoke her will, and the court ought to be astute to give effect to that wish, if it can do so consistently with the established principles of law. The Statute of Wills has said two things. It has laid down formalities to be observed in order to make an effective, formal, operative will, and if these are not complied with, the law steps in, and however clear the intention of the testator may be, if it is not expressed according to the statute, the law says it is void, and the estate must be distributed as in the case of an intestacy, and his intention disregarded. The statute also prescribes the same formalities for the revocation of a will. If it is done by writing, it must be with the same formalities as are required for the execution of a will—i.e., it must be attested by two witnesses. It is clear in this case that, although it is clearly expressed and in writing, it is not expressed in conformity with the statute, and therefore that this intention of the testatrix, which would have been perfectly good if it had been properly signed and attested, cannot be relied upon as evidence of revocation. But it is said that revocation may be worked in other ways. Under the statute it may be effected by actual physical destruction of the document forming the will with the intention of revoking it, and it has been decided, and indeed it is common ground in this case, that if a will has been executed in duplicate conformably with the statute, and the possession of the duplicates has been traced to the testator, and after his death it is found that one of them has been destroyed by the testator, or is missing, the destruction of one part will operate as the destruction of the will itself. And pausing there—because on that the appellants contend that this will was in effect executed in duplicate, that both duplicates were in the possession of the testatrix, that one of them is missing, and therefore presumably destroyed, and that the other is here with an indication on the face of it of the intention of the testatrix to revoke it—were the defendants in a position to support that contention by legally admissible evidence? On the evidence as it stood at the trial, independently of that which the judge below rejected, it is impossible to say there was any case to go to the jury to show that the will was executed in duplicate. It was not suggested that as matters then stood the jury could come to any other conclusion than that they did arrive at.

But it is said that the defendants were prevented from proving their case on that point, because the learned judge ruled that the evidence they proposed to offer was not admissible. That evidence was this: There was living in the house of the testatrix one Edith Lockyer, and her evidence, which counsel proposed to adduce was, briefly, that the testatrix had told her that she had executed her will in duplicate, that she had spoken of the artfulness of the Atkinsons, and especially of C. T. Atkinson, in looking after themselves, and that they thought they had done a clever thing in getting hold of one of the duplicates; that she had got it back and destroyed the will; that later on Lockyer found the document now propounded in a drawer, and the testatrix then said, "That must be C. T. Atkinson's copy, because I have destroyed the will." In other words, it is sought to prove by the statements of the testatrix that she had executed the will in duplicate, which, if established, would entitle the defendants to contend that one part being destroyed and the animus revocandi being clear, the will was destroyed. Therefore the point is whether the statement of the testatrix made after the execution of her will, that she had executed it in duplicate, is evidence which ought to be admitted at law. I have come to the conclusion that it cannot.

It must be observed that the rules of evidence in this country are much less wide and liberal than those in other countries, and they shut out large branches of evidence which are of great force. We have to deal with settled rules, and we cannot disturb them. The evidence offered by the defendants is hearsay evidence, the evidence of a statement ex post facto of the testatrix herself. As a general rule hearsay evidence cannot be admitted, but there are some well-marked exceptions, such as declarations made against interest, statements made or recorded in the course of business by the person whose duty it is to make such statements and declarations in pedigree cases, and now we have a series of cases relating to statements mainly received upon the ground that they are evidence to make clear the intention of a testator, statements made before the execution of a will as to what the will was intended to contain. I always thought they were clearly-defined rules. The case of Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards goes further, and extends the exceptions to the admissibility to statements made by a testator after the execution of the will as to the nature of its contents. I will only say in relation to that case that we are bound by the decision on that point, but it is to be observed that that extension, the limit of which was clearly fixed, has not received the approval of distinguished lawyers in the House of Lords in Woodward v. Goulstone, though it has not yet been overruled. But it is not necessary for us to consider that, because taking it at the full extent it falls short of what the defendants must establish here. There is no case which goes the length of saying that the statement of a testator that he has made a will is taken to be evidence of the regular execution of the will according to the Wills Act. I regard as authorities by which we are bound, and with which I agree, the cases of Doe d. Palmer and In the Goods of Ripley. Both of those cases were referred to in Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards with approbation. They do establish the rule that statements by a testator are not admissible to prove the execution by him of a will, and there is no authority in favour of admitting them. If they are not admissible for that purpose, is there any distinction between admitting them to prove execution, and admitting them to prove revocation of a will? I see none. The statute enjoins the same formalities in each case.

I am sorry we cannot give effect to the clear intention of the testatrix. We cannot interfere, and I regret it, and I also regret that the learned judge should have given costs against the defendants. The appeal must be dismissed without costs.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. On the question of misdirection I do not think it necessary to say anything. The summing-up might have been expressed differently, but there was no misdirection. The case really turns upon the admissibility or inadmissibility of the evidence tendered by the defendants. Their case was this. They wanted to prove that this will was executed in duplicate and that the testatrix had destroyed one of the duplicate parts of the will with the intention of revoking it. That, if proved, would have been an answer to this case; but what evidence is there in support of it? Nothing except evidence of statements made by the testatrix to the effect that she had made a duplicate will and destroyed it. I cannot see that a declaration made by her that she had made a duplicate will can be distinguished in principle from a declaration that she had made one will. It was argued that two duplicates made one will and that the declaration might be admitted. But a duplicate must be signed in accordance with the Act, and it is not merely a piece of paper. It would be the execution by the testatrix of a valid testamentary document. To hold the evidence admissible on that ground would be very unsatisfactory and subtle. It is simply a question whether the declaration of the testatrix that she has made a will can be received in evidence. We have on that point In the Goods of Ripley, excluding such evidence, and that was distinctly approved by the judges in Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards, in which the court held that statements made by the testator subsequently to the execution of a will might be admitted to prove its contents. Can we bring the declaration, which has been rejected in the present case, within any of the recognized exceptions to the rule which rejects hearsay evidence? We cannot do it; the exceptions are well known and are enumerated by Jessel, M.R., in Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards. Reliance was placed on the principle upon which the exceptions are based as it was expounded by Jessel, M.R., in Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards; but the principle as so expounded would let in a great deal more evidence than is ever admitted. That was pointed out by Mellish, L.J., in that case, and by Lord Herschell in Woodward v. Goulstone. We are asked to say that although declarations of this kind cannot be used to prove execution of a will, they can be used to show that it was executed in duplicate and revoked. I cannot hold that this is evidence which ought to be admitted. If the rules of evidence are too narrow that is a matter we cannot alter. It is obvious that the testatrix intended to revoke her will and did everything she could except that which the law has said she must do to revoke it.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I agree. I own that I have struggled to prevent having to hold that this will is the real will and intention of the testatrix when she died. I have no doubt that it is not. It certainly is, therefore, necessary to look astutely to see if we cannot get out of so holding. The true reason why her intention cannot be carried out is not caused by any failure in the administration of the law by the court, but by the regulations introduced by the Legislature in the 20th section of the Wills Act, which lays down hard and fast rules as to the way in which wills are to be revoked. The testatrix did not know of this, and she did what she thought was effectual to revoke her will. She struck out her own signature in ink, and the signature of one of the witnesses, and she gave her reasons for cancelling her will. So as regards her intention there can be no possible doubt that she intended to cancel it. But she did not carry out the rules of the statute, therefore she has not revoked her will according to law. I am not going into the question whether she knew and approved of the contents of the will in the first place. I agree that there was no misdirection on that point.

On the chief question argued before the court I find myself bound by authority. The will was not revoked in accordance with the Wills Act; but if it could have been shown that she had executed a duplicate when she made her will, and that that duplicate had been destroyed that circumstance would have operated as a revocation of the will. The difficulty is this, that the defendants in setting up the duplicate could not prove that the will was executed in duplicate except by the evidence of Edith Lockyer, who could have said that after the will had been executed the testatrix had told her that it had been executed in duplicate, and that one part had been destroyed by her with the intention of revoking it. It was objected that that is not admissible evidence because you cannot prove the fact of the execution of a will in accordance with the Act by hearsay evidence. I am clearly of opinion that that objection is well-founded. I am not going into the question whether the court must hold since the decision in Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards that a statement made by a testator after the execution of his will is admissible to prove what were the contents of the will, but there is a series of authorities beginning with Doe. d. Shallcross v. Palmer in which it was laid down that such statements are inadmissible to prove the fact of execution, followed by In the Goods of Ripley, and these were approved in Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards by Cockburn, C.J. In the face of that sequence of authority it is not possible to say that the fact of the execution of a will can be proved by hearsay evidence. It would not be evidence at all, therefore there has been no rejection of evidence in this case.

SIMMONS v. BLANDY. (a.)

Mortgage—Foreclosure—Receiver—Form of order.

The form of order in a foreclosure action where a receiver has been appointed should charge the mortgagees with all the rents and profits in the hands of the receiver at the date of the chief clerk's certificate, and also "with such a sum, if any, as they submit to be charged with," in respect of rents and profits coming to the receiver's hands between the dates of the certificate and foreclosure absolute.

Motion for judgment in default of appearance in a foreclosure action.

By indentures dated the 1st of March, 1893, and the 19th of May, 1896, certain leasehold premises and a baker's business were mortgaged to the plaintiffs.

The writ was issued on the 14th of October, 1896, and on the 16th of November, 1896, an order was made appointing a receiver.

Tanner, for the plaintiffs, asked for judgment in the form given Seton, p. 2142.

NORTH, J., said he did not see why the plaintiffs should only be charged with "such a sum, if any, as they submit to be charged with" in respect of rent and profits in the receiver's hand at the date of the chief clerk's certificate. He thought they should be charged with the whole of such rents and profits as a matter of course. If the order were made in the form asked, the plaintiffs might not submit to be charged anything in respect of such rents and profits, and if no further rents and profits came to the receiver's hands after the date of the certificate, they would get the whole of the rents and profits, as well as their interest, up to the date fixed for foreclosure absolute. The plaintiffs must in any event allow the deduction of "such sum as shall be in the receiver's hands at the date of the chief clerk's certificate," and they must also allow the deduction of "such a sum, if any, as the plaintiffs shall submit to be charged with in respect of rents and profits to come into the receiver's hands prior to the order for foreclosure absolute." The registrar would settle the form of order.

CHANDLER v. BRADLEY. (a.)

Settled Land—Tenant for life—Payment to tenant for life to secure concurrence in lease—Fine—Best rent—Fraud or power—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 4, 6, 7, 45, 53, 54—Settled Land Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 18), ss. 3, 4, 6—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 7.

Where a payment was made to a tenant for life to induce him to grant a lease, and no notice of either the payment or the lease was given to the trustees of the settlement,

Held, that the payment was in the nature of a bribe and not of a fine, and that the liability of the lessee was not limited to indemnifying the remaindermen to the amount of the sum so paid to the tenant for life, but that the lease itself was void.

This was an action by the trustees of the will of Elizabeth Chandler for a declaration that a lease of part of the trust property granted to the defendant by James Chandler, the husband of the testatrix, who was tenant for life under the will, was void against the plaintiffs, and to recover possession of the demised property. By her will dated the 11th of August, 1864, the testatrix, under a power of appointment, appointed and devised to her husband James Chandler during his life certain freehold property at Epsom. After his death this property was given to trustees upon trusts for sale and division among the children of the testatrix. The testatrix died in 1866 and her husband survived till 1895. Previously to 1892 he mortgaged his life interest under the will to the Mutual Life Assurance Society, who entered into possession as mortgagees. Part of the freehold property at Epsom consisted of a dwelling-house known as "The Retreat," with a paddock and garden. This adjoined other property (not devised by the testatrix's will) where the defendant carried on business as a brewer. The house became vacant about Midsummer, 1891, and was left in a bad state of repair. It was placed in the hands of some house agents at Epsom, and in 1892 the defendant wrote to the house agent proposing either to become the purchaser or to take it for seven years certain provided it was put in thorough repair. This led to negotiations between the defendant and Mr. Manley, the actuary of the insurance company. On the 18th of March, 1892, Mr. Manley wrote to the defendant: "I understood from Mr. Wrightman that he had explained to you that as we shall have to give up possession on the death of Mr. James Chandler, sen., we are not in a position to treat for the sale of the property, nor do we feel justified in spending any large sum of money in putting it in repair, but that we could grant a lease for seven years at a very moderate rental to anyone who would undertake to put it in repair."

After some further correspondence Mr. Manley again wrote to the defendant on the 23rd of March, 1892: "I have consulted with our solicitor to-day and find that our position is a very peculiar one. Individually we are unable to grant a lease for a longer time than the life of Mr. James Chandler, sen., but that if Mr. Chandler will join we can jointly grant you a lease. Could you approach Mr. Chandler with the view of getting him to join?"

On the 24th of March, 1892, the defendant wrote to Mr. Manley: "Mr. James Chandler is in London at 211, High Holborn, but I can see Mr. Frank Chandler. I expect the only way to induce Mr.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

Chandler to join with you in granting a lease would be by means of a consideration, as I know that would be welcome. Would you be prepared to do this if I come to terms with him?"

On the same day Mr. Manley replied: "I thank you for the address of Mr. James Chandler, sen., and I will endeavour to induce him to grant a lease. I cannot offer him a consideration, as that might possibly vitiate the lease."

Ultimately Mr. Chandler consented to join in granting a lease, and the mode in which his consent was obtained was thus stated by the defendant in his evidence in chief: "I spoke to Mr. Frank Chandler to ask his father if he would sign the lease. He came a morning or two after and said his father was quite willing to sign the lease; but he thought I ought to give him something for himself. . . . I asked Frank Chandler what his father wanted. He said his father thought he ought to have twenty guineas. I said rather than go without the lease I will give him twenty guineas."

A lease was afterwards prepared by the solicitors for the insurance company and sent to the defendant, who read it through and returned it. The lease was then engrossed and sent to the defendant, who gave it to Mr. Frank Chandler, to procure his father's execution of it. Mr. F. Chandler brought it to the defendant executed; and he thereupon gave him a cheque for £21, payable to bearer. The cheque was handed to James Chandler, who cashed it, and applied the money to his own use. The lease was dated the 27th of April, 1892, and purported to be granted by the insurance company at the request of James Chandler, and by James Chandler "under and by virtue of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and as tenant for life under the will of Elizabeth Chandler," for a term of seven years from the 24th of June, 1892, in consideration of the rent thereby reserved, and the covenants on the part of the lessee therein contained. The rent reserved was £25, and one of the covenants on the part of the lessee was within six calendar months from the 24th of June, 1892, to lay out and expend the sum of £100 in executing, to the satisfaction of the surveyor of the insurance company, repairs and improvements to the demised premises, including certain repairs and improvements specified in a schedule to the lease. In pursuance of this covenant repairs and improvements were in fact executed to an amount of over £200. The defendant and Mr. Manley swore that the letting was on the best terms that could be obtained; and there was no evidence given that a higher rent could have been obtained from any person other than the defendant.

In 1883 two persons were appointed trustees of the will of the testatrix for the purposes of the Settled Land Act. One only of these was still living: he was called as a witness, and stated that he never heard of the payment of twenty guineas to the tenant for life. It was admitted that some at least of the children of the testatrix did not hear of it.

The question was whether, under these circumstances, the lease was good.

Grosvenor Woods, Q.C., and Dighton N. Pollock, for the plaintiffs.—It is not suggested that a tenant for life as such has any power to grant a lease except by virtue of the Settled Land Acts. Here the trustees were not communicated with. It may be said that this case falls within section 7 of the Act of 1890; but looking at the definition of a fine in section 2, sub-section 10 (2) of the Act of 1882, and section 3 of the Act of 1890, we have here a fine within the meaning of the Acts, and therefore section 7 of the Act of 1890 cannot apply. If the payment is to be regarded as a fine it should have been paid to the trustees. A tenant for life cannot grant, and a lessee cannot take, a lease where there is a fine without the concurrence of the trustees of the settlement: Settled Land Act, 1882, ss. 2 (7) (9) and (10), 6, 7 (2), 21, 22, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 45, 53, 54; Settled Land Act, 1884, ss. 3 and 4; Duke of Marlborough v. Sartoris, 35 W. R. 55, 32 Ch. D. 616. There is a distinction between a contract for a lease and the grant of a lease. A contract does not require notice to be given to the trustees, but a grant does, Hatten v. Russell, 36 W. R. 317, 38 Ch. D. 334; Mogridge v. Clapp, 40 W. R. 663, [1892] 3 Ch. 382; Hughes v. Fanagan, 30 L. R. Ir. 111, 40 W. R. Dig. 228. It is a condition precedent that if there is a lease with a fine or a sale, notice must be given to the trustees. The powers of the tenant for life must be consistent with the protection of the corpus of the estate: Dowager Duchess of Sutherland v. Duke of Sutherland, 42 W. R. 12, [1893] 3 Ch. 169. If the tenant for life has got anything for himself under a lease it cannot be supported as against the remainderman as a lease at the best possible rent: Sugden on Powers, 8th ed., 785; Dyas v. Cruise, 2 Jo. & Lat. 460, at p. 482.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Micklem, for the defendant.—The Settled Land Acts do not preclude a fine being taken. There is no authority for saying that if a fine is not paid to the trustees or into court the lease is bad. If the lessee has paid the fine to the wrong person it may have to be paid over again to the remainderman: Mogridge v. Clapp. The evidence shows that the remaindermen were not damnified in the least degree, so that if it were not a fine the lease ought to stand, the defendant having acted bonâ fide and the best possible rent obtained. [STIRLING, J.—Chandler being in the position of a trustee under the settlement, can a lease executed in consideration of a payment to a trustee be good as against the cestui que trust?] Yes, if the remaindermen do not incur a loss. Duke of Marlborough v. Sartoris and Hatten v. Russell were both actions for specific performance, and the defence raised was that the plaintiffs had not complied with the provisions of the Act. To set aside a transaction which is completed is very different from a case where the vendor asks the court to enforce the transaction. Mogridge v. Clapp is in favour of the defendant. Hughes v. Fanagan is also treated by Hood and Challis (4th ed., p. 265) as an action for specific performance, and the observations of the Master of the Rolls in the beginning of his judgment in that case bear this out. We acted in good faith, and are therefore within section 45 (3) of the Settled Land Act, 1882; then the lease is good. [Grosvenor Woods, Q.C., referred to Sugden on Powers, 8th ed., p. 782.] That passage only bears on the question whether the best rent was obtained. In this case that is admitted. If we were parties to a breach of trust we can only be made to indemnify the remaindermen.

Grosvenor Woods, Q.C., in reply.—This is a lease granted under a power, and it is necessary to prove that the lease was executed in bonâ fide exercise of the power. Here everything points to the contrary. I submit that the lease is void as a fraud on the power.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 12.—STIRLING, J., after stating the facts, continued: First, what was the nature of this payment of twenty guineas? I think it was a payment to an impecunious man, intended for his personal benefit, and made with a view to inducing him to execute the lease.

Secondly, does the law permit such a payment? By section 53 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, a tenant for life, in exercising any power under the Act, is to have regard to the interest of all parties entitled under the settlement, and is, in relation to the exercise thereof by him, to be deemed to be in the position and to have the duties and liabilities of a trustee for those parties. In this transaction, therefore, James Chandler was in the position of a trustee for the other beneficiaries under the will, and subject to all the liabilities of a trustee. No rule is clearer than that a trustee may not derive a personal benefit from his position as trustee; and it was therefore improper on his part to accept, and on the part of the defendant to make, any such payment.

The defendant stated in his evidence that he did not know the provisions of the Settled Land Act, and had no legal advisers, and that the payment was not meant as a bribe. He knew that the lease was to be granted under that Act, for it appeared on the face of the draft lease submitted to him. He therefore had constructive notice of the fiduciary position of James Chandler. But more than that, the same draft told him that James Chandler was tenant for life, and he knew that the reason why the insurance company could not grant a lease for seven years was that their interest came to an end with the life of James Chandler.

The object of procuring James Chandler to join was to prevent the lease coming to an end with his life; and these circumstances ought, as it seems to me, to have brought home to the mind of the defendant, if he reflected on the matter at all, that James Chandler, in granting the lease, was dealing with property which was not his own, and that to the other owners of that property he must of necessity stand in a fiduciary position. But the matter does not rest even there. Mr. Manley's letter of the 24th of March, 1892, informed him that a payment to Chandler might vitiate the lease. When he was asked as to this, he said that he thought the risk arising from such a payment only affected the insurance company. I confess that I distrust that explanation, coming as it does from a defendant who, in answer to interrogatories sworn in January, 1896, said this: "The said cheque was not given as an inducement for the said James Chandler to grant the lease, or as part of the consideration therefor, but was a present made by me to the said James Chandler, who was then without means"—a statement entirely inconsistent with the defendant's evidence at the trial, and admitted by himself to be incorrect. Further, he made no inquiry (as any prudent man would have done) either of Mr. Manley or the solicitor of the insurance company as to what the nature of the risk was; and if he did not know the impropriety of the payment, then, in my opinion, he deliberately shut his eyes, and took his chance of what the consequences might be. I think, therefore, that this case must be dealt with on the footing of his having made an improper payment to James Chandler to induce him to grant the lease. If, then, the case is to be regarded as governed by the ordinary law applicable to dealings with trustees and other persons in a fiduciary position, I apprehend that the transaction could not stand as against the persons now beneficially entitled, and the court, in giving them relief, could not enter into the question whether or not they were damnified by what had been done.

It is said, however, that under the provisions of the Settled Land Acts the liability of the defendant is limited to that of paying to the trustees who have been appointed for the purposes of that Act the £21 which was paid to James Chandler.

The argument is put in this way: section 7, sub-section 2 of the Act of 1882 authorizes the granting of leases in consideration of a fine, which by section 4 of the Act of 1884, is to be deemed capital money arising under the Act, and consequently, by section 22 of the Act of 1882, is to be paid either into court or to the trustees of the settlement. It is said that this sum of £21 ought to be regarded as a fine, and that on this footing the lease must be regarded as valid. It is admitted that the fine was not paid either into court or to the trustees; but it is said that the defendant did not know of the existence of the trustees, and is entitled to rely on the protection conferred by section 45, sub-section 3, and section 54 of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

Reliance was also placed on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Mogridge v. Clapp, where a lease granted by a tenant for life who purported to demise as absolute owner was upheld, the lease being one which could have been granted under the Settled Land Act, 1882, and the lessee having acted in good faith.

[His lordship then read from the judgments of Lindley, L.J., from: "Even if the plaintiff had known that there were no trustees, it would not follow that his title would be bad . . . powers under the Settled Land Act"; and of Kay, L.J., from: "It might be said that he was not dealing in good faith with the tenant for life. . . . However, it is not necessary to give a decided opinion on this point, because I do not think that the lessee in this case had either knowledge or notice such as to make his acceptance of the lease a dealing not in good faith with the lessor."]

Now, if the £21 had been really agreed upon between the defendant and James Chandler as the proper amount of a fine for the granting of the lease, and some bonâ fide mistake had been made as to the proper mode of paying it, it may be that these sections of the statute and the observations of the Lords Justices would apply. I take a different view of the facts. The £21 was never intended, either by the defendant or Chandler, to be a fine constituting capital money under the Acts; it was from first to last intended by both to be a payment for the benefit of James Chandler personally, and of no one else. Further, I am unable to come to the conclusion that the defendant acted in good faith—as it is put by Kay, L.J., that he acted in the belief that everything was being regularly and properly done. On the contrary, I think he knew that he was engaged in a transaction attended with risk, and took the chance of the result. In my judgment, therefore, the clauses of the Settled Land Act, 1882, to which I referred, do not protect the defendant. This being so, section 7, sub-section (2), of the Settled Land Act, 1882, provides that every lease shall reserve the best rent that can reasonably be obtained, regard being had to any fine taken and to any money laid out or to be laid out for the benefit of the settled land, and generally to the circumstances of the case. I have already said that the £21 paid to James Chandler is not to be regarded as a fine within the meaning of the Settled Land Act. It follows that the best rent has not been obtained, for I think that the same test is to be applied as in the case of a lease under a power; and, as is laid down in the case of the Queensbury Leases, cited in Sugden on Powers, 8th ed., p. 785, "there is but one criterion which our courts always attend to as a leading criterion in discussing the question whether the best rent has been got or not—that is, whether the man who makes the lease has got as much for others as for himself; if he has got more for himself than for others, that is decisive evidence against him."

In my judgment, therefore, the lease is not such as is authorized by the Settled Land Acts, and is void against the plaintiffs.

PETTY v. TAYLOR. (a.)

Copyright—Registration—Validity—Literary Copyright Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45), ss. 13, 24—Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 68), ss. 1-4.

The managing director of a limited company, having prepared the letterpress of a trade catalogue, ordered two drawings to illustrate it to be made by a firm of lithographers. The drawings were made and were paid for and used by the company. The managing director was registered as proprietor of the copyright in the drawings under the Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862, s. 4, and of the copyright in the catalogue under the Literary Copyright Act, 1842, s. 13. There was no entry of any agreement in writing vesting the copyrights in him. The managing director and the company having brought an action as co-plaintiffs to restrain an alleged infringement of the copyrights,

Held, that the managing director had acted throughout only as the nominee of the company; that he was not a trustee for the company, and was not, therefore, in fact, proprietor of the copyrights under either of the Copyright Acts; and that the registrations were bad.

Held, further, that, assuming the managing director to be entitled to be registered as proprietor of the letterpress of the catalogue, the drawings illustrating it would not be protected by such registration.

Held, therefore, that although the company, who were in fact the proprietors of the copyrights, were joined as co-plaintiffs, the action was not sustainable, because the company were not registered as the proprietors.

In 1895 Wesley Petty, who was the managing director of a printing and publishing company called Petty & Sons (Limited), having prepared a certain trade catalogue advertising clothing entitled "The Art and Virtue of Dressing Well," gave an order to a firm of printers and lithographers called Taylor & Winterbottom to produce two drawings of gentlemen attired in Chesterfield coats in order to illustrate the catalogue.

This order was executed by Taylor & Winterbottom, who, having employed an artist to design the drawings, engraved them.

The drawings were paid for and used by Petty & Sons (Limited) in their business.

The "Art and Virtue of Dressing Well" was registered in July, 1893, under the Literary Copyright Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45), and the two drawings of gentlemen in Chesterfield coats illustrating the catalogue were registered on the 31st of October, 1895, under the Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 68), all in the name of Wesley Petty as proprietor of the copyright, but there was no entry of any agreement in writing vesting the copyright in him.

This was an action commenced on the 5th of November, 1895, by Wesley Petty and Petty & Sons (Limited), as co-plaintiffs, against Taylor & Winterbottom and William Blackburn & Co., clothiers, to restrain an alleged infringement of the copyrights and for penalties and damages.

(a.) Reported by C. C. HENSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

The plaintiffs in their statement of claim alleged that Petty & Sons (Limited) were beneficially interested in the copyrights and entitled to the property in the works, and that Wesley Petty was registered as proprietor of the copyrights for and on behalf of Petty & Sons (Limited).

The defendants in the defence alleged that Wesley Petty was not in fact the proprietor of the copyrights, either on behalf of the plaintiff company or otherwise, and that the registration was therefore invalid and the action not sustainable.

The Literary Copyright Act, 1842, s. 13, provides that: "It shall be lawful for the proprietor of copyright in any book . . . to make entry in the registry book of the Stationers' Co. of the title of such book, the time of the first publication thereof, the name and place of abode of the publisher thereof and the name and place of abode of the proprietor of the copyright of such book . . . and it shall be lawful for every such registered proprietor to assign his interest . . . therein by making entry in the said book of registry of such assignment and of the name and place of abode of the assignee . . ," and section 24 provides that no proprietor of copyright shall sue for any infringement before making entry in the book of registry.

The Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862, s. 4, provides that: "There shall be kept at the hall of the Stationers' Co. . . . a book or books . . . wherein shall be entered a memorandum of every copyright to which any person shall be entitled under this Act, and also of every subsequent assignment of any such copyright; and such memorandum shall contain a statement of the date of such agreement or assignment, and of the names of the parties thereto, and of the name and place of abode of the person in whom such copyright shall be vested by virtue thereof and of the name and place of abode of the author of the work in which there shall be such copyright . . . and no proprietor of any such copyright shall be entitled to the benefit of this Act until such registration, and no action shall be sustainable nor any penalty be recoverable in respect of anything done before registration."

Warrington, Q.C., and Israel Davis, for the plaintiffs.—We are entitled to be protected under both the Copyright Acts. The Fine Arts Copyright Act, by s. 1, defines the proprietor of copyright in any drawing to be: (1) The author; (2) any person for whom the drawing is made for good or valuable consideration; (3) any vendor or assignee, provided that there is an agreement in writing disposing of the copyright before the time of any such disposition. The drawings were made for Wesley Petty for valuable consideration, and in such a case no assignment in writing is necessary, he is therefore the proprietor of the copyright in them, and is properly registered as such, and is trustee for Petty & Sons (Limited): London Printing and Publishing Alliance v. Cox, [1891] 3 Ch. 291; 40 W. R. Dig. 61; Nottage v. Jackson, 32 W. R. 106, 11 Q. B. D. 627; Wooderson v. Raphael Tuck, 4 Times L. R. 57; Melville v. Mirror of Life Co., [1895] 2 Ch. 531; 44 W. R. Dig. 45.

Renshaw, Q.C., Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and Errington, for the defendants William Blackburn & Co.—It is not right to claim copyright under two different Acts in the same work. The drawings were made for Petty & Sons (Limited), not for Wesley Petty, he only acted as nominee for his company. There is no assignment to him. He is not, therefore, the proprietor of the copyright, and is improperly registered as such. He cannot, therefore, sue, and the co-plaintiffs, Petty & Sons (Limited), who are the proprietors, not having been registered, also cannot sue.

Dibdin, for the defendants Taylor & Co.

Warrington, Q.C., in reply.—Wesley Petty is the author of the letterpress in the catalogue, "The Art and Virtue of Dressing Well," and is properly registered as such under the Literary Copyright Act, 1842. We contend that this registration should be held to cover the drawings contained in the catalogue: Grace v. Newman, 23 W. R. 517, 19 Eq. 623.

KEKEWICH, J., after considering the evidence in the case, continued as follows: On the question of law I have already said I have only to decide one point. I should not have limited myself to that one point but for this, that it seems to me that sooner or later I must decide that point: I cannot avoid deciding it; if I decide all the others, and all the questions of fact into the bargain, I must decide this one point; and if I decide it, as I propose to do, against the plaintiffs, there is not the slightest reason why I should decide any other, because it is fatal. Therefore it seems to me I am better discharging my duty by deciding that one point only. That point is this. Both as regards the Literary Copyright Act and the Fine Art Copyright Act—that is to say, the statutes 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 68, Mr. Wesley Petty is registered as the proprietor of the copyright. Each statute provides that the proprietor of the copyright shall be registered, and that there shall be noted on the register the name and place of abode of the proprietor. In each case Mr. Wesley Petty is entered as the proprietor of the copyright. If as a matter of fact he was not the proprietor, then as there is no one else registered, there is no entry of the proprietor, and therefore there is no valid registration. I have not heard any argument on the point mentioned by Mr. Davis, that the plaintiffs have a case independent of registration. I assume they are dependent on registration, and the registration failing the case fails also. The action is brought by Mr. Wesley Petty, and Petty & Sons (Limited) as co-plaintiffs, and it is in my opinion the fact that Petty & Sons (Limited) are the proprietors, but they are not registered.

Now it seems to me decided, and it is perfectly clear, if I may venture to say so with respect to a judgment of a learned Lord Justice even without decision, that you cannot make a combination of two persons, neither of whom is entitled to sue, and so make a person who is entitled to sue. In the case of the London Printing and Publishing Alliance v. Cox Fry, L.J., puts it in this way: "I have no doubt whatever that a trustee in whom a copyright is vested may be registered as the owner, and may sue in that character, but it is impossible for one person to be the owner and another person to be on the register, and for those two persons successfully to sue." If the view which I come to is right, that Petty & Sons (Limited) are the proprietors, and Wesley Petty is not the proprietor, then you have exactly the case which the Lord Justice put. You cannot have the owner coming with another person on the register, and those two persons combining to make a good plaintiff. That is the view of the Lord Justice, and is mine also. So I get rid at once of any possible status given to a bad plaintiff by the conjunction with another. If either is a good plaintiff, the conjunction with a bad plaintiff would in these modern days not matter. The question is, Is Mr. Wesley Petty the proprietor? To my mind the question is precisely the same on both Acts. Mr. Warrington has endeavoured to separate them, and to say that they require different considerations, and it may be so, but it seems to me that the arguments which are applicable in one case are equally applicable in the other.

I will take the second Act first, and for this reason—that there is a point in which I entirely agree with Mr. Warrington's submission on that, which I think was not sufficiently attended to by the defendants, I mean that they did not attribute that importance to it that I do. I agree with the argument that under the first section of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 68 (Fine Arts Copyright Act) there are three different possible states of circumstances. Either the person who is the author, to speak shortly, may be the owner of the copyright; or the vendee or assignee from him may be the proprietor; or the proprietor of the copyright may be a person for and on whose behalf the work of art has been made or executed. If, therefore, I thought in this case that the proper conclusion from the facts was that this work of art was made or executed for or on behalf of Wesley Petty, I should consider that he was properly registered as the proprietor, notwithstanding that there is no agreement in writing entered on the register. The agreement in writing would be wanted if it was intended to reserve the copyright to the author as against a vendee or assignee. It would be wanted also if it was intended to vest that copyright in the vendee or assignee. It is not wanted, as I understand the meaning of the first section, where the copyright is vested in a person on whose behalf the work of art is made or executed. I thought, as that point was raised, it deserved attention, but I need say no more about it.

It is the fourth section on which the real point turns, and that provides that there shall be noted on the register the name and place of abode of the person in whom such copyright shall be vested. Now, who is the registered proprietor of the copyright? It is Mr. Wesley Petty. I am dealing now only, for the moment, with the drawing of the two figures. Wesley Petty is the managing director of Petty & Sons (Limited). It is quite immaterial to me that before the incorporation of the company he carried on business by himself, though I observe, of course, that it is that old practice before the incorporation which has led to the present dilemma. That is immaterial. He was throughout all these transactions the managing director and manager, the active man and representative of Petty & Co. (Limited). He is minded to have produced for publication in the proper way in the course of business two figures. His firm print; they, as a rule, do not do anything more than print. They therefore employed the firm of Taylor & Co. to produce the figures which they wanted, the two figures which have been referred to so often —two gentlemen in different attitudes, clothed in Chesterfield coats. Taylor & Co. employed an artist to design the drawings. The exact relation of the artist to Taylor & Co. is, perhaps, not very clear, but he seems to be one whom Taylor & Co. from time to time employ, and I gather that Petty & Sons (Limited) not only knew Taylor & Co., but knew the artist. But he was merely a servant of Taylor & Co., who was employed by Wesley Petty, the managing director of Petty & Sons (Limited). It seems to me in common sense and according to the ordinary principles of law, you get established there without any difficulty or dispute, that Petty & Sons (Limited) acted through their agent in instructing Taylor & Co. Taylor & Co. executed the order through their agent, the artist, but that there was no employment by Wesley Petty in his individual, personal character, and that the artist (I should have said, though I am not deciding that point) was only the agent of Taylor & Co. If the thing was done for Wesley Petty in his own personal character, he never purported to give directions, or to pay a bill, or in any way throughout to do anything of any kind connected with this business, except in his character of representative of the incorporated company, Petty & Sons (Limited).

Then, it is said, he is trustee for the company. It is more easy sometimes to say that a man is a trustee than to explain how he is a trustee, or why, and this is an instance. In one sense he is trustee for the company. I have no doubt that if he can properly be held to be the proprietor of this copyright, he is a trustee of his proprietorship for the company. He cannot set up his own titles against his principals, and in that sense he is a trustee; but he is not a trustee in the sense that any legal ownership ever became vested in him. Copyright is a thing known to the law as capable of assignment, capable of acquisition by proper ways, different, of course, from those connected with real estate, but still a property to be acquired in a particular way; and there is nothing here to show that Wesley Petty ever acquired anything at all. He acted simply as the agent of others — namely, the incorporated company.

There is a passage in Lindley, L.J.'s, judgment in that case of London Printing and Publishing Alliance v. Cox, which I think worthy of notice on this point, though perhaps it does not necessarily decide it. He was considering there the relative position of Mr. Keep and the proprietors of Myra's Journal, and he was considering how far there had been an assignment by one to the other. He assumed there that Mr. Keep had the property vested in him when he wrote a certain letter of the 19th of April; and then he says: "It is contended that this letter amounted to an assignment of the copyright by Mr. Keep to Myra's Journal. If it did, then the proprietors of Myra's Journal were from the 19th of April the proprietors of the copyright; but the proprietors of Myra's Journal are not registered, and they cannot therefore maintain the action. If, on the other hand, that letter did not amount to an assignment of the copyright, then the copyright would remain with Mr. Keep as a trustee for the proprietors of Myra's Journal, and Mr. Keep being registered the action may be sustained so far as that point of form is concerned." Lindley, L.J., is there dealing with a case where there was undoubtedly a proprietor. Mr. Keep was originally the proprietor of the copyright. Had he or had he not assigned? If he had, what then? The proprietorship had passed. If he had not assigned it remained in him. But having started with one proprietor if you want to discover another you must find an assignment. There is no pretence for saying there is an assignment here. Wesley Petty did not acquire the copyright for himself, he acquired it merely as an agent. The result is, in my opinion, Wesley Petty has been wrongly entered as proprietor of this copyright, and on that ground the registration of the art copyright fails.

Now, then, I turn, and will only do it shortly, to the statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45 (Literary Copyright Act). To my mind the point is precisely the same; but Mr. Warrington made one point in reply which must be noticed, as purporting to distinguish it. In that statute the 13th section is the one in question, and there we get the very words—there is to be entered the name and place of abode of the owner of the copyright. In that case I think Mr. Wesley Petty occupied precisely the same position, he acted merely as an agent of Petty & Sons (Limited). Acting as their agent, as in the other case, he is the nominee of the company, but not the trustee. He is not the trustee, because he has nothing vested in him as trustee, no property. I fail to see myself anything that was ever acquired by him. But Mr. Warrington says there is this distinction: As regards the literary work, take this "Art and Virtue of Dressing Well." Mr. Wesley Petty prepared the letterpress, and the letterpress is a substantial part of the book; therefore he could register the book as having been the author of that, and properly registering that in his name that covers the figures which form part of the book. Now, I will assume in the plaintiffs' favour that Mr. Wesley Petty was the author of that book. I take it that there were some other books, but that is enough for my purpose, because that is one of the books that is registered, and I think the same applies to the others. At any rate, I will take the "Art and Virtue of Dressing Well." Mr. Petty was the author of the letterpress, and in that way the author of the book. Then he put into it these drawings, which, as I have already mentioned, were not his drawings, not produced by him, the copyright of which, if there is any copyright at all, is not vested in him. One sees the practical force of the difficulty raised by Mr. Renshaw that you cannot claim copyright in one and the same work under two different statutes and two different registrations, a point which may deserve much further consideration. I only refer to it in this connection. I only now seek to deal with Mr. Warrington's point, in support of which he cites Grace v. Newman. I am now reading from the headnote, but I have taken care to see that this conforms to the Vice-Chancellor's judgment there: "The plaintiff, a cemetery stonemason, employed and remunerated a person to collect monumental designs, and published a book containing sketches of such designs with scarcely any letterpress. Held, that the plaintiff had copyright in the book and was entitled to an injunction to restrain the publication of designs copied from it." If my view is right, Mr. Wesley Petty never employed or remunerated anyone. He did so in his character of agent, but not otherwise; and assuming him therefore to have been the author of the letterpress, the rest of the book, that is to say the figures, were not done for him, they were done for somebody else; and it seems to me monstrous to suppose, and I am sure Grace v. Newman does not support the hypothesis that a man in protecting his copyright in letterpress, supposing him to be entitled to it, can thereby protect an alleged copyright in works of art which are introduced into the letterpress, they being the works of other persons, the copyright of which is vested in those other persons, or at any rate in strangers to the literary author. I put to Mr. Warrington the not at all uncommon case of two persons jointly publishing a book, one supplying the letterpress and the other the illustrations. Of course they may make an agreement between themselves, as they probably will take care to do, but I cannot see my way to say that the man who is the author of the letterpress thereby becomes the author of the book including the illustrations so as to protect those illustrations. I cannot myself see why the position should not be equally reversed, and why the author of the pictures, the illustrations, should not protect them, and through them the letterpress of which he never wrote a word. That seems to reduce it to an absurdity; and I do not find anything in the Act or in the cases cited to aid me in supposing that any such conclusion is possible. I hold, as well under one Act as the other, that the name and place of abode of the proprietor of the copyright is not stated on the register, because the person there named is Wesley Petty, whereas it ought to have been Petty & Sons (Limited); and I hold that Wesley Petty cannot be registered as a trustee for Petty & Sons (Limited) so as to vest in him a title to sue on their behalf, because there is nothing of which he can be trustee, nothing being vested in him originally. The distinction between trustee and nominee is one which I have already noticed in giving judgment. I have only to say here, it seems to me a trustee may be registered and can sue with or without the concurrence of his cestui que trust; a nominee, it seems to me, cannot be properly registered, and if registered cannot sue, notwithstanding that the person by whom he has been nominated, on whose behalf he purports to have a copyright, is a co-plaintiff. The result is that the plaintiffs' case fails, and there must be judgment for the defendants with costs.

GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF THE ST. OLAVE'S UNION (Appellants) v. GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF THE CANTERBURY UNION (Respondents). (a.)

Poor law—Settlement—Derivative settlement—Residence — Computation of time — Period of residence as a patient in a hospital—Residence under sixteen apart from parent — Irremovability — Poor Removal Act, 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 66), s. 1—Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), s. 34.

A. had his home and residence in a parish from the 23rd of July, 1892, until his death on the 15th of April, 1896, but from the 1st of May to the 29th of July, 1895, he was a patient in a hospital and convalescent home outside the parish.

Held, that, by virtue of section 1 of the Poor Removal Act, 1846, the time during which A. was in the hospital must be excluded from the computation of his period of residence in the parish, and that he had not acquired a settlement in the parish under section 34 of the Divided Parishes, &c., Act, 1876.

Quære, whether a child under the age of sixteen who has lived in a parish apart from his only surviving parent for a period sufficient to confer upon him a settlement in that parish if he had been emancipated becomes irremovable upon the death of his father.

Case stated by the Recorder of Canterbury. The facts were as follows:

On the 1st of April, 1896, Edward James Farr, aged nine years, became chargeable to the respondent union.

On the 24th of April, 1896, an application was made to two of the justices of the city of Canterbury for an order for the removal of the pauper from the respondent union to the appellant union, and an order was that day made on such application adjudging the pauper to be legally settled in the parish of Rotherhithe in the appellant union. From this order the appellants appealed.

The pauper was the lawful son of Arthur Farr and Ellen Farr, and was born on the 1st of April, 1887, at New Cross, in the Greenwich union.

Ellen Farr died on the 22nd of June, 1888, and shortly after her death, Arthur Farr, the father, being of opinion that his children would be better cared for in the country in the charge of female relations who were desirous of having them, sent the pauper, who was then about one year old, to live with an aunt at Ashford, in the county of Kent, out of the appellant union.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The pauper lived at Ashford with his aunt until 1889, when he was taken charge of by another aunt, Mrs. Barker, and lived with her in the parish of St. Mary, Bredin, in the respondent union until he was sent to the respondents' workhouse.

Arthur Farr never intended that the absence of the pauper should be permanent, nor did he ever abandon or relinquish his right as father to the custody and control of the child, nor did either of the aunts take the permanent charge of the pauper.

During the whole of the time the pauper lived in the respondent union with his aunt, Mrs. Barker, Arthur Farr never contributed anything towards his maintenance, clothing, or education. The Barkers were in comfortable circumstances, and never desired that he should so contribute. Arthur Farr only saw his son once during this period, when the child was brought to London for the day on a visit.

On the 23rd of July, 1892, Arthur Farr remarried, and on the same day went to live in the parish of St. Mary, Rotherhithe, in the appellant union, not having previously resided there. From that time until his death he continued to have his residence and home in the appellant union.

On the 1st of May, 1895, Arthur Farr was admitted into the Brompton Hospital for Consumption, situate outside the appellant union, where he remained until the end of June. He then went to a convalescent home in connection with the said hospital at Sandgate (also outside the appellant union), where he remained until the 29th of July, 1895, when he returned to his home in the appellant union and remained there until his death on the 15th of April, 1896.

Arthur Farr went to the hospital intending to return to his home in the appellant union as soon as he was well enough to do so. During his temporary absence his wife remained in his house where his said home was kept together by means of an allowance which his employer made to him.

In March, 1896, Mrs. Barker wrote to Arthur Farr requesting him to take the pauper back.

Arthur Farr was then too ill to reply. His wife wrote for him stating that he was desirous of having his boy back, but was unable to do so owing to his illness. On receipt of this reply Mr. Barker sent Edward James Farr to the respondents' workhouse on the 1st of April, 1896.

The appellants contended: (1) That the pauper had resided from April, 1889, until the 1st of April, 1895, in the respondent union under such circumstances that he had thereby at the date of the application for the order of removal acquired a status of irremovability in his own right in the respondent union as his actual bodily residence for the period and under the circumstances above mentioned came within and satisfied section 1 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, and the amending statutes 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, s. 1, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 55, s. 1, and 28 & 29 Vict. c. 79, s. 8.

(2) That Arthur Farr, the father of the pauper, had not acquired a settlement by his residence in the appellant union at the time of his death by reason of his absence from that union during the months of May, June, and July under the circumstances above mentioned.

It was contended for the respondents: (1) That the pauper being under the age of sixteen took the settlement of his father and had not acquired a settlement in his own right and was removable.

(2) That the father had acquired a settlement in the appellant union.

On these facts the recorder held (1) that Arthur Farr had acquired a settlement in the appellant union; and (2) that the pauper had not become irremovable in the respondents' union, and he confirmed the order for removal.

Macmorran, Q.C. (Harper with him), for the appellants.—The father of the pauper never acquired a settlement in the parish of Rotherhithe. The residence referred to in section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, must be consecutive: Dorchester Union v. Weymouth Union, 16 Q. B. D. 31, 34 W. R. Dig. 135. Under section 1 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, all the time during which the father was in hospital must be excluded in the computation of his period of residence, and consequently he never resided in the parish of Rotherhithe for three years within the meaning of the Act of 1876. At the time when the removal order was made the father of the pauper was dead: at that time the pauper had resided in the respondent union a sufficient time to acquire a status of irremovability, and although being under sixteen years old, he could not become irremovable during his father's lifetime, on the death of the father he at once became irremovable: this view is not inconsistent with West Ham Union v. St. Matthew, Bethnal Green, 42 W. R. 573, [1894] A. C. 230, and is supported by the observations of Halsbury, L.C., in Highworth and Swindon Union v. Westbury-on-Severn Union, 38 W. R. 295, 14 App. Cas. 465, at p. 480.

Hohler and Joseph, for the respondents.—As to the settlement of the father, while he was in hospital his residence remained in Rotherhithe, and that is sufficient to satisfy section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876. The words in 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1, referring to a hospital must be read as "confined as a patient in a hopital," and the father's absence in hospital was voluntary, and cannot be described as a confinement. The West Ham case shows conclusively that the pauper could not, by reason of his age, acquire a settlement in his own right.

WRIGHT, J.—I think that the appellants are right on the question of the settlement of the father. This question is not easy, and it really turns entirely upon the meaning of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1. It is conceded that the father resided a sufficient time in the parish of Rotherhithe in the appellant union to give him a status of irremovabilty and a settlement in that parish, unless the period of his residence in the hospital and convalescent home ought to be struck out from the computation. That depends on whether he was a patient in a hospital within the meaning of the Act to which I have referred. I say it depends upon that because we are bound by the Dorchester case to hold that in order that a settlement by residence may be acquired under section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, there must have been a residence for three consecutive years under such conditions in each year as would have created a status of irremovability. Now, the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1, enacts that "the time during which a person shall be a prisoner in a prison, or shall be serving her Majesty as a soldier, &c., or shall be confined in a lunatic asylum or house duly licensed or hospital registered for the reception of lunatics, or as a patient in a hospital, or during which any such person shall receive relief from any parish, &c., shall for all purposes be excluded in the computation of time" in which irremovability is required. The section is very clumsily expressed; grammatically it must be read "confined as a patient in a hospital," but the whole clause is so badly drawn that I do not think we are obliged to say that that is the meaning unless that gives a reasonable construction. I do not think that such a construction is reasonable. It appears to me that the whole policy of this provision is that from the period of residence which is sufficient to confer a status of irremovability is to be excluded all time during which the person has not been maintaining himself. Taking the words to mean, as I think they do, that the period during which the person is a patient in a hospital is to be excluded, it is clear that in this case the time during which the father of the pauper was in the hospital must be excluded, and therefore that the requirements of the Dorchester case were not fulfilled by him. His conditions of residence were not such during each year of residence as to create a status of irremovability from the appellant union. The other point which was argued is one of greater difficulty, and our decision on the first point makes it unnecessary to consider it. But I think that if Mr. Macmorran had been wrong upon the point which we have decided in his favour, he could not have succeeded on the other point. It is difficult to see how this child, who never had an emancipated residence of his own in the respondent union, can be regarded as having acquired a status of irremovability in that union by virtue of his physical residence in it during his father's lifetime.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I find it almost impossible to give a grammatical meaning to the words of section 1 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66. The only meaning I can give it is that the period of residence in a hospital as a patient is to be excluded from the computation of time.

Q. B. Div. (Wills and Wright, JJ.) — Dec. 10.

GOODLOCK v. COUSINS. (a.)

County court — Judgment debt — Execution — Sale by bailiff—Title of purchaser—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 156.

In the event of goods being seized in execution under a judgment of the county court, the bailiff is bound by section 156 of the County Courts Act, 1888, to sell the goods if the claimant does not comply with any one of the three conditions laid down in that section, and a valid title to such goods is conferred upon the purchaser, although the claimant may afterwards prove that he had at the time of the sale a good title to them.

This was an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of his Honour Judge Ellicott at the County Court, Cheltenham.

The action was brought to recover damages for wrongful conversion. The plaintiff was residing with his son, who kept an inn, and during his stay there judgment was obtained against the son for money due, and execution was levied. Among the goods seized were certain articles belonging to the plaintiff. Upon the seizure the plaintiff gave notice of claim to his goods pursuant to ord. 27, r. 1, of the County Court Rules, and upon this the bailiff gave the plaintiff the notice requiring deposit for value or security, which notice the plaintiff failed to comply with. The bailiff thereupon, in the presence of the plaintiff, sold the goods by auction, and the defendant became the purchaser.

The plaintiff, who was able to prove his claim to the goods on the interpleader summons, then brought this action against the purchaser of the goods.

The learned judge found as a fact that the articles claimed belonged to the plaintiff, but that the defendant had no notice of this, and that the sale gave no title to the purchaser. He assessed their value and the damages for their detention at £20 15s., and gave judgment for the plaintiff for that amount.

From this judgment the defendant now appealed.

Section 156 of the County Courts Act, 1888, provides that "where any claim shall be made to or in respect of any goods taken in execution under the process of the court, the claimant may deposit with the bailiff either the amount of the value of the goods claimed . . . or the sum which the bailiff shall be allowed to charge as costs for keeping possession of such goods . . . or may give to the bailiff in the prescribed manner security for the value of the goods claimed; and in default of the claimant so doing the bailiff shall sell such goods as if no such claim had been made, and shall pay into court the proceeds of such sale to abide the decision of the judge."

Stroud, for the appellant.—The judge found that the sale by the bailiff gave no title to the purchaser; but the bailiff is compelled by section 156 to sell the goods unless the claimant complies with the conditions mentioned in that section. Such compulsory sale gives a good title to any purchaser for value.

Cranstoun, for the respondent.—The bailiff can only sell goods belonging to the debtor, and he can give no better title to them than the debtor had; therefore here the purchaser acquired no title: Davies v. Wise, 29 W. R. 804, 50 L. J. Q. B. 651; Chapman v. Speller, 19 L. J. Q. B. 239; Hills v. Renny, 29 W. R. 328, 5 Ex. D. 313.

Stroud, in reply.—The plaintiff made no claim at the time of the sale, though he was present. The section uses the words "the bailiff shall sell such goods." A good title is given by such sale, and a claimant is precluded from asserting his title: Death v. Harrison, L. R. 6 Ex. 15, 19 W. R. C. L. Dig. 40; Ex parte Villars, 22 W. R. 397, L. R. 9 Ch. 432; King v. England, 12 W. R. 308, 4 B. & S. 782.

WILLS, J.—This is a case of considerable importance, no doubt, and I should take time to consider my judgment if I thought there would be any advantage in doing so; but I do not think I should alter my mind if I did so. In my opinion the words "shall sell," in section 156, mean that there must be a sale in the ordinary sense of that word. Now, the sale in this case is brought within the very conditions mentioned in that section, and it is clear therefore that a statutory duty is imposed upon the bailiff, in default of any of the conditions mentioned in the section being carried out, to sell the goods themselves, and not merely the debtor's interest in them. It seems to me it would be contrary to the intention of the Legislature, and would be holding the Legislature up to contempt and ridicule if we were to say that the words "shall sell" mean that the bailiff shall sell only the liability to a law suit. It is a common practice under interpleader orders in this court for the sheriff to be ordered to sell the goods. The claimant can never follow the goods in such a case. The statute says the bailiff "shall sell," and that being so, he must sell the goods, and such a sale is a sale for all purposes. It would be nonsense to hold that he can sell the goods but can give no title to them.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion. I wish only to point out that in the case of Hills v. Renny it was not held that the claimant could recover from the purchaser. The court in that case declined to express an opinion upon that point.

Prob. Div. and Adm. Div. Divorce. } Jan. 25; Feb. 1.

BONSOR v. BONSOR. (a.)

Divorce—Permanent maintenance—Full inquiry on petition for alimony pendente lite*—Procedure—Husband's income—Voluntary allowance to husband.*

Where alimony pendente lite has been fixed after a full inquiry, the facts so elicited constitute the grounds on which the amount of permanent alimony or permanent maintenance should be determined; and,

Semble, if alimony pendente lite has been awarded, no evidence can be given on the application for permanent alimony or maintenance except to show alteration in means since the first inquiry.

In estimating the husband's income the court can take into calculation income to which he may have no legal claim.

In this case the court calculated in the respondent's income a monthly allowance made to him by his brother, to whom he was largely indebted, "so long as he remained out of the country."

Haviland v. Haviland, 11 W. R. 550, 3 Sw. & Tr. 114, considered.

Motion by the wife to vary the report of the registrar on her petition for permanent maintenance, and for an order that the respondent should pay her £250 per annum as permanent maintenance.

The wife's petition after alleging the marriage and its dissolution stated that on the 18th of October, 1895, she filed a petition for alimony pending suit, and that on the 17th of March, 1896, after a full inquiry into the means of the respondent an order was made that he should pay her alimony pending suit at the rate of £150 per annum, and then prayed relief.

The registrar submitted that the proper order would be for payment of £15 a month as permanent maintenance.

Jan. 25.—Willock, in support of the motion.—The registrar is bound by his finding on the petition for alimony pendente lite. The order then was for payment of £150; that should be a fifth of the respondent's income, which, therefore, must be taken to be £750, and the amount for permanent maintenance to which the wife is entitled is, following the rule, one-third of that sum, or £250. The registrar had no new evidence before him and the husband made no attempt to show that his income had altered since the exhaustive inquiry on the petition for alimony pendente lite.

Barnard, contra.—The respondent is not bound on this petition by the previous finding. It is usual in fixing permanent alimony to follow the findings on the petition for alimony pendente lite, but not so where there has been a divorce, then there must be a fresh inquiry; and on looking at the facts here the respondent has nothing, he is heavily in debt and has only a voluntary allowance from his brother, to whom also he is heavily in debt, and that cannot, therefore, be regarded as income: Haviland v. Haviland, 11 W. R. 550, 3 Sw. & Tr. 114. In the case of Clinton v. Clinton, 14 W. R. 545, L. R. 1 P. & D. 215, where the trustees had an absolute discretion to pay an amount included as income, and the court took steps to enforce their order, the order was in terms to pay so long as the trustees continue to pay.

Willock in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 1.—JEUNE, P., delivered the following written judgment: In this case there was a decree for dissolution on the petition of the wife, and on an application for permanent maintenance the learned registrar has reported: "The respondent has no means, and is indebted to his brother in the sum of about £18,000, who, nevertheless, allows the respondent the sum of £60 a month so long as he resides out of this country; the respondent is also indebted to other persons in various sums amounting together to about £1,700"; and the registrar has submitted that the respondent should be ordered to pay to the petitioner the sum of £15 a month. On a previous application for alimony pendente lite accounts were gone into, affidavits filed, and the respondent was cross-examined. There was practically no additional evidence on the application for permanent maintenance, but the registrar proceeded on the evidence given before him on the application for alimony pendente lite. This was in accordance with the practice, and, I think, quite right. There are authorities which seem to go as far as to show that if alimony pendente lite has been awarded, no evidence can be given on this application for permanent alimony except to show alteration in the husband's means; see Franks v. Franks, 31 L. J. P. & M. 25, 10 W. R. D. & M. Dig. 13, and Greenwood v. Greenwood, 32 L. J. P. & M. 136, 11 W. R. D. & M. Dig. 13. It certainly is the practice that when alimony pendente lite has been fixed, not by consent, but after a full inquiry, the facts so elicited constitute the grounds on which the amount of permanent alimony, or permanent maintenance, should be determined. The learned registrar has arrived at the sum of £15 a month by taking one-third of the husband's income of £60 a month and making a deduction in respect of the debt of £1,700. This, on an application for permanent maintenance, is, I think, a correct conclusion.

But it was argued before me that the husband's income of £60 a month is a voluntary allowance from his brother, and that, therefore, it ought not to be taken into account in fixing alimony, and reliance was placed on the case of Haviland v. Haviland. I reserved judgment because I wished to ascertain whether since the date of that case, incomes to which the recipients have no legal claim have been excluded. I am informed that they have not; on the contrary, they have in many instances been taken into calculation. Not only do I think it right that this should be so, but I can easily understand why Haviland v. Haviland has not been considered to forbid such a practice. It will be observed that in that case all that the learned judge said was: "It seems to me that I ought not to allow alimony in respect of the voluntary allowance made by the husband's mother in this case, but I do not mean to say that cases may not arise in which alimony may properly be awarded in respect of an annual income to which the husband has no strict legal right." Accordingly, in the case of Clinton v. Clinton, the court ordered and enforced a payment of permanent alimony where the sole income of the husband consisted of a rent-charge, with regard to the payment of which trustees had an absolute discretion; and, later, in the case of Moss v. Moss and Bush, 15 W. R. 532, the court ordered alimony pendente lite, though the husband's only income consisted of a voluntary allowance from his father, which had, in fact, been stopped since the commencement of the suit. It appears to me that, if once it be conceded that recourse may be had to incomes of which the recipient has no legal power to enforce the payment, it is impossible to draw any distinction in principle between one or another kind of such incomes. Nor can I see any reason why a wife on separation or divorce from her husband should not, in a proper case, have a share of any kind of income in the whole of which she would have participated as his wife. Injustice to the husband is prevented by the provisions in the Act which allow the maintenance to be reduced or suspended if his means of paying it fail.

The report of the registrar will therefore be confirmed, with costs.

SUDELEY (LORD) AND OTHERS v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL. (a.)

Inland revenue—Probate duty—Undistributed residuary estate of English testator—Residuary legatee—Foreign assets.

A domiciled Englishman who died in 1892 (by his will which was proved in England by his executors who had an English domicile) bequeathed one-fourth of his residuary estate to his wife, who died in 1893, before her husband's estate had been fully administered. The one-fourth of the husband's residuary estate included money invested upon mortgages of real estate in New Zealand, which had not been specifically transferred or appropriated to the wife's executors. The Crown claimed probate duty on the wife's one-fourth share in the New Zealand mortgage securities.

Held, that the right of the wife's executors was to have the administration of the husband's estate completed and to have one-fourth of the proceeds paid to them; that, consequently, the wife's interest in her husband's residuary estate was an English asset, and probate duty was payable in England by her executors on one-fourth of the value of the New Zealand mortgages.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 44 W. R. 340, [1896] 1 Q. B. 354, affirmed.

This was an appeal by the executors of Mrs. Tollemache from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lopes and Kay, L.JJ., Lord Esher, M.R., dissenting), 44 W. R. 340, [1896] Q. B. 354, reversing a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Charles, J.), reported 43 W. R. 700, [1895] 2 Q. B. 526.

The facts are given in the reports in the courts below, and sufficiently appear in Lord Herschell's judgment.

Channell, Q.C., Farwell, Q.C., and Bremner, for the appellants.—Probate duty depends in this case on what are foreign assets. If assets become a trust fund, then the duty depends on the domicile of the trustees. It is admitted that these assets of the husband were foreign assets; and the trustees were directed to retain these investments. If everything had been carried out there would have been such a trust fund. The form of the suit ought not to affect the question. If I was equitable owner of £20,000 Consols in the name of an honourable foreigner, the liability would not depend on his domicile. The question is, What estate and effects had Mrs. Tollemache at the time of her death? She had a right in respect of the property as distinguished from a mere personal right against the executors. If property abroad, she would have to bring her action abroad should trustees be wrongfully dealing with that property: Ewing v. Orr Ewing, 32 W. R. 573, 9 App. Cas. 34, 10 App. Cas. 453; Walsh v. Reg., [1894] A. C. 144, 42 W. R. Dig. 61; In the Goods of Ewing, 6 P. D. 19, 29 W. R. Dig. 474; Laidlay v. Lord Advocate, 15 App. Cas. 468, 39 W. R. Dig. 196. The right given is to a specific portion of each estate in the case of real property, and so here. The widow's executors have a right to have one-fourth of these assets transferred to them provided they are not needed for payment of debts—i.e., one-fourth of each particular asset. [Lord HALSBURY, C.—She had no claim on any specific property.]

They referred also to the judgment of Stirling, J., in Bulkeley v. Stephens, 44 W. R. 490, [1896] 2 Ch. 241; Howe v. Lord Dartmouth, 7 Ves. 137; and Dowsett v. Culver, [1892] 1 Ch. 210, 40 W. R. Dig. 89.

Sir R. Webster, A.G., Sir R. Finlay, S.G. (Vaughan Hawkins with them), for the respondent, were not called upon.

Lord HALSBURY, C.—I confess I think the length of this argument has been in a great measure due to the fallacious use of language as applicable to the rights of these parties. In a certain sense a person may have a claim; a person may be entitled to this, that, and the other; but it is to be observed here that the whole controversy turns upon the character of the particular thing to which the legatee is entitled. With reference to a great many things it would be quite true to say that she had an interest in these New Zealand mortgages; it would be quite true to say that she had a claim on them; in a loose and general way of speaking nobody would controvert or deny that that was a very fair exposition of what her interest was. But the moment you come to give a definite effect to the particular thing to which she becomes entitled under the will, that moment you must use strict language and see what it is to which the person is entitled, because upon that, in this case, depends the solution of the question whether or not the thing, the asset, that which is to be the subject of benefit to the legatee, is a foreign asset or an English asset. Therefore it is idle to use such phrases as your lordships have heard, I think for a very considerable time, that this was what the person was "entitled to," that she had an "interest" in this estate. All those phrases are perfectly true in a general way of speaking, but as to the particular discussion before your lordships they are inapplicable unless you establish as the starting-point the proposition that the thing that the legatee was entitled to was the actual mortgage itself, so that the New Zealand mortgage, the foreign asset, was the thing that was to be administered. Now I confess it seems to me, when one looks at it accurately, that that is an entire mistake. The thing to which the legatee was entitled was one-fourth share of a residuary estate consisting, it may be, of many things; and I think that it was fallacious on the part of Mr. Channell to say that the residue was very nearly ascertained, because the question is not only of amount—although I think that of itself would not be sufficient if it were only of amount—but it is the category of substance as well as the category of amount. It is uncertain until the residuary estate has been ascertained of what it will consist. It may consist of many things—it may consist of only a sum of money, and until that has been ascertained the actual right capable of instant assertion does not exist; and whether the character is that of executor or of trustee seems to me to be immaterial, because the legatee had no right to go and say, "I will have this or that part of the assets." If a trustee is to be the character filled, the cestui que trust has no right to apply to the trust fund until a trust fund has been constituted, and by the hypothesis the trust fund is not constituted. In this case the trustees and executors happen to be the same persons, but I think that Mr. Channell made the point clear by adopting the hypothesis of supposing that the executors and trustees had been different persons; here they happen to be the same persons, but in point of time it is the same. Until the thing has been ascertained, until the fund has been constituted, the thing of which the trustees are the trustees has not been ascertained. Whether you treat them therefore as trustees or executors, the same consideration arises.

Now, if the only thing that the legatee is entitled to is the fourth share of an ascertained residuary estate, I say that to my mind it is impossible to maintain that the character of any part of that estate can be ascertained so as to make it possess a specific locality until that has happened; it is a condition precedent to know what the residuary estate is, and until that has been ascertained you cannot tell of what it will consist. The right of the person to bring an action or to insist upon the performance of the trust may be one thing, but I want to know what the thing is, and until I ascertain that, and until the thing comes into existence, it appears to me that the question does not arise. If that is right, then the thing to which the legatee is entitled—call it a debt, call it something that must be administered either by trustee or executor—the character of it, the local character of it is fixed by the persons—call them debtors or call them trustees, I do not care which; they are the debtors or trustees who are in this country, and have this sum of money to administer here for the purpose of satisfying the trust or the duty of executors. Under these circumstances it appears to me that there can be but one answer to the question, and that is, that the debtors are here. The fixing of the character of the assets by the presence of the debtor may or may not have been very philosophical in early times; but it is a fact that cannot be controverted, and if it is a debt and the debtor is here, that is the character of the asset as fixed by the residence of the debtor, and that asset is English.

It appears to me that that disposes of the whole question, and I believe that the length of the argument—a very ingenious and learned argument I do not deny—has entirely been produced by alternately using the words "estate" and "interest," sometimes in their legal technical sense, and sometimes in their more popular sense; while the whole foundation of the argument is that the New Zealand mortgages are specifically the property of the legatee, a proposition which to my mind it is impossible to maintain. I entirely agree with the language used by Lopes and Kay, L.JJ. I believe that they have put in very terse and accurate language the true situation of the property in respect of its local character as assets, and I would wish to adopt the language which they have used.

I accordingly move your lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord HERSCHELL.—I am of the same opinion. The appellants, as the executors of Mrs. Tollemache, became entitled on her death to one-fourth part of the clear residue of the estate of her husband. That estate has not been fully administered; one legacy and some debts remain unpaid. The executors, who are the appellants here, have brought in an account, as part of their testatrix's estate, of a certain sum of money as being what they are entitled to and bound to pay probate duty upon under the will of which they are executors in respect of the estate of their testatrix. They have taken, as I understand, the whole of the assets of Algernon Tollemache except between £400,000 and £500,000 invested in New Zealand mortgages; they have put on the other side the legacy and debts still remaining unpaid; they have struck a balance between the two, and one-fourth part of that sum is, as they contend, the sum upon which they are bound to pay probate duty. It is contended, on the other hand, on behalf of the Crown, that the amount of these New Zealand mortgages ought to have been one of the items on the asset side of the account, and that, of course, would have increased the amount upon which duty was payable by one-fourth of that amount. The appellants claim a right to exclude that sum on the ground that the mortgages are foreign assets, and that, therefore, no duty is payable in respect of them; and no doubt, if they can make out that any particular asset which is part of their testatrix's estate is a foreign asset, then in respect of that no duty is payable. I agree with my noble and learned friend on the woolsack that the whole fallacy of the argument on behalf of the appellants rests on the assumption that Mrs. Tollemache, or they as her executors, were entitled to any part of these New Zealand mortgages as an asset, she in her own right or they as an asset of their testatrix. I do not think that they have any estate, right, or interest, legal or equitable, in these New Zealand mortgages, so as to make it an asset of her estate. What she had a right to, what they as her executors had a right to, is one-fourth of the clear residue of Mr. Tollemache's estate; that is to say, what remains of his estate after satisfying debts and legacies; and a bequest to them of one-fourth part of his residuary estate does not seem to me to vest in them or in her a fourth part of each asset of which that estate consists as contended for on the part of the appellants. It seems to me, as my noble and learned friend has pointed out, that until the estate is fully administered it is impossible to say of what assets the residuary estate will consist; we do not know how much of the debt remaining unpaid was in the present case, and there was only one legacy unpaid. But the argument must be precisely the same; if there had been a large amount of debt and many legacies still unpaid, it could not have made any difference in point of legal effect. In that case how is it possible to say that any one of the residuary legatees can point to any part of the assets of the testator and say, "This is a part of my share," when it depends entirely on the method of administration of the trustees in what form the share becoming divisible will exist when the administration is at an end. That really seems to me decisive against the claim of the appellants. I do not go further than that. It is unnecessary to say what would have been the case if the estate had been administered; but I certainly am very far from thinking, as at present advised, that it would have made any difference, and that even in that case it could have been said that this was a foreign asset as regards the estate of the testatrix, whose estate is in question.

But it is said that it was open to the executors of Algernon Tollemache to make over, if they please, to the testatrix or to her executors, in satisfaction of her rights under the residuary clause in her husband's will, these New Zealand bonds, or a portion of them; and for that authority has been cited. That authority, so far from telling in favour, seems to me to tell against the argument of the appellants. If it was open to the executors in the course of administration to make over to her these New Zealand bonds, it was equally open to them to make them over to other legatees and not to her. And if that be the right which an executor possesses, not only to choose and select what assets he shall use for the purpose of paying debts, but also to determine the way of administration by arrangement with the legatees as to what portion of the estate shall go to this or that legatee, it seems to me impossible under such circumstances as those to say that at the time of the death of the testatrix her executors were in a position to insist that a certain portion of these bonds, or an interest in the undivided fourth part of these bonds, was a part of the estate of the testatrix. In truth, what she had a right to was to require the executors of her husband to administer his estate completely, and she had an interest to the extent of one-fourth of what should prove to be the residuary estate of the testator, Algernon Tollemache. Where was that situate? It seems to me that it can only be said to have been situate in this country. Indeed, I do not think it was seriously disputed on the part of the appellants that, unless their contention could be made out that there was a right to these assets, making them foreign assets, in Mrs. Tollemache, or her executors, probate duty is payable upon the whole sum, and the whole of it must be regarded as an asset situate in this country. For these reasons I think the judgment appealed from must be affirmed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. I think the point is a very short one, and I think the claim of the Crown is very clear. For my part I am quite content to adopt the judgments of Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.

Lord SHAND.—I am of the same opinion, and I am satisfied to rest my judgment on the reasons given by the learned judges, Lopes and Kay, L.JJ. It is quite clear that the New Zealand mortgages were the property of Mr. Tollemache when he died, and I have seen nothing that occurred after that to make these mortgages the property of his widow. There was no allocation of any kind; and the trust fund was not in a position to be wound up. Even although the legacies and debts had all been paid I should hold the same view. There were a number of persons having right to the residue, and interested in its realization. The claim of Mrs. Tollemache's executors and trustees was really a claim to a share of the residue, and it had never been changed by allocation either by Mr. Tollemache's trustees, or by arrangement with the other persons interested, so as to make the right of these executors a right to specific assets. They might have objected to accept the New Zealand mortgages if it had been proposed to allocate these to them as part of the residue, and the other parties interested might also have had valid objection to such an allocation. If Mr. Tollemache's executors had held the entire estate for behoof of his widow, the case might have been different; but, with other persons interested in an undivided and unrealised residue, none of the beneficiaries had in themselves a right of ownership in particular assets of Mr. Tollemache's estate.

Lord DAVEY.—The principal testator in this case, Algernon Gray Tollemache, died on the 16th of January, 1892. His widow, Mrs. Tollemache, was entitled to a life interest in the entirety of his residuary estate, and was also entitled to one-fourth of the capital; that is to say, Mrs. Tollemache had an immediate title to one-fourth of her husband's residue and a life interest in the other three-fourths. She died a little more than a year after the death of her husband. At the time of the lady's death the testator's personal estate had not been fully administered, and was in course of administration, and the amount of the clear residue had not been ascertained. I read the very clear statement in the answer of the executors, not forgetting Mr. Channell's statement, which seems to me to be irrelevant, that the estate had very nearly been administered. In the events which happened the residuary estate of the original testator is divisible into sixty-four shares, of which the present appellants are entitled to sixteen. What, then, are the rights of the appellants? Their right, and the only right which they could enforce adversely, is to have the administration completed and the residuary estate ascertained and realized, either wholly or so far as may be necessary for the purpose, and to have one-fourth of the proceeds paid to them. The residuary legatees may no doubt agree between themselves to take any portion of the estate in specie, or an appropriation may be made of particular portions of the estate in satisfaction of any share by any fair agreement between the executors and the residuary legatees, or a scheme of division of that kind might no doubt be made by the executors either with the sanction of the court, or possibly at their own risk. In this case there has been no election to take the estate or any portion of it in specie; nor has there been any appropriation by the executors, and, indeed, at the time of Mrs. Tollemache's death the time had not arrived for any such election or appropriation.

Mr. Channell endeavoured to argue that a trust fund had "practically" (I think that was the expression) been constituted of these colonial mortgages in Mrs. Tollemache's lifetime, and that she, at the time of her death, was entitled to an undivided share of that trust fund. It is sufficient answer to that argument to say that (on the statement in the answer) no trust fund had been constituted, or could have been constituted, until the residue had been ascertained, and it is unnecessary to consider what would have been the case if these mortgages had formed part of a duly constituted trust fund vested in trustees for the lady.

I am of opinion, on the facts of this case, that Mrs. Tollemache at the time of her death had no right of property in, or right to claim any part of, the mortgages in specie, and that the appellants, her executors, acquired only a right to have the estate duly administered, and to enforce that right by an action for the purpose, but had no right virtute officii to have any part of the New Zealand mortgages appropriated to the estate of their testatrix in specie.

Order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

WILLIAMS v. GOOSE. (a.)

Practice—Payment into court—Issue—Method of leaving issue to jury—Ord. 22, r. 22—Judicature Act, 1875, s. 22.

Ord. 22, r. 22, is not ultra vires as a contravention of section 22 of the Judicature Act, 1875.

Application for a new trial of an action tried before Mathew, J., and a jury.

The action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries. The defendant in his defence, denied liability, and paid £30 into court. The plaintiff joined issue on the question of liability, and said that the sum paid into court was not sufficient to satisfy the claim.

At the trial the jury, in accordance with ord. 22, r. 22, were not informed of the fact that any money had been paid into court, and they returned a verdict for the plaintiff for £15.

Mathew, J., entered judgment for the defendant, directing that the sum of £15 should be paid out to the plaintiff, and that the balance of £15 should be paid back to the defendant.

Ord. 22, r. 22, is as follows: "Where a cause or matter is tried by a judge with a jury, no communication to the jury shall be made until after the verdict is given, either of the fact that money has been paid into court, or of the amount paid in. The jury shall be required to find the amount of the debt or damages, as the case may be, without reference to any payment into court."

The plaintiff applied for a new trial on the ground of misdirection.

Crump, Q.C., and Hohler, for the plaintiff.—Ord. 22, r. 22, is ultra vires, as being in contravention of section 22 of the Judicature Act, 1875, which enacts that "Nothing in the principal Act, nor in any rule or order made under the powers thereof or of this Act, shall take away or prejudice the right of any party to any action to have the issues for trial by jury submitted and left by the judge to the jury, before whom the same shall come for trial, with a proper and complete direction to the jury upon the law, and as to the evidence applicable to such issues." Where money is paid into court, the only issue is whether the money so paid in is sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim. Up to the year 1893, when ord. 22, r. 22, was made, the practice was that the jury were told what sum had been paid into court, and the judge directed them that the only question for them was whether that sum was enough. In this case the only question was whether the plaintiff was entitled to more than £30. The learned judge, therefore, ought to have disregarded the rule, and told the jury that £30 had been paid into court, and asked them whether that was enough.

Dickens, Q.C., and Mallinson, for the defendant.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The argument in this case that it was misdirection on the part of the learned judge not to tell the jury what amount had been paid into court. It is put upon this ground, that, when money is paid into court, the issue is whether the sum so paid in is enough, whether the damages to which the jury think the plaintiff is entitled are more or l than that sum. And it is argued that that issue must be put to the jury in those terms. Against that view there is ord. 22, r. 22, which says that no communication shall be made to the jury either of the fact that money has been paid into court or of the amount paid in until after verdict. It is argued, however, that that rule is ultra vires, and that it is the duty of the judge to tell the jury what amount has been paid into court. It is said that in an unreported case the Lord Chief Justice disregarded the rule; it does not seem, however, that he said it was ultra vires, and I do not comment on that case. I am of opinion that the rule is not ultra vires. The Rule Committee are authorized by section 17 of the Judicature Act, 1875, to make rules for regulating pleading, practice, and procedure, and rules so made have to be laid before Parliament. I have no doubt that what takes place in the course of a trial with regard to the conduct of the trial is a matter of procedure. This rule in effect says that though the issue is whether the sum paid into court is sufficient, that issue is to be left to the jury in a particular way. The judge is to direct the jury to find the amount of damages to which they think the plaintiff is entitled, and, after he has taken their finding, he is to enter judgment one way or the other according as the amount found by them is more or less than the sum paid into court. That is a matter of procedure, and we cannot say that the rule is ultra vires, even supposing that we have any power to consider the question whether it is ultra vires. The application must therefore be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—It is contended that ord. 22, r. 22, is ultra vires. I will not express any opinion on the question whether we have power to decide whether it is ultra vires, for in my opinion it is not ultra vires. It deals with procedure only. It is said that by section 22 of the Judicature Act, 1875, the issues must be left to the jury. But in this case it cannot be said that any issue has been withdrawn from the jury. The issues were, first, was there any liability; secondly, if there was any liability, what was the amount of the damages. It was not necessary to put the question expressly to the jury whether £30 was sufficient, though the result would be that, according as the damages found by them were more or less than that sum, judgment would be entered one way or the other. In my opinion the rule is a wholesome rule, and has worked satisfactorily.

WORCESTERSHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL (Appellants) v. ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF WORCESTER UNION (Respondents). (a.)

Poor law—Rating—Exemption—County council—Joint occupation by county council and justices.

Premises which are jointly occupied by a county council for administrative purposes and by justices for judicial purposes are rateable in respect of the occupation by the county council.

The principle laid down in Greig v. University of Edinburgh, L. R. H. L. (Sc.) 348, as to exemption from rateability, followed.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division upon a case stated under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11, on appeal to quarter sessions against an assessment to the poor rate.

Under 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. xlviii. the justices of the peace for the county of Worcester purchased property in the city of Worcester for the purpose of erecting thereon a county hall, courts of justice, offices, and judges' lodgings. The buildings were erected and were known as the Shire Hall. The premises having been assessed to the poor rate, it was held in 1839 (Reg. v. Justices of Worcestershire, 11 A. & E. 57) that the justices were not liable to poor rate for the premises.

By section 64 of the Local Government Act, 1888, the Shire Hall became vested in the appellants.

In April, 1896, the appellants were assessed to the relief of the poor of the parish of St. Nicholas in respect of certain portions of the Shire Hall as the owners and occupiers thereof. Those portions comprised the council chamber, which was used for meetings of the county council, and also for holding a second court of quarter sessions and for other judicial purposes; the offices used by the clerk of the peace, who was ex officio clerk of the county council, for both the judicial business of quarter sessions and the administrative business of the county council; and a hall and other rooms used as waiting-rooms for witnesses and the public at assizes and quarter sessions, and at other times for county council purposes. The premises were assessed in so far as they were used for administrative as distinguished from judicial purposes; and it was agreed that if the premises or any part thereof were liable to be rated the amounts at which they were rated and the apportionments were to stand.

The question for the court was whether the appellants were liable to be rated in respect of the above premises or any part thereof.

The Divisional Court, upon the authority of Middlesex County Council v. St. George's Union, ante, p. 215, [1897] 1 Q. B. 64, held that they were liable to be rated.

Alfred Young and C. F. Vachell, for the appellants.—In Middlesex County Council v. St. George's Union the parts used jointly by the justices and the county council were used for administrative purposes only. Here the user by the justices is for judicial purposes, and that exempts those parts from rating. Before the Local Government Act, 1888, the justices discharged both their administrative and judicial duties in this building, and yet the whole building was exempt: Nicholson v. Holborn Union, 35 W. R. 230, 18 Q. B. D. 161. The fact that the county council now discharge the administrative duties which were formerly discharged by the justices cannot make the parts jointly used rateable. The only parts liable to be rated are those which are separately occupied by the county council for administrative purposes.

Bosanquet, Q.C. (R. Harington with him), for the respondents.—The test of exemption from rateability is laid down by Lord Cairns in Greig v. University of Edinburgh, L. R. 1 H. L. (Sc.) 348—namely, that the occupation must be by the Crown or by persons using the property exclusively in and for the service of the Crown. Here there was no such exclusive occupation.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—Certain parts of the Shire

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Hall have been assessed to the relief of the poor, and the county council have been assessed as the occupiers thereof. There is a part which has not been assessed, and that is the part which is used exclusively for the assizes and quarter sessions. The parts which are rated and the mode in which those parts are used are described in the case. It is clear that the county council are the owners and occupiers. All the parts so rated are used partly for county council purposes. Upon occasions those parts are also used by the justices for judicial purposes, and it is contended that those parts are exempt from rating, the argument coming to this, that because those parts are sometimes used by the justices, the county council, which also uses those parts for county purposes, are exempt from rating. The county council have not been rated at the full value of those parts, but the value has been apportioned. We have nothing to say to the figures, and we can give no opinion whether the county council have not been treated too favourably. The question whether there should be an apportionment may arise on some future occasion, and the court may have to say whether if the premises are not exempt the county council should not be rated at the full value.

Now, the general principle of exemption has been laid down by Lord Cairns in the House of Lords in Greig v. University of Edinburgh: "Any property which is in the occupation of the Crown, or of persons using it exclusively in and for the service of the Crown, is not rateable to the relief of the poor."

In the present case the parts of the building which are rated are not occupied by persons using them exclusively in or for the service of the Crown. They are therefore rateable.

LOPES, L.J.—The decisions in the House of Lords show that buildings occupied and used for public purposes are rateable unless they are occupied by the Crown or by persons using them in or for the service of the Crown. They must be occupied exclusively by the Crown or by persons for the purposes of the Crown to make them exempt.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case comes within the principle laid down in the House of Lords in Greig v. University of Edinburgh.

Action.

In 1883 certain property in Middlesex was conveyed to Samuel Goddard, who sold it on the 15th of March, 1886.

The purchaser mortgaged the property to Battcock and King, and on the 26th of August, 1887, resold the property to Samuel Goddard, subject to the mortgage to Battcock and King.

On the 1st of July, 1890, Samuel Goddard deposited the conveyance of the 26th of August, 1887, with Barrell to secure an advance of £300.

Battcock and King were paid off, and, having no notice of Barrell's charge, reconveyed the property to Samuel Goddard on or before the 20th of February, 1894.

On the 17th of February, 1894, Samuel Goddard went to the bank and deposited the title deeds of other properties to secure an advance of £5,500.

On the 20th of February, 1894, a further advance of £2,000 was made, and Samuel Goddard deposited with the bank the deeds relating to this property down to and including the first conveyance to him in 1883, which he said conferred a clear title upon him, and said that he was willing to submit it to the bank's solicitors, who thought the title good. The bank had then no notice of Barrell's charge.

The Middlesex registry was not searched by either Barrell or the bank. The sale by Samuel Goddard on the 15th of March, 1886, and the repurchase by him on the 26th of August, 1887, were (inter alia), however, in fact, registered.

The memorandum given by Samuel Goddard to the bank upon the occasion of this deposit was in the following printed form, the names only being written:

"I declare that during the continuance of the charge I will hold the premises in trust for the bank, and will convey them as the bank or its general manager may direct, and I authorize the bank to remove me from being a trustee, and to appoint another person and make a declaration vesting the property in such other person."

(a.) Reported by G. B. HAMILTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By an indenture dated the 22nd of February, 1896, Samuel Goddard conveyed by way of mortgage the legal estate of the property in question to Joseph Goddard to secure the repayment of a loan of £1,000 advanced by Joseph Goddard.

A statement in the pleadings that Joseph Goddard had notice of the charge to the bank was not denied, and the mortgage to him was subject to the bank's equitable charge.

By an indenture dated the 23rd of March, 1896, the bank, in exercise of the powers conferred by the memorandum of the 20th of February, 1894, appointed its general managers trustees in the place of Samuel Goddard, and declared that the property should vest in such trustees. At the time of the execution of this deed of the 23rd of March, 1896, the bank had notice of Barrell's equitable charge.

Samuel Goddard became bankrupt on the 23rd of March, 1896.

On the 29th of April, 1896, the writ in the action was issued, the bank claiming to be first mortgagees as against Barrell, Joseph Goddard, and Samuel Goddard's trustee in bankruptcy.

Rawlins, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the bank.—We have got in the legal estate by virtue of the Trustee Act, 1893, s. 12 (1), and there is no equity preventing us from availing ourselves of its protection: Taylor v. Russell, 38 W. R. 663, [1891] 1 Ch. 8. If we have not got in the legal estate, we have the right to get it in.

They cited Willoughby v. Willoughby, 1 T. R. 763; Wilmot v. Pike, 5 Hare 14; Roberts v. Croft, 6 W. R. 144, 2 De G. & J. 1; Dixon v. Muckleston, 21 W. R. 178, L. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Greenwood, for Barrell.—Priority is not affected by getting in the legal estate from a trustee: Sharples v. Adams, 11 W. R. 450, 32 Beav. 213. Moreover, an equitable incumbrancer cannot, after receiving notice of a prior incumbrance, obtain priority over it by getting in a legal estate from a bare trustee: Harpham v. Shacklock, 30 W. R. 49, 19 Ch. D. 207. In that case the bare trustee was a paid-off mortgagee. A fortiori priority cannot be obtained by getting in the legal estate from the mortgagor. The Trustee Act does not apply to a mortgage.

Bilton, for Joseph Goddard.

Jenkins and Clayton, for other parties.

Rawlins, in reply.—The relations of mortgagor and mortgagee are not fiduciary, but if they choose to make them so, they can. This is commonly done as regards the outstanding three days in a mortgage of leasehold property. A person who takes a legal estate from a trustee with notice of a prior charge himself becomes a trustee: Saunders v. Dehew, 2 Vern. 270; so even if Joseph Goddard has the legal estate, he is a trustee for the bank. Harpham v. Shacklock is explained in Taylor v. Russell. There is a distinction between getting in the legal estate by a new transaction, and a man clothing himself with the legal estate in pursuance of a former arrangement. Sharples v. Adams is criticized in Maxfield v. Burton, 22 W. R. 148, p. 149, L. R. 17 Eq. 15, p. 19. See, too, Garnham v. Skipper, best reported 34 W. R. 135. We were less negligent than Barrell, although neither of us searched in the Middlesex registry, for we investigated the title and got the deeds.

NORTH, J.—[His lordship, after observing that the Middlesex register was not searched by either Barrell or the bank, referred briefly to the effect of the Middlesex Registry Act, which he seemed to consider was not material in the present case, and continued:] The deposit with Barrell being in 1890, Samuel Goddard in 1894 deposited the deeds with the bank, who had no notice of Barrell's charge. It is said the deed of the 20th of February, 1894, did not give the legal estate, but only the right to call for it, and that the mortgage is equitable only as the property had been previously mortgaged to Barrell. I do not, however, see why section 12 (1) of the Trustee Act, 1893, should not have effect. It is true that the bank did not get any legal estate on the 20th of February, 1894, but it took the deeds and a security in such a form that it could take the legal estate at any moment it chose, and the legal estate vested under the provisions of the Trustee Act, 1893. It is said that this is a mortgage deed, and that the Act does not apply. Section 12 is very important. The reference in section 12 (3) is to the practice of keeping notice of the trusts of mortgage money out of the mortgage to facilitate the reconveyance. [His lordship also referred to sections 10, 11, 12, 15, 26, 28, 29, 30, and 36.] Under the definition clause (section 50) "trust" does not include the duties incident to an estate conveyed by way of mortgage. It is said that it follows that the legal estate cannot be vested by such a declaration. But the definition is taken from the Trustee Act, 1850. As between the mortgagor and mortgagee there is no trust during the continuance of the security. But the words "conveyed by way of mortgage" mean where there is a mere mortgage. Whatever the interpretation clause may be, there is nothing to say that the Act is not to apply to a case in which a mortgage contains an express declaration of trust. The declaration of trust in a mortgage of a lease is similar. I recollect the form used to be a declaration of trust for a purchase after sale, but another form seems to have come into use. I think the vesting was co-extensive with the declaration of trust. I do not express any opinion as to what effect it would have had if Joseph Goddard had not known of the memorandum to the bank. He knew that the person from whom he derived title had declared himself a trustee for the bank, and had given the bank power to vest the property in any persons the bank might thereafter appoint as trustees in place of him. He could not, therefore, acquire the legal estate except subject to the power of the bank to divest it. It is said that the legal estate was not given at the time the money was advanced. But Lord Herschell says in Taylor v. Russell, [1892] A. C., p. 253; "It is not disputed that the doctrine of equity is well settled that a man who has bonâ fide paid money without notice of any other title, though at the time of the payment he, as purchaser, gets nothing but an equitable title, may afterwards get in a legal title if he can, and may hold it, though during the interval between the payment and the getting in of the legal title he may have had notice of some prior dealing inconsistent with the good faith of the dealing with himself." Lord Macnaghten says, [1892] A. C. 259: "The mere fact that the subsequent incumbrancer has notice of the prior incumbrance when he gets in the legal estate counts for nothing. It is, as Lord Hardwicke says, the very occasion which shows the necessity of it."

Barrell had no declaration of trust in his security, but merely the right to foreclosure conferred by the deposit. The bank obtained an express declaration of trust, and advanced cash, and that being the case, What is there inequitable in allowing them to take advantage of the legal estate? If "squeezing out" is ever justifiable, it is here. It is not a conveyance from a trustee, but the bank has what it stipulated for when it advanced the money, and there is nothing to make it inequitable that the bank should have what it contracted for.

THE MAYOR, &c., OF WEST HARTLEPOOL v. ROBINSON. (a.)

Local Government—Public health—Charges for paving—Duty imposed by Act of Parliament—Trespass—Memorial to Secretary of State—West Hartlepool Extension and Improvement Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 113), ss. 80, 349—Public Health Act, 1875, s. 268.

Where the Legislature has imposed on any persons duties the discharge of which requires entry on lands, these duties are imposed irrespective of the ownership of the lands in question, and acts done in due discharge of such duties do not constitute a trespass.

The judge, being of opinion that under the circumstances of the case the defendant had a grievance on account of certain charges made against him for paving and sewering streets, Held, following Walthamstow Local Board v. Staines, [1891] 2 Ch. 606, 40 W. R. Dig. 131 (which was decided on section 268 of the Public Health Act, 1875, with which section 349 of the local Act was practically identical), that the proper course for the defendant was by way of appeal to the Secretary of State by memorial for relief.

These were two summonses by which the Corporation of West Hartlepool sought to establish and enforce against certain lands of the defendant abutting on two streets known as Murray-street and Sandringham-road two charges for sums of £27 15s. 6d., and £328 3s. 4d. in respect of paving and sewering the two streets. These charges were claimed under the West Hartlepool Extension and Improvement Act, 1870. In 1878 the lands in question formed part of the Lynnfield Estate, which was the property of the defendant and occupied by him residentially. In the same year the owners of the land immediately adjoining on the south, being desirous of developing their property as a building estate, applied to the West Hartlepool Improvement Commissioners (the predecessors in title of the plaintiffs) to sanction a scheme for that purpose. A plan was submitted to the commissioners showing the proposed road called Middle Park-road, running along the boundary between the two estates, half being on the land of the proposers of the scheme and half on that of the defendant. The plan bore on it a note "It is proposed to leave half of Middle Park-road 18ft. wide." The scheme was sanctioned by the commissioners, and the road now called Sandringham-road was made. First this road was only 18ft. wide, and there was an agreement between the defendant and the commissioners that the defendant would afterwards contribute a sufficient quantity of land on the north side to give a street 36ft. wide. The existence of this agreement was denied on the part of the surveyor to the corporation and another person, but this denial was based rather on the absence of documents than personal knowledge, and his lordship, having regard to the weight of evidence, came to the conclusion that there was such an agreement. As above mentioned, when originally constructed Sandringham-road was only 18ft. wide and ran along the south boundary of the defendant's estate. No portion of his property was taken for the purpose of the road and his land was properly fenced off. In January, 1892, the Corporation of West Hartlepool made an order for paving, &c., this original 18ft. wide road. Notice of this order was served on the defendant and other adjoining landowners. None of the landowners on whom notice was served executed any part of the works required, which were performed by the corporation. The cost of the works was apportioned by the borough surveyor, and notices were sent to the defendant that he had been charged with the above mentioned amounts. The defendant sent these notices to a Mr. Muir, alleging reasons why he should not be called on to pay, and also sent the following letter to the corporation: "The demand note for £27 16s. 4d. dated the 15th of September we have handed to Mr. J. Muir, Church-street, to whom the whole of the Lynnfield Estate has passed. We therefore leave you to settle the matter with him, as we are told the account is a disputed one." Some correspondence took place between Muir and the borough surveyor, and finally proceedings were instituted against Muir before the magistrates. These proceedings were successful, as were those which were subsequently instituted before the Quarter Sessions. An appeal from the sessions to the Queen's Bench failed on the ground that it was too late, more than six months having elapsed since the apportionment. The present summons was then issued against Muir in the belief that he was the owner and not merely the agent. On the 5th of February, 1896, an order was made substituting the present defendant for Muir. It was proved that the defendant had thrown the agreed portion of his land into the road, making it 36ft. wide, and that he had done the necessary work of paving, &c., that portion of the road, the claim now made against him being in respect of the 18ft. of road which was not on his land at all.

Buckley, Q.C., and S. B. Druce, for the plaintiffs.—The local Act on which our claim is based is almost identical with the Public Health Act.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Strachan, Q.C., for the defendant.—The defendant did not own the soil, and would have had to trespass to execute this work.

Buckley, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 30.—STIRLING, J., after stating the facts and deciding certain other points raised in favour of the plaintiffs, continued: It is next said that the order of the 15th of January, 1892, was inoperative as against the defendant, the reason being that if he attempted to obey it he would have been guilty of a trespass, because the soil was vested in the successors to Messrs. Callender, Pape, & White, or at all events was not vested in the defendant. Now, section 80 says this: "If at any time any street, &c., shall not be completed as the order directs the owners of the buildings and lands in such street shall at their own respective expense remove all obstructions in, on, or under, and sewer, drain, level, flag, pave, macadamize, and otherwise complete the same within the time and in the manner prescribed by the order." It says nothing about the land or the soil or the ownership of the land on which it is to be executed. It is true as a general rule that owners of land abutting on a street are owners of the soil of each side up to the middle of the road. But that is subject to many exceptions of which the Legislature must be taken to have been aware, for the Act of Parliament has not provided anything on this point with reference to the duties imposed, and it is necessary that the persons to carry them out should enter on the soil as to which the duties are so imposed irrespective of the question whether they are owners or not. It seems to me that the acts necessary would be done in discharge of that duty, and would not constitute a trespass. [His lordship then dealt with other points raised, and continued:]

Then I have to decide whether the existence of the agreement of 1878 as to half the road constitute a defence to the action. As regards that agreement, according to the defendant's evidence, it was to throw the land into the road, and not to make the road. It is true he has actually made it, but after notice had been given by the letter of the 15th of September, 1893, of the position taken up by the plaintiffs, and I have great difficulty in seeing how the defendant can base a legal defence on those circumstances. No doubt there is a certain amount of hardship apparently on the defendant, because unquestionably he has executed works which would have fallen naturally on the adjoining owners, and I should be glad if I could see my way to relieve him of the expenses so in part charged against him. At the conclusion of the argument I could see no way except by appeal to the forbearance of the plaintiffs. But there is a section which was not called to my attention at the Bar—namely, 349, which runs thus: "Whenever any new street or other expenses are charged by the commissioners on the owners or occupiers of buildings or lands, and any such owner or occupier shall deem himself to be aggrieved thereby, he may address a memorial to one of her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, stating the grounds of his complaint, and the said Secretary of State may make such order in the matter as to him may seem equitable, and the order so made shall be binding and conclusive upon the commissioners, and if the commissioners shall have proceeded to recover such expenses the said Secretary of State may if he shall think fit direct the said commissioners to pay to the person so proceeded against such sum as he may consider to be a just compensation for the loss, damage, or grievance thereby sustained by him."

So far as I am able to discover the remedy provided by that clause is still available to the defendant. I will also add that, although down to this point the defendant has not relied on that section, its existence has a material bearing on the various points of the case already mentioned. There is in the Public Health Act, 1875, a very similar provision. Section 268 is as follows: [His lordship read the section, and continued:] That section has come under the consideration of the courts in several cases, particularly in Wake v. The Mayor, &c., of Sheffield, 32 W. R. 82, 12 Q. B. D. 142. That was rather a remarkable case. [His lordship read the headnote, and continued:] It appeared on the evidence that the plaintiffs were able to show that a considerable part of the work was expended on land which formed no part of the road, but was private property. In point of fact it was actually fenced off from the road altogether. The present Master of the Rolls says, in his judgment: [His lordship read the judgment at p. 145, from "The statute has," to p. 146, "which can be taken," and continued:] More recently that decision has been followed in the Court of Appeal in Walthamstow Local Board v. Staines, [1891] 2 Ch. 606, 40 W. R. Dig. 131. The whole substance of the defendant's case is that he has land which is charged by the plaintiffs with expenses which, regard being had to the agreement, ought not to be borne by him. Moreover, by reason of the expenses so charged that brings the case within section 349 of the local Act. If, as laid down by the Master of the Rolls in the case of Wake v. The Mayor, &c., of Sheffield, there is a grievance in respect of a new liability created by the Act, and the aggrieved party is confined to the particular remedy conferred by the Act, then many of the defendant's points cannot be raised here, but are subject to review by the Secretary of State. As far as the matter is before me the plaintiffs have made out their case, and there must be judgment for them on the usual terms. As the second summons seems to have been unnecessary, the costs so far as occasioned by that summons must be set off.

Company—Debenture—Floating security—Foreclosure—Debenture-holders' action for foreclosure—Absence of one debenture-holder.

In a debenture-holders' action the court will not make an order for foreclosure where one of the debenture-holders has neither been made a party nor given his consent.

Sadler v. Worley, 42 W. R. 476, [1894] 2 Ch. 170, distinguished.

Further consideration.

The defendant company in this case was incorporated in 1886 under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1883, for the purpose (among others) of manufacturing and supplying oxygen in different countries in Europe.

In May, 1891, the company, in pursuance of its powers for borrowing and raising money, raised the sum of £15,000 by the issue of 150 mortgage debentures of £100 each, charging thereby by way of floating security its patents and all other real personal property then or at any time thereafter belonging to it.

Condition 6 endorsed on the debentures provided that on default (as therein mentioned) by the company in payment of principal or interest, the debentures should become immediately enforceable.

The plaintiff, Ellis Elias, was the registered holder of 133 debentures, the other seventeen debentures being held by four other persons, one of whom, Madame la Baronne Jorant, who held two debentures, resided in Paris.

On the 1st of April, 1894, the company made default in the payment of the principal moneys due upon the debentures, having for three years previously also failed to pay the interest due on 125 of the debentures held by Elias.

In March, 1896, the plaintiff brought this action "on behalf of himself and all other holders of debentures issued by the defendant company," asking for a declaration that the said mortgage debentures were a first charge upon the real and personal property of the company; an account of what was due to the holders upon the security of the mortgage debentures; and that the mortgage debentures might be enforced by foreclosure or sale.

In May, 1896, judgment was given directing the usual inquiries, and in November, 1896, the chief clerk found by his certificate that the debentures were held by five persons, of whom the plaintiff was one and Madame la Baronne Jorant was another; he also found that the property charged by the debentures consisted of certain patents and certain fully paid up shares in joint-stock companies. It appeared that the above property had little or no marketable value.

The case came on for further consideration on the 4th of February, 1897, and the plaintiff asked, with the consent of all the other debenture-holders except Madame la Baronne Jorant, to whom notice of the judgment had been sent in the usual way through the post, but who neither appeared nor took any steps in the matter, for an order of foreclosure.

Percy F. Wheeler, for all the debenture-holders except Madame la Baronne Jorant, who did not appear.—I ask for an order similar to that in Sadler v. Worley, 42 W. R. 476, [1894] 2 Ch. 170, or in Welch v. National Cycle Co., 35 W. R. 137, W. N. 1886, pp. 97, 196. The latter case helps me inasmuch as the order was granted even though there was an order for sale first: Palmer's Company Precedents, 6th ed., p. 909; Oldrey v. Union Works, 43 W. R. Dig. 139. (The other cases cited appear in the judgment.)

KEKEWICH, J., doubted whether he could make the order in the absence of Madame Jorant, and reserved judgment.

Feb. 18.—KEKEWICH, J., delivered the following written judgment: On the further consideration of a debenture-holders' action, I am asked to make an order for foreclosure. The property comprised in the debentures, and to which the order of foreclosure would apply, is set out in the second schedule to the chief clerk's certificate, and consists of certain foreign patents and certain shares, all stated to be fully paid, in joint-stock companies. The first question is whether an order of foreclosure can properly be made with reference to such property, bearing in mind that it is only charged by the debentures, and has never been in any way vested in the debenture-holders, or in any persons in trust for them. Although property of this particular kind did not exist, so far as I remember, in Sadler v. Worley, I embraced it in my consideration of that case, and the language of my judgment was intended to extend to it. I have been unable to ascertain how far the conclusions at which I arrived on that point in Sadler v. Worley have been criticised or approved by other judges or by the profession. Under these circumstances I am not disposed to reconsider my conclusions, and if this were the only point for decision, I should hold the plaintiff entitled to the relief asked. The foreclosure would, in that event, have to be worked by proper directions for vesting the charged property in the debenture-holders free from redemption.

But there is a greater difficulty in the plaintiff's way, which also was before me in Sadler v. Worley. It is noticed in the opening sentence of my judgment in that case, and being there immaterial, was dismissed in a few words; but it was, nevertheless, then much considered. I have considered it again with special reference to the circumstances of this case, and it now calls for further treatment. I shall not endeavour to decide what may hereafter happen in other cases, where the facts are not substantially the same as they are here. It will suffice to deal with the actual case in hand. The plaintiff is not the owner of all the debentures. There are four others whose names, with their respective holdings, are set out in the first schedule to the chief clerk's certificate. Three of them combine with the plaintiff, whose counsel was instructed to appear for them on the hearing on further consideration, but the fourth, Madame la Baronne Jorant, who holds debentures for £200, is not a party to the action. According to the established practice in chambers, notice of the judgment was sent to her in Paris through the post; but this, of course, did not make her a party, and she has never appeared.

This has neatly raised the question whether I can properly make an order of foreclosure in favour of her as well as the other debenture-holders, in her absence. When considering whether a particular order can be made or not—in other words, whether there is jurisdiction to hear and grant any particular application—it is useful to reduce the proposed order into form, and to test the question by the language of that form. I therefore inquired of counsel what precise order he asked, and his reply was that he asked such an order as was made by Chitty, J., in Welch v. National Cycle Co., which is set out in the last edition of Mr. Palmer's Company Precedents, p. 909. In that case the debenture-holders consisted of the plaintiff and two defendants, and the order provided for redemption on payment to the three, and for conveyance in default to them. I omit all reference to a third-class debenture-holder as not touching the present question. On principle, it seems right that an order of foreclosure in the primitive sense—that is, an order which merely discharges the equity of redemption remaining in a mortgagor who has conveyed the legal estate to the mortgagee—should be made on the application of one or two mortgagees as against the other, because this release of the equity of redemption really adds nothing to the mortgagee's original estate, and is the inevitable result of the mortgage contract; but it does not follow that an order of foreclosure ought to be made as against one of two mortgagees where it has to provide for the conveyance to him of property which it is possible he has no wish or intention to take as his own, although he accepted a charge on it. This point is not touched by the order to which I have just referred; for, though it declares a charge and directs a conveyance operating as foreclosure, the debenture-holders other than the plaintiff were not only parties as defendants, but consented to the order, so that it was made with the concurrence of all. There still, therefore, remains open the question whether such an order can be made where the consent of one of the debenture-holders has not been obtained. Mr. Wheeler has been good enough to furnish me with a list of authorities bearing on this point which his industry has dicovered, including Drage v. Hartopp, 33 W. R. 410, 28 Ch. D. 414; Davenport v. James, 7 Hare, 249; Lowe v. Morgan, 1 Bro. Ch. C. 368; Palmer v. Earl of Carlisle, 1 Sim. & St. 423. None of these cases can be cited as an authority for the proposition that foreclosure can be granted in the absence of one or two or more mortgagees. The only suggestion to the contrary is to be found in Drage v. Hartopp, but it illustrates the maxim that "the exception proves the rule." There the mortgage was vested in two executors; one of them had absconded and could not be made a defendant with any prospect of service upon him. Pearson, J., held that he was a unnecessary party; but as appears from the report and especially from the arguments, on the ground that one of two executors sufficiently represented the estate. Much learning on this subject is to be found in the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Lake v. South Kensington Hotel Co., 27 W. R. 514, 11 Ch. D. 121, where the right of one of two or more mortgagees to maintain an action of foreclosure against the others was upheld, provided that the others were unwilling to be joined as co-plaintiffs or had done some action precluding them from being plaintiffs.

In this case I have one debenture-holder who is not a party. I do not see my way to a workable provision for payment to her and the others of the money due on the debentures; and even if that difficulty were got over, I do not see how I can properly direct an assignment to her of a share of the patents, or a proportion of the shares in the joint-stock companies. It may be said that it is not right for the plaintiff and those who act with him to be debarred from what otherwise would be just relief by reason of the negligence of one debenture-holder to protect her interests in the ordinary way—negligence which, from what I was told of the character of the property, may possibly arise from knowledge that it is worth little or nothing. On the other hand, it must not be forgotten that the extension of relief by way of foreclosure to such charges, and on such property, is one by no means naturally following from the early history of this branch of jurisdiction; and that persons advancing money on these peculiar floating charges must be deemed to have done so with a knowledge of the risk incurred, including the difficulty of realising the assets of an insolvent joint-stock company. The property being, as I understand, worthless, it is only right that the plaintiff and those acting with him should have every facility for acquiring it, if they please, in the hope of turning it into account hereafter; and I will give any assistance which the practice of the court allows in that direction; but for the reasons already stated, I do not see my way to make a foreclosure order. I will, however, make an order for sale of the property comprised in the debentures under the direction of the judge in chambers, and if the plaintiff brings in a reasonable proposal the result of which will be to vest the property in the plaintiff and those acting with him, I will listen to it.

GEILIGER v. GIBBS. (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Infant made plaintiff without authority—Application by defendants—Liability of plaintiffs' solicitors.

Upon the application of the defendants to an action in which an infant was made a co-plaintiff without proper authority, the solicitors who wrongly made him a co-plaintiff were ordered to pay the costs of the defendants occasioned by the infant being made a party, including the costs of the application.

The principle laid down by the Court of Appeal in Fricker v. Van Grutten, ante, p. 53, [1896] 2 Ch. 649, followed.

On the 10th of December, 1895, Walter Geiliger and Bertie Hallett commenced an action against F. Gibbs and W. Wright for the specific performance of an agreement for the sale of certain patents, and for other relief in respect thereof. Walter Geiliger was at this time an infant, he did not attain his majority until the 2nd of July, 1896. It appeared, however, that the solicitors for the plaintiffs, Messrs. Williams & Neville, were unaware of this fact, and that they took their instructions from Hallett, and had no authority from Geiliger. Geiliger first knew of the issue of the writ and that he was a plaintiff on the 13th of December, 1895. At that time he took no steps to have his name removed from the record, but on the 7th of July, 1896, he took out a summons, upon which he obtained an order, dated the 13th of July, striking out his name as plaintiff, ordering Hallett to pay the defendants' costs of the summons in any event, and, by consent, also ordering Hallett to pay Geiliger's costs of the summons.

On the same day, the 13th of July, the defendants took out this summons, asking that all their costs occasioned by the plaintiff Geiliger being made a party to the action, and their costs of this summons, should be taxed and paid by the plaintiffs' solicitors, Messrs. Williams & Neville.

Warrington, Q.C., and Cave, for the applicants.—The solicitors had no authority to make Geiliger a plaintiff, the applicants are therefore entitled to have their costs paid them by the solicitors: Fricker v. Van Grutten, ante, p. 53, [1896] 2 Ch. 649.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Eldon Bankes, for Messrs. Williams & Neville.—Geiliger has, by his conduct, ratified what was done in his name. In Fricker v. Van Grutten the order was made at the instance of a person added as co-plaintiff, here it is the defendants who apply.

They also referred to Reynolds v. Howell, 22 W. R. 18, L. R. 8 Q. B. 398; Nurse v. Durnford, 28 W. R. 145, 13 Ch. D. 764; Newbiggin-by-the-Sea Gas Co. v. Armstrong, 28 W. R. 217, 13 Ch. D. 310; Thomas v. Finlayson, 19 W. R. 255; and In re Jones, 19 W. R. 361, L. R. 6 Ch. 497.

Warrington, Q.C., replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—The utmost that can be said against the solicitors in this case is that they trusted to one client too much, and did not under the circumstances take the extreme care which they ought to have taken with respect to joining Walter Geiliger as a plaintiff. There is nothing to be said against them professionally. But it appears to me clear that they acted without authority in joining him as plaintiff. Are they, therefore, liable to the defendants for the costs occasioned to them by Geiliger being made a plaintiff. It is said on behalf of the solicitors that they were not without authority, for that although Geiliger was made a plaintiff without his consent, yet so far as he could he ratified what had been done—that is to say, that he knew of the proceedings which were being taken, and he knew that he was a plaintiff three days after proceedings were commenced and then took no steps to repudiate them; and reliance is placed on what Lord Blackburn said in Reynolds v. Howell: "I may add that, in my opinion, if a plaintiff after action brought in his name by an attorney without authority hears of it and does not repudiate it, he will be supposed to have ratified the attorney's act." But the answer to that argument is that all this time Geiliger was an infant. It is suggested that a solicitor may take authority to act from an infant to make him a plaintiff, but no decision is cited to that effect, and it is unsound. The infant cannot give such authority, the person to give it must be his next friend on his behalf. And that being so, neither can the infant himself ratify what has been done, any ratification must also be by a next friend. That clears the way for the main question as to whether Messrs. Williams & Neville ought to be ordered to pay the defendants' costs. If Geiliger were liable at all there is no question but that he would have his remedy over against his solicitors, but the question here is, what are the defendants' rights as against these solicitors, and that depends on the principle laid down in the case of Fricker v. Van Grutten, and discussed before, that in Reynolds v. Howell, in which case the court (Blackburn and Archibald, JJ.) considered that some former cases were erroneous, and decided that the plaintiff in an action brought without his authority was not liable to the defendant in costs, the result being that the action was stayed without payment of costs. It was the same principle which was in question in Fricker v. Van Grutten, although the question there was not precisely the same as here; take what Rigby, L.J., says at p. 662 ([1896] 2 Ch.): "Ultimately in Reynolds v. Howell the common law courts under the guidance of Blackburn, J., emancipated themselves from the old doctrine"—that is, the doctrine that a plaintiff although placed on the record without his authority must nevertheless be held liable to the defendant in costs. The result of Fricker v. Van Grutten is that the principle is now extended so that not only is such a plaintiff not liable to pay the defendants' costs, but the solicitors who put him forward as plaintiff having no authority to do so, must pay both his costs and the defendants' costs. But here it is the defendants who ask for costs, while in Fricker v. Van Grutten it was the plaintiff. Can the defendants ask for costs? It seems to me that once the principle is admitted they can. For if we stop short and say that the defendants are not entitled to ask for costs, and that it must be at the instance of the plaintiff, we should be adopting the principle and yet not giving it thorough effect. The plaintiffs' solicitors must therefore pay the defendants' their costs of the action so far as they may be attributable to Geiliger's having been made a plaintiff, and also the costs of this application.

REG. v. TURNER AND HODGSON. (a.)

County court—Practice—Summons out of the district—Discretion of judge to grant leave for such summons to be issued—County Court Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 74—Ord. 5, r. 9a, of County Court Rules, 1889.

By section 74 of the County Court Act, 1888, an action may be commenced by leave of the judge against a defendant resident out of the district if the cause of action arose wholly or in part within the district.

Held, that the words of the section were permissive only, and that the judge therefore had discretion to refuse leave for such a summons to issue, although he was satisfied that the cause of action was such as to give him power to grant the summons if he had thought fit to do so.

Julius v. The Bishop of Oxford, 28 W. R. 726, 5 App. Cas. 214, considered and applied.

The point raised in this case was whether, under section 74 of the County Court Act, 1888, a judge had discretion to refuse leave for a summons to be issued against a defendant, who resided out of the district, when he had satisfied himself, from the facts set out in the plaintiff's affidavit, that he had jurisdiction under that section to try the plaint.

The facts were shortly these. The plaintiff claimed £2 for goods sold and delivered to one Hodgson, who resided at Langdale, a town within the district of the Stokesley County Court. The goods were sent from Stockton, and were delivered upon the railway at Stokesley, so that the cause of action arose, if not wholly, at any rate in part, in Stockton.

The plaintiff applied to his Honour Judge Turner, sitting at the Durham County Court, holden at Stockton, for leave to issue a summons in that court against the defendant. The judge, while deciding that he had jurisdiction to allow the plaintiff to take out the summons in the Stockton County Court, held that he had a discretion to refuse the application, and in the exercise of that discretion he refused, for reasons not here material, to give leave for the summons to issue.

A rule nisi was then obtained calling upon his Honour to show cause why he should not give leave for a summons to be issued in the Stockton County Court against the defendant at Stokesley.

Section 74 of the County Court Act, 1888, is as follows: "Every action or matter may be commenced in the court within the district of which the defendant shall dwell or carry on his business at the time of commencing the action or matter, or it may be commenced by leave of the judge or registrar in the court within the district of which the defendant dwelt or carried on business at any time within six calendar months next before the time of commencement, or, with the like leave, in the court in the district of which the cause of action or claim wholly or in part arose."

Ord. 5, r. 9 (a), of the County Court Rules in force at the time of this decision provided that "the judge or the registrar shall duly consider the facts disclosed by the affidavit in each case as to the grant or refusal of leave in accordance with the circumstances."

By the County Court Rules of March, 1897, ord. 5, r. 9 (a), has been annulled, and the following substituted: Ord. 5, r. 9 (a), clause 7—"The judge or registrar shall duly consider the facts disclosed by the affidavit, and if he considers that the facts relied on . . . are sufficient to legally justify the granting of such leave, he shall further consider the facts relied on . . . showing that the balance of convenience is in favour of such leave being granted; and he shall exercise his discretion in each case, as to the grant or refusal of leave according to the circumstances." Clause (8)—"If the judge or registrar is of opinion that leave may legally be granted, and that the balance of convenience is in favour of such leave being granted, he may grant such leave." Clause 9—"If he is not so satisfied he shall refuse such leave" (see 41 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, pp. 271-2).

H. Sutton, showing cause.—The rule nisi ought to be discharged, because the judge, under the section, has discretion to grant or refuse a summons. The claim is made in the present case under the last part of the section. But it is a condition precedent to the exercising of this discretion at all that the cause of action must be shown by affidavit, to the satisfaction of the judge, to have arisen wholly or in part within the district: Brown v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 11 W. R. 884, L. J. Q. B. 318. The judge having got that jurisdiction, it is then for him to say, in the exercise of that discretion, whether or not on the ground of convenience or otherwise, a summons in that particular case ought to be issued. Société Générale de Paris v. Dreyfus Bros., 36 W. R. 609, 37 Ch. D. 215. The County Court rule (ord. 5, r. 9 (a)) ought not to be held by your lordships to be ultra vires because it is to the same effect as ord. 11 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, which do not go further than or contravene this section.

Poyser v. Minors, 29 W. R. 773, 7 Q. B. D. 32 and In re Baker, 38 W. R. 417, 44 Ch. D. 262, were also referred to.

Scott-Fox, in support of the rule.—Whenever the cause of action wholly or in part arises within district, then the judge, having satisfied himself as to the facts, is bound at once to allow a summons to be issued. His discretion is limited to deciding this question of jurisdiction. The section does not give him a further discretion, and leave it to him to grant or refuse to the plaintiff the right to put in motion the process of the court. The words, although in form permissive, refer to a public right, and must be construed as obligatory: Rex v. The Stewards and Suitors of the Manor of Havering-atte-Bower, 5 B. & Ald. 691. The Act says in the clearest terms that in certain given cases the plaintiff may commence an action out of the district of that judge. The judge having decided that the plaintiff has proved his right to put the process of that court in motion, has no discretionary power to take that right away from the plaintiff, and the summons ought, therefore, to issue as of right.

WRIGHT, J.—To my mind the language of the section is as explicit as it can be made. It is that in certain cases the plaintiff has the right to sue "in the court within the district of which the defendant shall then reside or carry on his business." In another case the action "may be commenced by leave of the judge or registrar in the court within the district of which the defendant dwelt or carried on business at any time within six calendar months next before the time of commencement." In the third case, "with the like leave, in the court in the district of which the cause of action or claim wholly or in part arose."

Now, under that section a rule has been framed which binds the judge and the parties unless it is ultra vires. That rule is 9*a* of order 5 of the County Court Rules, 1889, and that expressly obliges the judge in these terms: "The judge or registrar shall duly consider the facts disclosed by the affidavit in each case as to the grant or refusal of leave in accordance with the circumstances." Unless it is ultra vires as going beyond or contravening the 74th section of the Act, it is perfectly clear that the judge must exercise a discretion in each case, and is not bound to grant leave, as was contended by Mr. Scott-Fox.

I think, therefore, the rule nisi must be discharged.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The rule which governs this case is found in the case of Julius v. Bishop of Oxford, 28 W. R. 726, 5 App. Cas. 214. There, in the course of Lord Penzance's judgment (p. 230), referring to a dictum of Coleridge, J., he says: "Had the words been more precise they would hardly justify the use that has been made of them, for what Coleridge, J., said was, not that permissory or enabling words are to be held to have a compulsory force where the thing to be done is for the public benefit, but only that such words 'may' in some cases have that effect. If the matter were to be decided by previous definitions I should prefer that of Jervis, C.J., who said in the case of Reg. v. The York and North Midland Railway Co., 1 El. & Bl. 858, at p. 861, that such words as 'it shall be lawful' were to be understood as permissive only, unless some 'absurdity or injustice' would follow from giving them that their natural meaning." Then I find in the judgment of Lord Selborne (5 App. Cas. p. 235) this passage: "The language (certainly found in authorities entitled to very high respect) which speaks of the words 'it shall be lawful,' and the like, when used in public statutes, as ambiguous and susceptible (according to certain rules of construction) of a discretionary or an obligatory sense is, in my opinion, inaccurate. . . . The question whether a judge or a public officer to whom power is given by such words is bound to use it upon any particular occasion, or in any particular manner, must be solved aliunde, and, in general it is to be solved from the context from the particular provisions or from the general scope and objects of the enactment conferring the power."

The question arises in the present case whether there are any considerations sufficiently cogent to exclude the idea that the Legislature intended a discretion to be vested in the judge. It seems to me to be proved from the context and the general character of that section that the Legislature did intend a discretion to be vested in the judge, and that it would be putting a very unreasonable construction upon the words to hold that the judge had not in such cases a discretion.

CALE v. JAMES. (a.)

Justices — Married woman — Summary jurisdiction — Application by wife for separation — Costs — County court — Jurisdiction — Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 39), ss. 4, 5.

Section 5, sub-section (d), of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, gives the court of summary jurisdiction power to make provision for the payment of the costs of either party upon an application under the Act by a married woman against her husband.

Held, that this provision gives the court of summary jurisdiction exclusive jurisdiction over these costs, and that no action can be maintained in a county court by a wife or her solicitor to recover these costs from the husband.

Appeal from Birmingham County Court.

The plaintiff, who was a solicitor, brought an action in the county court to recover a small sum for costs incurred by him as the solicitor of the wife of the defendant.

The wife of the defendant instructed the plaintiff to take out a summons against her husband for a separation order on the ground of his cruelty, the summons being taken out under section 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895.

This summons was heard by the court of summary jurisdiction and dismissed. The wife paid her solicitor's costs and went back to live with her husband. Subsequently she again left her husband, and instructed the plaintiff to take out another summons on the ground of cruelty. This second summons was also dismissed by the justices, who made no order as to the payment of the costs.

The solicitor of the wife then brought this action in the county court against the husband to recover from him the costs he had incurred for the wife in the unsuccessful proceedings against her husband.

The county court judge held that he had jurisdiction to entertain the action, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for his costs to be taxed.

The defendant appealed.

The Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 39), provides: Section 5, "The court of summary jurisdiction to which any application under this Act is made may make an order or orders containing all or any of the provisions following—viz., (a) A provision that the applicant be no longer bound to cohabit with her husband. . . . (d) A provision for payment by the applicant or the husband, or both of them, of the costs of the court and such reasonable costs of either of the parties as the court may think fit."

Loehnis, for the appellant.—The county court judge had no jurisdiction to entertain the action. Section 5 (d) of the Act gives the court of summary jurisdiction before which any application under the Act may come, power to make an order as to the costs. A new tribunal was thus created, and this tribunal has exclusive jurisdiction to make any order as to the costs. The wife was unsuccessful in these proceedings, and that being so, there was no power in any court—apart from the practice in the Divorce Court—to give costs to the unsuccessful wife. However, if there was any such power, it was in the justices and not in the county court.

McCardie, for the respondent.—Sub-section (d) of section 5 applies only when an order is made in the wife's favour under section 4, so that "order" in section 5 means an order made under section 4. If an order against the wife be made, the sub-section does not apply. There is nothing in the Act which speaks of an order of dismissal; and if an order of dismissal be made, it must be under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848. The section only applies as between the husband and wife, and even if the wife would be prevented from maintaining an action against her husband in the county court, the solicitor of the wife would not be so prevented, as the right of the solicitor is a common law right, and stands apart from the wife's right.

WRIGHT, J.—The case is one of importance and of great difficulty. I think that under this Act the Legislature did not intend that there should be proceedings in other courts as to these costs. The section, after making it possible that an application for costs could be made to the court of summary jurisdiction, could not have intended that an action could be brought in another court in respect of these costs. I think the fair meaning of the Act is that all questions as to costs should be dealt with by the court of summary jurisdiction, and it leaves that court perfectly free to make any order as to costs they think fit, either against the husband or the wife. It was argued that the provision in section 5 (d) did not prejudice the right of the wife's solicitor to take proceedings against the husband in another court to recover the costs. That, however, depends on the true construction of the Act. If the Act intended that all questions of costs should be disposed of by the court of summary jurisdiction, then it seems to me we ought to hold that that provision applies to the solicitor of the wife as much as to the wife. Other points were argued, but we have not sufficient information before us to decide them, and it is unnecessary to do so, as we think we can dispose of the case upon the construction of the statute itself.

Vaccination—Proceedings against parent—Summons—Order signed by a different magistrate—Non-compliance with order—Defence—Vaccination Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 84), s. 31.

It is no defence to proceedings under section 31 of the Vaccination Act, 1867, against a parent, for non-compliance with an order directing him to have his child vaccinated, that the magistrate who issued the summons did not sign the order. If the order were bad on that ground proceedings should have been taken to quash it; but,

Semble, as the Summary Jurisdiction Acts apply to proceedings under the Vaccination Acts the order was not bad.

Special case stated by justices for the borough of Yeovil.

An information was laid before John Curtis, a magistrate, by the respondent, a duly-appointed vaccination officer, charging the appellant under section 31 of the Vaccination Act, 1867, with non-compliance with a notice requiring him to procure the vaccination of his child. On this information a summons was granted by the magistrate. On the hearing of the summons an order was made requiring the appellant to have his child vaccinated. The magistrate Curtis and three other magistrates were present at the hearing, but the order when drawn up was signed by two only of the magistrates, Curtis not being one of them. The appellant having failed to comply with the order, these proceedings were instituted under section 31 of the Act for a penalty.

It was contended for the appellant that under section 31 it was necessary that the magistrate before whom the original information was sworn should not only sign the summons but should also sign the subsequent order, and that that course not having been followed the appellant was not bound to obey the order.

The justices convicted the appellant subject to this case.

The Vaccination Act, 1867, s. 31, provides that: "If any . . . officer appointed by the guardians to enforce the provisions of this Act shall give information in writing to a justice of the peace that he has reason to believe that any child . . . has not been successfully vaccinated, and that he has given notice to the parent . . . to procure its being vaccinated, and that this notice has been disregarded, the justice may summon such parent . . . to appear with the child before him . . . and upon the appearance if the justice shall find . . . that the child has not been vaccinated . . . he may if he see fit make an order under his hand and seal directing such child to be vaccinated . . . and if at the expiration of such time the child shall not have been so vaccinated . . . the person upon whom such order shall have been made shall be proceeded against summarily . . . and shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings."

Schultess Young, for the appellant.—The order was bad because it was not signed by the justice who issued the summons. Section 31 is explicit. It says that the vaccination officer shall give information to "a justice of the peace"; then, "the justice" may summon the parent, and "the justice" may make an order "under his hand and seal." The provisions of the section not having been followed in making the order, the appellant was not bound to obey it.

No one appeared for the respondent.

WRIGHT, J.—I think that this objection to the validity of the order has been taken at the wrong stage. Assuming the objection to be a good one, it does not, in my opinion, afford a good defence to proceedings for the recovery of a penalty for disobedience to the order. Proceedings should have been taken to quash the order.

But, in the second place, I think it is very doubtful whether there is anything in the objection, inasmuch as the Summary Jurisdiction Acts apply to proceedings under the Vaccination Acts, and there is provision in those Acts for one magistrate to issue a summons and for another to hear the case and sign the order.

BRUCE, J.—I agree. It is often necessary for a case to be heard by a different justice from the one who issued the summons. But quite apart from that, if the order was bad, it ought to have been appealed against.

Appeal dismissed.

Vaccination—Notice—Service—Proof—Vaccination Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 84), s. 31.

No particular mode of service is necessary in the case of a notice under section 31 of the Vaccination Act, 1867, requiring a parent to procure the vaccination of his child. It is for the justices to determine whether they are satisfied on the evidence that the notice reached the person for whom it was intended.

Special case stated by justices of the peace for the borough of Andover.

An information was laid under section 31 of the Vaccination Act, 1867, by the respondent, who was a duly-appointed vaccination officer, against the appellant, for non-compliance with a notice requiring him to have his child vaccinated.

At the hearing the justices made an order on the appellant for the vaccination of his child, but stated this case on the question whether the notice under section 31, if delivered otherwise than personally, must be shown to have reached the person notified.

The evidence as to the service of the notice was as follows: The respondent drew out a notice in respect of the appellant's child, addressed it to the appellant, and handed it, with other notices, to one Plumley for delivery. Plumley took the notice to the appellant's house and handed it to a woman there, telling her that it was a vaccination notice.

He could not swear that the woman was the appellant's wife, nor could he swear as to the date of delivery, except that it was the day after the notice was handed to him by the respondent. He could not swear that the notice was in respect of the appellant's child, because the notice was folded up when he received it, and he did not open it.

The justices held that the notice was served upon the appellant in a manner as effectual as if the respondent had addressed it and sent it by post.

Schultess Young, for the appellant.

No one appeared for the respondent.

WRIGHT, J.—I do not think that there is any particular mode of service necessary in the case of a notice under section 31 of the Vaccination Act, 1867, requiring a parent to procure the vaccination of his child. It is for the justices to say whether they are satisfied that the notice reached the person for whom it was intended. In this case the justices were satisfied that there was a good service, and the question being one for them to decide, we cannot interfere with their decision.

BRUCE, J.—The justices have decided that the notice reached the appellant. I think there was sufficient evidence to justify that decision.

Appeal dismissed.

OSBORN (Appellant) v. WOOD & BROTHERS (Respondents). (a.)

Justices—Mitigation of penalties—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 4—Cotton Cloth Factories Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 62), s. 13.

Section 13 of the Cotton Cloth Factories Act, 1889, enacts that, "If in the case of any cotton cloth factory there is a contravention of, or non-compliance with, any of the provisions of this Act, the inspector shall give notice in writing to the occupier of the same of the acts or omissions constituting the contravention or non-compliance, and if such acts or omissions, or any of them, are continued or not remedied, or are repeated within twelve months after such notice has been given, the occupier of such factory shall be liable, on summary conviction, for the first offence, to a penalty of not less than five pounds nor more than ten pounds, and for every subsequent offence to a penalty of not less than ten pounds nor more than twenty pounds."

On a summons taken out under the above section, justices at petty sessions convicted the defendants of a first offence, but, holding that they had discretionary power under section 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, to do so, they reduced the fine to twenty shillings.

Held, that the justices had acted wrongly. Section 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, does not apply to section 13 of the Cotton Cloth Factories Act, 1889. A particular and a serious offence is created by section 13, and when such offence is committed the magistrates have no power to reduce the penalty under the provisions of section 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act.

This was a case stated by the justices for the county of Lancaster.

At a petty sessions held at Bury, in the county of Lancaster, an information was preferred by E. H. Osborn, the appellant, an inspector of factories, against Wood & Brothers, the respondents, that on the 27th of March, 1896, they, the respondents, the occupiers of a cotton cloth factory, within the meaning of the Cotton Cloth Factories Act, 1889, did allow an amount of moisture in the atmosphere of such cotton cloth factory to be in excess of such amount as is represented by the number of grains of moisture per cubic foot of air shown in column 1 of the table in Schedule A of that Act, opposite to such figure in column 2 as represented the temperature existing in such cotton cloth factory on the 27th of March, 1896, this being a contravention of the Act repeated within twelve months after notice in writing to the occupiers of the said factory of a similar contravention of the provisions of the said Act contrary to the form of the statute.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister at-Law.

On the 12th of August, 1895, and on the 6th of September, 1895, notices in writing were given to the respondents of their having contravened the Cotton Cloth Factories Act, 1889, on two occasions prior to the dates of their notices but within twelve months of the 27th of March, 1896, the date upon which the offence the justices adjudicated upon was alleged to have been committed.

The justices found as a fact that the respondents had been guilty of the offence charged in the said information, but they were of opinion that by section 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, they had a discretionary power, this being a first offence, to reduce the penalty to be imposed below the sum of £5 named in section 13 of the Cotton Cloth Factories Act, and they accordingly only fined the respondents the sum of twenty shillings and costs. From this decision the inspector of factories appealed.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether section 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, gives the justices power to reduce the penalty of £5 for a first offence imposed by section 13 of the Cotton Cloth Factories Act, 1889.

By section 5, sub-section 1, of the Cotton Cloth Factories Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 62), it is provided that there shall only be a certain prescribed amount of moisture in the temperature of the air in a factory.

By section 13 it is provided that: "If, in the case of any cotton cloth factory there is a contravention of or non-compliance with any of the provisions of this Act, the inspector shall give notice in writing to the occupier of the same of the acts or omissions constituting the contravention or non-compliance, and if such acts or omissions, or any of them, are continued or not remedied, or are repeated within twelve months after such notice has been given, the occupier of such factory shall be liable on summary conviction, for the first offence, to a penalty of not less than five pounds nor more than ten pounds, and for every subsequent offence to a penalty of not less than ten pounds nor more than twenty pounds."

By section 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), it is provided that: "Subject as in this Act mentioned, and notwithstanding any enactment to the contrary, where a court of summary jurisdiction has authority under this Act, or under any other Act, whether past or future, to impose imprisonment or to impose a fine for an offence punishable on summary conviction, that court may, in the case of imprisonment, impose the same without hard labour, and reduce the prescribed period thereof, or do either of such acts; and in the case of a fine, if it is imposed as in respect of a first offence, may reduce the prescribed amount thereof."

Sutton, for the appellant.—The justices were wrong. Section 13 of the Cotton Cloth Factories Act deliberately says that for a first offence the penalty shall not be less than five pounds. Clearly, therefore, section 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act would not apply here. The particular offences mentioned in section 13 have been expressly taken out of the scope of section 4.

Danckwerts, for the respondents.—The justices had power under section 4 to reduce the fine. There is nothing inconsistent in sections 4 and 13, nor is there any implied repeal of section 4. Both Acts can be read together. If it had been the intention of the Legislature to exclude the scope of section 4 in cases of offences under section 13, very much stronger and more express terms would have been used.

Sutton replied.

The following cases were cited: Reg. v. County Court Judge of Halifax, 39 W. R. 545, [1891] 2 Q. B. 263; Dobbs v. Grand Junction Waterworks Co., 31 W. R. 13, 9 Q. B. D. 151; Reg. v. Oastler, 50 L. J. M. C. 4, at p. 6; Kutner v. Phillips, 39 W. R. 526, [1891] 2 Q. B. 267.

WILLS, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must succeed. I think that the words of the Cotton Cloth Factories Act, 1889, are quite plain. It is true that section 13 uses the expression that the fine is to be recovered "on summary conviction," and therefore, by section 51 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, that Act does apply here unless we can see plainly that the two Acts are inconsistent. I think, when you come to look at the character of the offence which is created here, it is only too plain that what Parliament meant to say was, that if this particular offence has been committed it shall be treated as a serious matter and as a matter upon which the magistrate shall have no power to go below £5. It is not a common offence which is created here by section 13; such an offence is only constituted when there has been a breach of the provisions of the Act, when notice in writing has been given to the inspector, and when, notwithstanding that notice in writing, the acts complained of have been repeated, or the omissions have not been remedied within twelve months. That is an offence which shows something like a very intentional violation of the Act and a determination not to carry out its provisions. I feel no doubt myself that what Parliament meant is that, notwithstanding the incorporation of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, if this particular type of offence is committed the magistrates shall treat it as a serious offence, and that they shall have no power to apply the provisions of section 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act which would enable them to reduce the penalty. This is not a case of the repeal of the Act of 1879; what we say is merely that in this specific instance Parliament meant the provision as to penalties contained in section 13 of the Act of 1889 to override the provision in section 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think we should be assuming legislative power if we held otherwise. It might be explanation enough to say that if you read this later Act into section 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act the Legislature has deliberately engrafted an exception on to the Act of 1879. I am not sure there is not another explanation—namely, that the Legislature intended that in dealing with cases arising under existing Acts in such cases there should be a power of mitigation, but that in cases arising under future Acts of Parliament there shall only be power to mitigate where Parliament does not prohibit mitigation by such future Act.

In re M'GAREL (A Lunatic). (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Taxation—Remuneration—Leases—Scale fee—Percentage—General Order under Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, Schedule I., Part II.; and rule 6.

The omission of the words "per cent." from the first scale in Schedule I., Part II., to the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, in cases where the rent exceeds £100 is intentional. A solicitor, therefore, is not entitled to a proportional fee for fractions of £100 as remuneration for preparing a lease when the rental exceeds £100.

This was an appeal by the committee of the lunatic against a ruling of the taxing-master, disallowing certain fees to solicitors paid in connection with the lease of a house as a residence for the lunatic; and involved a question of the construction of the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881.

Part II. of Schedule I. to that order provides by the first scale, which applies to leases at a rack-rent, that the remuneration of the lessor's solicitor "for preparing, settling, and completing lease and counterpart" shall be, "where the rent does not exceed £100," "£7 10s. per cent. on the rental, but not less in any case than £5"; "where the rent exceeds £100 and does not exceed £500," "£7 10s. in respect of the first £100 of rent, and £2 10s. in respect of each subsequent £100 of rent." The lessee's solicitor is to charge one-half of the amount payable to the lessor's solicitor. Under the second scale, which applies to building leases reserving rent, or other long leases not at rack-rent (except mining leases), "where the annual rent does not exceed £5, the amount of remuneration is to be £5; where the rent exceeds £5 and does not exceed £50," "the same payment as on a rent of £5, and also 20 per cent. on the excess beyond £5." Then follow provisions for cases where the rent exceeds £50 but does not exceed £150, and where it exceeds £150. Then, by rule 6 of the "rules applicable to Part II. of Schedule I., as to all leases or conveyances at a rent or agreement for the same, other than mining leases or agreements therefor," fractions of £5 are to be reckoned as £5.

In the present case the committee of a lunatic had been directed in 1887 by the master to take a seven years' lease of a house as a residence for the lunatic at a rent of £350 per annum. On this occasion the committee paid to the lessor's solicitor a fee of £13 15s.—viz., £7 10s. for the first £100 of the rent, £2 10s. for the second £100, £2 10s. for the third £100, and £1 5s. for the additional £50. A fee of half this amount was paid by the committee to his own solicitor.

In 1894 the lease was renewed for another seven years at the same rent, and similar fees were paid by the committee to the lessor's solicitors and his own solicitor respectively. The committee carried in his charges for taxation in the lunacy, in order that they might be allowed to him out of the lunatic's estate. The taxing-master disallowed in each case the fee paid in respect of the additional £50 of rent (beyond the £300), holding that its payment was not authorised by the Schedule to the General Order.

R. F. Norton, for the committee.—The words "per cent." must be taken to be implied in the case of rents exceeding the £100; if not, rule 6 is meaningless as applied to the first scale. The practice of the taxing-masters in the Chancery Division has always been to allow a proportional fee for fractions of £100 where the total has exceeded £100. This is shown by the amount allowed in In re Negus, 43 W. R. 68, [1895] 1 Ch. 73. [LINDLEY, L.J.—This point was not raised in that case.]

Borthwick, for the next-of-kin, was not called on.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I think the taxing-master is correct. The case falls under Schedule I., Part II., of the General Order to the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881—that is to say, it is a case which is governed by the scale as to leases. Now, that applies to leases at a rack-rent, and provides for the remuneration of the lessor's solicitor "for preparing, settling, and completing lease and counterpart." The first item is this, that where the rent does not exceed £100 the remuneration shall be £7 10s. per cent. on the rental, but not less in any case than £5. That works out to this, that for all rents below £65 £5 is to be charged, and between £65 and £100 £7 10s. per cent. There is clearly a percentage given there. Now we go on to where the rent exceeds £100, and there the solicitor's fee is to be £7 10s. in respect of the first £100 of rent, and £2 10s. in respect of each subsequent £100 of rent. And then the next item is where the rent exceeds £500. Now, in these last items the words "per cent." are omitted, and I have no doubt that they were intentionally omitted. It is quite obvious what was in the minds of those who framed these rules: they thought that the remuneration given by the Act was sufficient without giving any percentage. They were solicitors who understood perfectly well what they were about. They were clearly not thinking about a percentage after the first £100 of rent. Now, the second scale is a percentage scale, and does not apply to this case at all.

Then comes rule 6, by which fractions of £5 are to be reckoned as £5. That rule, no doubt, applies to both scales, the first and the second. It is quite intelligible. It applies to the first scale as to rents between £65 and £100, and to all leases under the second scale. But rule 6 has no application to the present case. I think the case is so plain that but for the ingenuity of counsel I could not have thought there would have been a doubt about it.

The taxing-master is quite right.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I concur. The court could not, it seems to me, allow this appeal without altering the phraseology of the rule.

RIGBY, L.J.—I quite agree.

ANDREWS v. GAS METER CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Memorandum of association—Alteration of articles—Increase of capital—Preference shares—

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Rights of shareholders—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 12, 50, 51.

There is no condition implied in a memorandum of association that all shareholders are to be on an equality unless the memorandum itself shows the contrary.

Held, consequently, that a limited company, not being expressly prohibited from so doing by its memorandum of association, might, under section 12 of the Companies Act, 1862, make provision, either in its original articles of association, or by alteration, under sections 50 and 51 of the same Act, of the original articles, for the increase of its capital by the issue of shares bearing a preferential dividend.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (ante, p. 46), reversed.

Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co. (No. 2), 13 W. R. 1059, 2 Dr. & Sm. 521, overruled.

Appeal by the preference shareholders of the above-named company from a decision of Kekewich, J., (reported ante, p. 46), whereby his lordship held that a limited company, having no provision in its memorandum or original articles of association for the issue of preference shares, had no power to issue preference shares.

The facts fully appear from the report in the court below and from the written judgment of the Court of Appeal.

Warrington, Q.C., and A. R. Kirby, for the appellants.—The plaintiffs in the court below used the arguments which, in consequence of the decision of Kekewich, J., the appellants are now bound to adopt. The shares were validly created, and the appellants are shareholders; if not preference shareholders at any rate they are ordinary shareholders without any preference. The bargain which was made between the parties at the time was binding, and has been acted on ever since. The appellants rely upon the last words of clause 5 of the memorandum of association. The decision of Kindersley, V.C., in Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co. (No. 2), 13 W. R. 1059, 2 Dr. & Sm. 521, that a company has no power to issue preference shares, unless such power is specially given by the memorandum and articles of association, is wrong and ought to be overruled. That case has never been followed, but was dealt with by Sir G. Jessel, M.R., in Harrison v. The Mexican Railway Co., 23 W. R. 403, L. R. 19 Eq. 358, where his lordship got out of the previous decision, and held that by inference preference shares could be created. The question came indirectly before this court in In re South Durham Brewery Co., 34 W. R. 126, 31 Ch. D. 261, where passages occur which cannot be reconciled with Hutton v. Scarborough, &c., Co. Lord Macnaghten in the House of Lords, in British and American Trustee and Finance Corporation v. Couper, 42 W. R. 652, [1894] A. C. 399, expressly dissented from Hutton v. Scarborough, &c., Co., but it was extra-judicial, and not necessary for that decision. In this particular case the increase of capital is provided for in effect by the articles and not by the memorandum of association. All the cases help the contention that the increase of capital is capable of being dealt with by the articles.

See also In re Bridgewater Navigation Co., 36 W. R. 769, 39 Ch. D. 1; McIlquham v. Taylor, 43 W. R. 297, [1895] 1 Ch. 53.

Ogden Lawrence, Q.C., and Eustace Smith, for the respondents.—If the second decision in Hutton v. Scarborough, &c., Co. is good law it covers this case. The articles of association in clause 5, mean the articles as they were registered, as they were in existence at the time. The principle of this case has been recognized by the Court of Appeal in Ashbury v. Watson, 33 W. R. 882, 30 Ch. D. 376. If the issue of shares was ultra vires in its inception, neither the company nor the shareholders could ratify the action of the company in allotting shares: In re London and New York Investment Corporation, 44 W. R. 137, [1895] 2 Ch. 860; In re Guardian Permanent Benefit Building Society, 23 Ch. D. 440, 31 W. R. Dig. 28. This being so, one has to inquire what were the rights of these so-called shareholders at the date of the issue. In the alternative, we adopt the whole position; leave out the word "preference," which is invalid, and make them ordinary shareholders: In re Bridgwater Navigation Co.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 6.—The judgment of the court was delivered by

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question raised by the appeal is whether certain preference shares issued by a limited company as long ago as 1865 were validly issued or not. If they were not, a further question will arise, which is—What are the rights of their present holders? The company was formed and registered as a limited company under the Companies Act, 1856, but in October, 1862, it was registered under the Companies Act, 1862, and it is by that Act and the decisions upon it that the above questions have to be determined. The company's original capital as stated in its memorandum of association was "£60,000, divided into 600 shares of £100, each share being divisible into fifths, with power to increase the capital as provided by the articles of association." By the articles of association which accompanied the memorandum of association and were registered with it, power was given to the company to increase the capital (article 27), and it was provided that any new capital should be considered as part of the original capital (article 28). The issue of preference shares was not contemplated or authorized.

In 1865 the company desired to acquire additional works, and passed a special resolution under the powers conferred by the Companies Act, 1862, ss. 50 and 51, altering the articles and authorizing the issue of 100 shares of £100 each fully paid and bearing a preferential dividend of £5 per cent. per annum. Those shares were accordingly issued to the vendors of the works referred to and are the shares the validity of which is now in question. The company has been prosperous, and the ordinary shareholders have for years received a higher dividend than the preference shareholders. A considerable reserve has been also accumulated, and this action has been brought to determine the rights of the preference shareholders to this reserve fund. The learned judge below has held that the creation of the preference shares was ultra vires, and that their holders never became and are not now shareholders in the company, and that they have none of the rights of shareholders, whether preference or ordinary. He has not, however, declared more definitely what their rights are. They have appealed from this decision, but on the appeal they only claimed to be preference shareholders entitled to a preferential dividend of 5 per cent. Their claim to any share of the reserve fund was dropped.

The judgment against the validity of the preference shares is based upon the well-known case of Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co., which came twice before Kindersley, V.C., in 1865, and which Kekewich, J., very naturally held to be binding on him. Kindersley, V.C.'s, first decision (13 W. R. 574, 2 Dr. & Sm. 514) was that a limited company which had not issued the whole of its original capital could not issue the unallotted shares as preference shares unless authorized so to do by its memorandum of association or by its articles of association. This decision was affirmed on appeal (13 W. R. 631, 4 De G. J. & Sm. 672), and was obviously correct; and would have been correct even if the whole of the original capital had been issued and the preference shares had been new and additional capital. The company, however, afterwards passed a special resolution altering the articles and authorizing an issue of preference shares. This raised an entirely different question, and led to the second decision reported 13 W. R. 1059, 2 Dr. & Sm. 521. The Vice-Chancellor granted an injunction restraining the issue of the preference shares, and he held distinctly that the resolution altering the articles was ultra vires. He did so upon the ground, as we understand his judgment, that there was in the memorandum of association a condition that all the shareholders should stand on equal footing as to the receipt of dividends, and that this condition was one which could not be got rid of by special resolution altering the articles of association under the powers conferred by sections 50 and 51 of the Act of 1862. The judgment of the Vice-Chancellor is a little obscure, because he treats the condition as a condition of the constitution of the company, and he may have meant by that expression either the constitution as fixed by the memorandum of association, or the constitution as fixed by the memorandum of association and the original articles. But unless he had meant the constitution of the company as fixed by the memorandum of association his decision is unintelligible; for, so fas as the constitution depended on the articles, it clearly could be altered by special resolution under the powers conferred by sections 50 and 51 of the Act. A company cannot deprive itself of this power: see Malleson v. National Insurance and Guarantee Corporation, 42 W. R. 249, [1894] 1 Ch. 200, and Walker v. London Tramways Co., 28 W. R. 163, 12 Ch. D. 705. The Vice-Chancellor further seems to have been of opinion that the condition could be excluded by contemporaneous articles of association, and his decision has been so understood by succeeding judges. Accordingly, in 1875, in the case of Harrison v. Mexican Railway Co., Sir G. Jessel, M.R., held that the condition of equality imported into the memorandum of association by Kindersley, V.C.'s, decision was negatived by one of the articles of association filed with the memorandum, and which article authorized the creation of additional capital by the issue of new shares, "in such manner, to such amount, and with and subject to such rules, regulations, privileges, and conditions" as the company should think fit. In our opinion it is impossible to uphold this decision, or the view of Kindersley, V.C., himself, as to the effect of articles on the memorandum, if it is once conceded that it is a condition in the memorandum of association that there shall be equality amongst the shareholders. If the condition is really one of the conditions of the memorandum it is immaterial whether the condition is express or implied. If the memorandum of association really prescribed equality amongst all the shareholders, as Kindersley, V.C., held that it did, the articles of association could not override the memorandum of association in that particular. (See section 12 of the Act, and Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Co. v. Riche, 24 W. R. 794, L. R. 7 H. L. 653, 667, and Guinness v. Land Corporation of Ireland, 31 W. R. 341, 22 Ch. D. 349.) The departure thus made by Sir G. Jessel from the principle on which the Vice-Chancellor based the second decision in Hutton v. The Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co. was sanctioned by the Court of Appeal in 1885 in the case of In re South Durham Brewery Co., and again in 1887 in In re Bridgewater Navigation Co., a case which, although reversed on another point (14 App. Cas. 525), was not questioned on the point now under consideration. These decisions turned upon the principle that, although by section 8 of the Act the memorandum is to state the amount of the original capital and the number of shares into which it is to be divided, yet in other respects the rights of the shareholders in respect of their shares and the terms on which additional capital may be raised are matters to be regulated by the articles of association rather than by the memorandum, and are, therefore, matters which (unless provided for by the memorandum as in Ashbury v. Watson) may be determined by the company from time to time by special resolution pursuant to section 50 of the Act. This view, however, clearly negatives the doctrine that there is a condition in the memorandum of association that all shareholders are to be on an equality unless the memorandum itself shows the contrary. That proposition is, in our opinion, unsound. Its unsoundness was distinctly pointed out by Lord Macnaghten in The British and American Trustee and Finance Corporation v. Couper, 42 W. R. 652, [1894] A. C. 399, at pp. 416, 417. The view taken by Kindersley, V.C., cannot, in our opinion, be supported by reference to the Companies Act of 1862; and it is inconsistent with the decisions to which we have referred, and which, if wrong, can only now be set right by the House of Lords.

It was, however, contended that this court, at all events, had approved and followed the decisions of Kindersley, V.C.; and Ashbury v. Watson was referred to on this point. In that case the memorandum of association stated that preferential shares might be created and what the preferential rights were to be; and it was held that these were conditions which could be properly introduced into the memorandum of association, and which, being introduced there, could not afterwards be departed from and be treated as articles of association capable of change. No doubt Fry, L.J., relied on The Scarborough Hotel case to show that provisions about preference shares were conditions which could properly be inserted in the memorandum of association, but the propriety of the decision of Kindersley, V.C., in that case was not before the court, and we do not regard Ashbury v. Watson as conflicting with any of the other decisions of the Court of Appeal, in which Kindersley, V.C.'s, decision has been judicially considered. We desire to add that we do not base our judgment in this case on the words "with power to increase the capital as provided by the articles of association," which are in the memorandum of association. That power would have existed under section 12 of the Act if those words had not been in the memorandum. We prefer to rest our decision on the grounds above explained. But the words in the memorandum to which we are now referring certainly show that the conditions on which new capital was to be issued were not to be implied from the memorandum of association, but were to be ascertained from the articles; and as these might be changed from time to time under the powers conferred by sections 50 and 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, it would follow from Harrison v. Mexican Railway Co. and other cases like it that the resolutions of 1865 would be valid, even if the second decision in the Scarborough Hotel case could still be regarded as good law. For the reasons, however, which we have given we are of opinion that the second decision in Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co. was wrong, and ought not to be followed, and that the decision appealed from must be reversed and the resolutions thereby declared to be ultra vires must be declared intra vires and valid. If, by declining to follow the second decision in Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co. we were disturbing titles or embarrassing trade or commerce, we should treat it as one of those decisions which, though wrong, it would be mischievous to overrule. But such is not the case; and it is desirable, from all points of view, to remove from companies a fetter which ought never to have been imposed upon them, and which in practice has been got rid of by skilled draftsmen by the insertion of power to issue preference shares in the original articles of association or the memorandum of association itself. These devices will no longer be necessary. The costs will be provided for as arranged by the parties.

Appeal allowed.

In re ROUNDWOOD COLLIERY CO. (LIMITED). LEE v. ROUNDWOOD COLLIERY CO. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Company—Mining lease—Distress for rent—Express power to seize chattels of lessee on adjoining mine—Bill of sale—Registration—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), ss. 4, 6—Voluntary winding up—Debenture-holders' action—Priority of landlord to debenture-holders.

A power in a lease of a coal mine, which has no separate shaft and can be worked only through a neighbouring colliery, authorizing the lessor to distrain for rent in arrear on chattels of the lessee upon "adjoining or neighbouring collieries" is not a bill of sale within the Bills of Sale Act, 1878.

A distress under such a power made on chattels of the lessee, a limited company, before the commencement of its winding up, and before judgment has been given in a debenture-holders' action or a receiver effectually appointed, is good as against the debenture-holders.

Decision of Stirling, J., ante, p. 217, reversed.

Appeal by Lord Effingham from the decision of Stirling, J., reported ante, p. 217.

The Roundwood Colliery Co. was registered under the Companies Acts on the 19th of November, 1889, and in November, 1891, it duly issued debentures. On the 10th of November, 1890, the company acquired by assignment a lease granted by Mr. Foljambe of a colliery at Rotherham in Yorkshire, having a shaft of its own, for thirty years at a rent of £1,600 a year and royalties.

By a lease dated the 20th of November, 1891, the Earl of Effingham demised to the company certain seams of coal which adjoined those demised by Foljambe, and had always been worked, and could only be worked through Foljambe's colliery. By this lease the landlord was empowered, in case of non-payment of the rent, to distrain upon and sell the goods and chattels of the company "in or about any of the premises hereby demised, or any adjoining or neighbouring collieries."

On the 24th of September, 1896, the company resolved to wind up voluntarily.

On the 1st of October, 1896, a debenture-holders' action was commenced, and on the 7th of October, 1896, an order was made in that action appointing a receiver subject to his giving security, but it was not drawn up and there was no evidence that Lord Effingham had any notice of it.

On the 12th of October, 1896, Lord Effingham, to whom rent was then owing by the company, distrained and seized chattels of the company on Foljambe's colliery.

On the 13th of October, 1896, the winding-up resolution was confirmed, a liquidator was appointed, and the winding up commenced.

On the 15th of October, 1896, judgment was given in the debenture-holders' action, and the receiver, having given security, was duly appointed and proceeded to take possession of the company's property.

Subsequently applications were made by the liquidator and by the plaintiff in the debenture-holders' action for an injunction to stay a sale of the goods distrained, and on the 28th of November, 1896, Stirling, J., made an order staying the sale on the ground that the power in Lord Effingham's lease to distrain upon and seize chattels on adjoining or neighbouring collieries was a bill of sale within the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and as such void for want of registration (see the report ante, p. 217).

Against this decision Lord Effingham appealed. On the appeal another question was raised—viz., whether, assuming the power of distress to be valid, it was exercised too late to prevail against the debenture-holders of the company.

Hastings, Q.C., and Upjohn, for the appellant.—By section 6 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, mining leases are expressly exempted from the Act. A power of distress such as this is a usual power in a lease of a mine which is to be worked along with an adjoining colliery: Davidson's Precedents, 2nd ed., vol. 5, pt. 2, pp. 311, 395; Key and Elphinstone's Precedents, 2nd ed., vol. 1, p. 771; 3rd ed., p. 878; 4th ed., p. 901. A power of distress for rent is not within the Act: In re Willis, Ex parte Kennedy, 36 W. R. 793, 21 Q. B. D. 384, even where in a mining lease it extends to lands other than those demised: Daniel v. Stepney, 22 W. R. 662, L. R. 9 Ex. 185. In Pulbrook v. Ashby, 35 W. R. 779, 56 L. J. Q. B. 376, on which Stirling, J., relied, the power was given to secure a debt and not rent. A clause like this creates a charge upon the adjoining land: Co. Litt. s. 221, p. 146-7. If, therefore, it requires registration under this Act, it must equally require it under section 43 of the Companies Act, 1862.

Buckley, Q.C., Eustace Smith, and Younger, for the respondents.—The Bills of Sale Act, 1878, does not apply to ordinary leases. Mining leases, however, are different from ordinary leases: Gowan v. Christie, L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. 273, 21 W. R. Dig. 132; Coltness Iron Co. v. Black, 29 W. R. 717, 6 App. Cas. 315—and it is because they are different that they are expressly excepted in section 6. This power is not a usual incident of a mining lease, and the section does not, therefore, apply to it. A power of distress in the strict sense is exempt from the Act, but it exists only over the land demised. In Daniel v. Stepney it was not decided that such a power as this was exempt from the Act. The question was never raised. Such a power would be prejudicial to the adjoining landlord. If it is valid without registration, so also might a power be in an agricultural lease to distrain upon a farm in another part of the country. This is a pledge of chattels the existence of which could not in ordinary circumstances be suspected, and it is the policy of the Act to require such pledges to be registered. It is a "licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt" within section 4 of the Act. The claim of the appellant cannot prevail against that of the debenture-holders: In re Opera (Limited), 39 W. R. 705, [1891] 3 Ch. 260; In re Marriage, Neave, & Co., ante, p. 42, [1896] 2 Ch. 663.

Upjohn, in reply.—In re Opera (Limited) only decides that debentures were good against an execution creditor. The appellant claims as an incumbrancer, and is entitled to prevail against the debenture-holders by reason of the priority of his seizure. The debentures do not prevent the chattels from remaining the property of the company: In re Marriage, Neave, & Co., nor did they prevent the company from dealing with them until either it was wound up or a receiver appointed: Wheatley v. Silkstone & Haigh Moor Coal Co., 33 W. R. 797, 29 Ch. D. 715; Biggerstaff v. Rowatt's Wharf Co., 44 W. R. 536, [1896] 2 Ch. 93. The exercise of a right of seizure has been held good as against the assignees of a bankrupt: Krehl v. Great Central Gas Co., 18 W. R. 1035, L. R. 5 Ex. 289, and a power of distress is better than a mere right of seizure. The debenture-holders' floating charge implies a licence to the company to deal with the chattels for the purpose of carrying on its business: Government Stock Investment Co. v. Manila Railway, 44 W. R. 166, [1895] 2 Ch. 551. The case is the same as if on the 12th of October, 1896, specific chattels had been handed to the appellant to secure a debt due to him.

Younger, in reply to Upjohn.—The company had no power to create a specific security in priority to the debentures. If it had such a power, this security was not given for the purpose of carrying on the business.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of Stirling, J., restraining a lessor of a seam of coal in Yorkshire from selling under a distress for rent, goods of his lessee, but which goods were seized on lands not comprised in the lease. Stirling, J., held that the power to distrain for rent off the premises demised was a bill of sale within section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), and that as the lease was not registered as a bill of sale the distress was invalid. Another question was raised before us, which was that, assuming the power of distress to be valid, it was exercised too late to prevail against the debenture-holders of the company,, the company being the lessee. This latter question turns upon circumstances which have no bearing on the decision on the Bills of Sale Act, and for the present it will be convenient to consider those facts only which are material to the extremely important question to which that Act gives rise.

The Roundwood Colliery Co. (Limited) is a company which, at the date of the lease under which the distress was made, was working a colliery at Rotherham, in Yorkshire, under a lease from a gentleman named Foljambe. This colliery had a shaft of its own through which the coal was raised, and which, of course, could be used for working any adjoining minerals which the company might acquire and properly work through Foljambe's colliery. By a lease dated the 20th of November, 1891, the Earl of Effingham demised to the company a seam of coal adjoining Foljambe's colliery at rents varying with the acreage worked. Although these rents were in the nature of royalties payable for the coal won, they were rents which could be distrained for at common law on the property demised, without any express power of distress. This point was settled in Daniel v. Brucie, 6 Q. B. 145. The lease, however, contained a power in case of non-payment of the rent to distrain upon and sell the goods and chattels of the company "in or about any of the premises hereby demised or any adjoining or neighbouring collieries." These last words give rise to the difficulty which has arisen. The seam of coal demised by this lease has always, in fact, been worked through the adjoining mine held by the company under Mr. Foljambe. It is plain, moreover, that this was always contemplated. The lease contained no demise of any surface lands; no provision was made for sinking any pit or shaft, and only one seam of coal was comprised in the lease. The words "neighbouring colliery" are large enough to apply to collieries in the neighbourhood not worked with the seam of coal demised. I am, however, of opinion that to construe those words in that wide sense would be unreasonable and extravagant. The power of distress must, in my opinion, be construed to apply to those neighbouring mines only which, though not actually adjoining the seam of coal demised, might be or become connected with it by underground workings. This is a matter of some importance; for, if the power of distraining off the property demised extended to any goods and chattels of the lessee on any mines in the neighbourhood wholly unconnected with the property demised, the power would be very unusual, and might well be regarded as a licence to seize and sell chattels as distinguished from a power of distress for rent. If, however, the power is read as I read it, that is, as confined to the goods of the lessee on adjoining or neighbouring mines worked with the seam of coal demised, the power is one which is very common in mining leases where the minerals demised are to be worked through and with other mines worked by the same lessee. The precedents referred to by Mr. Upjohn from Davidson's, and Key and Elphinstone's well-known collections, and other precedents which are to be found in Bainbridge on Mines, p. 825, and in 3 Bythewood's Precedents by Robbins, p. 598, show that such a power is by no means uncommon in mineral leases. I do not say it is a usual clause which would be inserted if parties differed, but it is a clause very commonly inserted in such cases as I have mentioned.

Passing now to the Bills of Sale Acts, and speaking of them generally, it is impossible to read the preamble of the Act of 1854, which is the first of the series, without seeing that those Acts are not Acts to amend the law of real property, or the law relating to leases. The object of the Acts is to prevent secret pledges of chattels for money lent. It was not their object to interfere with leases or powers of distress for rents, although provision is made by section 6 of the Act of 1878 for attornments and leases and powers of distress created to secure the repayment of money lent on the security of chattels. I will return to this section presently. Morton v. Woods, 17 W. R. 414, L. R. 4 Q. B. 293 [1869], went far to show that the Act of 1854 did not apply to ordinary leases. In Daniel v. Stepney, L. R. 7 Ex. 327, 9 ibid. 185 [1872 and 1874], the power of distress in a mining lease was extended to chattels off the land demised. The case was decided on demurrer. The pleadings might have raised, but did not raise, the point that the power was invalid under the Act of 1854 as against the plaintiffs, who were trustees for the lessee's creditors. The probable explanation of this is that, having regard to Morton v. Woods the point was not considered worth raising; other cases, especially In re Willis, 36 W. R. 793, 21 Q. B. D. 384 [1888], and In re Standard Manufacturing Co., 39 W. R. 369, [1891] 1 Ch. 627, may also be referred to as showing that distresses for rent, not reserved to secure some other debt, are outside the Bills of Sale Acts altogether. As, however, the exact point which has to be determined has not yet been actually decided, it is necessary to examine more closely sections 4 and 6 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, on which the case really turns. [His lordship referred to those sections, and continued:] It is plain that section 6 was inserted in order to extend the operation of section 4. Section 4 says what a bill of sale shall include. Powers of distress for rent are not mentioned. The only words used in section 4 which are material for the present purpose are "licences to take possession of personal chattels as security for any debt." Those words are the same as those used in the previous Act of 1854, see section 7. But section 6 is evidently based upon the supposition that powers of distress for rent are not within section 4. Section 6 expressly deals with powers of distress, and says that such powers, if conferred by way of security for any debt or advance, are to be "deemed to be bills of sale"—language which plainly does not include an ordinary lease or distress for rent, which is not itself a security for some other debt. But then section 6, whilst enacting that powers of distress if conferred by way of security for a debt or advance are to be deemed bills of sale, contains two exceptions—viz. (1) mining leases, and (2) leases at fair and reasonable rents by mortgagees in possession to their mortgagors. Why mining leases were excepted from section 6 I cannot say. Possibly it was to prevent any doubt arising as to the validity of powers of distress for payments which cannot be distrained for at common law, especially in those so-called mining leases which are mere licences to win and remove minerals. Anyhow, section 6 cannot invalidate any mining leases, nor any power of distress which is commonly inserted in such a document.

The case therefore stands thus. If the power of distress in the present case is to be regarded as a power of distress for rent it is out of the Bills of Sale Act altogether, and is neither within section 4 nor within section 6 of the Act of 1878. If, on the other hand, the power of distress in the present case is not to be regarded as a power of distress for rent, but as a power of distress for a debt, so as to fall within section 6, then, being a common form in a mining lease, it falls within the exception contained in the same section. Either way, therefore, it appears to me that this power is not invalidated by the Act of 1878. If, indeed, powers of distress for rent were "licences to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt" within the meaning of section 4 the case would be very different; for it is reasonably plain that the object and effect of section 6 are to extend and not to curtail the operation of section 4. The case of Pulbrook v. Ashby, on which Stirling, J., relied, appears to me quite consistent with the above view. The power of distress there was not for rent, but for the price of goods sold. Such a power clearly falls within section 4. The decision was quite right. I have no doubt that a power of distress for rent off property demised might be so unusual and suspicious as to justify the inference that a lease containing such a power was being used as a cloak for a transaction which really fell within section 4. But no such inference is possible in the present case. For these reasons I am unable to concur in the view taken by Stirling, J., that the power of distress in this lease is invalid by reason of the Bills of Sale Act.

There remains the other point, to which the learned judge did not allude—viz., the right to distrain as against the debenture-holders of the company. The company had issued debentures in the ordinary form, and those debentures created what is called a floating charge on the goods and chattels of the company. On the 24th of September, 1896, the company resolved to wind up voluntarily, and on the 1st of October, 1896, an ordinary debenture-holders' action was commenced. On the 7th of October, 1896, an order appointing a receiver was made, subject to his giving security. This order, however, was not drawn up, and there is no proof that the lessor had notice of it. On the 12th of October, 1896, the lessor distrained, and seized goods and chattels of the company which were off the property demised—viz., on Mr. Foljambe's adjoining colliery. On the 13th of October, 1896, the resolution to wind up was confirmed, and a liquidator was appointed. The winding up of the company commenced on this day. On the 15th of October, 1896, judgment was given in the debenture-holders' action, and the receiver, having given security, was appointed, and he proceeded to take possession of the property of the company. Shortly afterwards applications were made by the liquidator and by the plaintiff in the debenture-holders' action to stay a sale of the goods distrained, and on the 28th of November, 1896, an order staying the sale was made, on the ground that the distress was invalid under the Bills of Sale Act. This ground being, in my opinion, erroneous it becomes necessary to consider the respective rights of the landlord and of the debenture-holders to the goods seized. These rights depend upon the question whether the landlord distrained while the debentures were still a floating security or whether the debentures are to be regarded as having definitively attached to the goods seized, so that, as between the landlord and the debenture-holders, those goods had become the property of the latter before the landlord seized them. It is not contended that the landlord could distrain, off the property demised, on goods which were not the goods of the company both at law and in equity. The debenture-holders contend that the goods seized were not the goods of the company, except subject to the equitable charge created by the debentures. As between the debenture-holders and the company this proposition is true, but it does not decide the respective rights of the lessor and the debenture-holders, which is what we have to consider. The goods seized by the lessor were seized under a power conferred either before the debentures were issued or whilst they were clearly a floating security, and in either case that power could be exercised before the debentures ceased to be floating securities. They did not cease to be so before the distress was put in. The winding up did not commence until after that date, nor was any effectual order for a receiver made until after the same date. The order of the 7th of October was never really effective. It was never drawn up, the lessor had no notice of it, and before the receiver could take possession he had to give security. The distress, having been made before the commencement of the winding-up of the company, and before a receiver was effectively appointed, was, in my opinion, valid as against the debenture-holders. This conclusion is in accordance with the decision in Biggerstaff v. Rowatt's Wharf Co., and is not at all inconsistent with In re Opera (Limited), which it was held that the sheriff could only seize the goods of a company subject to the equitable rights of the debenture-holders. The right of the sheriff to seize was not conferred by the debts either before the debentures were issued or afterwards with the implied authority of their holders.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed and the order appealed from should be reversed, with costs both here and below. If the goods seized have been sold by the receiver he must pay over the proceeds of sale to the lessor or so much of them as may be necessary to cover the rent distrained for, and the costs of the distress.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In this case this court is asked to hold that a mining lease granted by the Earl Effingham for the purpose of enabling his lessees to work the demised coal, reserving therefor an acreage rent, is a bill of sale within the meaning of the Bills of Sale Acts, and consequently that the lease is void, it not having been registered pursuant to those Acts. It appears that in the years 1890 and 1891 the Earl of Effingham and Mr. Foljambe were respectively owners of seams of coal lying adjacent to each other in the county of York. The shaft whereby these coals would be brought to bank was situated upon the lands of Mr. Foljambe. In these circumstances in the year 1890 a mining lease was granted to a limited company by Mr. Foljambe, which contained the usual covenants to be found in mining leases, as also the covenant by the lessees to pay the rent reserved. It also contained the following power of distress: "Provided always, and it is hereby agreed and declared that if and whenever any of the rents shall be in arrear for twenty-one days, the lessor, his heirs, or assigns may enter and seize, distrain, sell, and dispose of in the same manner as landlords may for rent in arrear any engines, machinery, implements, tools, chattels, or effects then belonging to the lessees or their assigns in or about any of the premises hereby demised, or any adjoining or neighbouring colleries." In 1891 the Earl of Effingham granted a similar lease of his seams of coal to the same lessees, and this lease contained an identical power of distress as that contained in the lease granted by Mr. Foljambe. In due course of working, the coal won by the lessees from the Earl of Effingham's seams was taken by them through the workings in Mr. Foljambe's land and was brought to bank up the shaft constructed thereon, the coal from the two properties being thus worked together. The question is, Is this lease by the Earl of Effingham a bill of sale? I should have thought off-hand that the answer would be "No." But Stirling, J., has held the contrary, and as in argument it has been strongly insisted by counsel for the respondents that he is right, the matter obviously requires serious examination.

In the first place I cannot doubt that had the express power of distress in default of payment of the contracted rent contained in this lease by Lord Effingham been confined to seizing, distraining, selling, and disposing of the lessees' chattels in or about the demised premises it could not have been maintained that the power caused the lease to be a bill of sale within the meaning of section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878; for though such a power might be said to be within the words "licenses to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt," yet, in my judgment, such a power is not within either the object of or the mischief aimed at by the Bills of Sale Acts, which apply to dealings between creditors and debtors, and not to leases between landlords and tenants. The object of the Bills of Sale Acts was not to bring bonâ fide leases within the provisions of those Acts. Such leases are outside those Acts altogether. In the case of Re Willis, Ex parte Kennedy, 21 Q. B. D. 384, Lindley, L.J., sets forth the true view of the provisions of the Bills of Sale Acts of 1854 and 1878. He points out that if those Acts are looked at it will be seen that what the Legislature was aiming at was not the case of leases between landlords and tenants, but the rendering of it compulsory on lenders of money on the security of goods and chattels to register their securities, and that if money be lent on the security of chattels this must be done by a registered bill of sale—and in that I entirely agree. Bowen, L.J., also, when delivering the judgment of his court in In re The Standard Manufacturing Co., [1891] 1 Ch. 627, showed that until the passing of the Act of 1882 the express and avowed design of the Legislature was to strike at frauds perpetrated upon creditors by secret bills of sale; and that although the general words in the Act—the question before the court there was whether debentures of a joint-stock company were bills of sale—were large enough to include debentures, yet they could not, considering the manifest objects of the Acts, be brought within their meaning. I cannot think that though in a mining lease, or indeed in any other lease, there be an express power to distrain upon the demised premises such a power comes within the true meaning of the words, "licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt," and thus render the lease a bill of sale; and I have no doubt that it does not. Indeed this was not disputed at the bar; but why not, if such a power is within the actual words of section 4 of the Act of 1878? It was said that such an express power in a lease was merely the expression of the right that every landlord possessed at common law—namely, a right of distress upon the demised premises, and was not therefore within the meaning of the words of the section. But I think that the true answer to be given is, because real leases with real rents reserved are not within the scope of the Bills of Sale Acts at all. I do not doubt that there may be provisions inserted in a lease which would bring the instrument, although principally a lease, within the provisions of the Bills of Sale Acts and the case of Pulbrook v. Ashby is an instance of this. There by the lease the landlord took an express power to distrain upon the demised premises for money due for goods sold and delivered by him to the tenant, and this power of distress was held to be a "licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt" within section 4, and in this I agree. It was a power having no relation whatever to rent due from a tenant to his landlord; it was altogether outside the relationship of landlord and tenant, and had reference to that of debtor and creditor. To get a lease within section 4 of the Act of 1878, there must be in the lease something in addition to and dehors the lease which sins against provisions of the Bills of Sale Acts. Stirling, J., said the present case was on all fours with that of "a lessor granting an ordinary lease of a house, but reserving to himself a power to distrain on goods of a lessee found in another house not comprised in the lease"; and he said that he thought that such a power would be a "licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt." Such a power, I apprehend, would be wholly exceptional, if not unique. I never saw the like. If the power to distrain in the present case gave power to distrain upon the goods of the lessee, say, in Grosvenor-square, as was put in argument, I should have thought that such an exceptional and peculiar power might legitimately give rise to the inference that it was not really a power whereby to enforce the landlord's usual and ordinary rights against his tenant, but inserted for some other purpose foreign to the relationship of landlord and tenant, in which case the instrument might well be held to be a lease and something more, which something more might then come within the words of section 4 as a "licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt," and thus be a bill of sale, and require to be registered. But that case is not this case. In the present case the power to distrain upon "any adjoining or neighbouring colliery" is by no means unique or exceptional in mining leases. It is a power inserted in mining leases when it is intended that two collieries are to be worked together, as in the present case. And so we find a like power was inserted in the lease by Mr. Foljambe. Similar forms of powers are to be found in the recognized and well-known precedents of forms of mining leases. To these Lindley, L.J., has referred. The true construction of this power to distrain upon "any adjoining or neighbouring collieries" is not, in my opinion, a power that the lessor may distrain upon the lessees' chattels upon any collieries in the neighbourhood, no matter where situated, upon which the lessees might happen to have chattels. The power is expressly confined to adjoining or neighbouring collieries, and it would be a most unreasonable and not the true construction of the power to hold that it extended to collieries wholly unconnected with the demised seams of coal. It is a power limited by the subject-matter to which it was applied—viz., a power to distrain upon an adjoining or neighbouring colliery worked, as in this case in connection with the demised premises. I cannot bring myself to think that the present lease is a mining lease and something more, for in my judgment it is a mining lease and nothing more, and therefore not a bill of sale within the true intent and meaning of section 4 of the Act of 1878.

As regards the argument of Mr. Graham Hastings for the earl, founded upon section 6—viz., that this section comprises real bonâ fide transactions between real landlords and real tenants in which are reserved real rents, and consequently, as leases are within section 6 they are not within section 4, I am by no means convinced that section 6 applies in any way to what I will call real bonâ fide leases between landlords and tenants with real rents; and in my opinion it does not. In my view section 6 was intended to defeat the schemes of lenders of money who had resort to forms embracing ostensibly the relation of landlords and tenants for the purpose of securing their advances and the accruing interest thereon; and it does not embrace the case of real bonâ fide leases with actual rents. But if I am wrong as to this and section 6 does include such leases, though I think it does not, then it is obvious it does not include the present case for mining leases are expressly excepted from the section.

As regards the further point which was taken by Mr. Buckley, that if the power to distrain be held valid and the lease not a bill of sale, in that case the distress could not be made effective against the debenture-holders, I have nothing to add to what my brother Lindley has said thereon, and I agree with him. For these reasons I think this appeal must be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—Concurring as I do in the judgments already given, I will only say, out of respect for the learned judge from whose judgment we are differing, so much as will explain my view of the true construction of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. By section 3 the Act is to apply to "every bill of sale"—I will not read the whole of the section—"whereby the holder or grantee has power . . . to seize or take possession of any personal chattels comprised in or made subject to such bill of sale." The definition of "bill of sale," which is contained in section 4, comprises "licences to take possession of personal chattels as security for any debt," words which were found in the previous Act of 1854. Now, having regard to the purview of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, I am satisfied that it never was intended to include powers of distress contained in mining leases or others which are reserved or incident by the common law to landlords in any usual and well-known form of lease. I think that this was clearly established before the passing of the Act of 1878, and, indeed, there were decisions which seem to me to have gone much further—namely, those which held that, where in mortgages there was an attornment at what is called a "rent," and what technically is a rent, but which was not a rent incident to any ordinary agreement between landlord and tenant, but a mere security for money, it was nevertheless outside the Act.

By reason of those decisions it was thought necessary to insert the provision included in the Act of 1878, s. 6. The effect of that section is, to my mind, that with the express exception therein contained of mining leases, and leases made by mortgagees who have actually entered into possession and actually made a demise to their mortgagors, artificial rents created by attornment and also by powers of distress are not to be treated as arrangements between landlord and tenant, but that the existence of them will be treated as nothing more than giving licences to seize chattels as security for a debt, and that consequently they are within the Bills of Sale Act. Therefore for my part I do not doubt that a power of distress, even though it be contained and included in the lease, may be of such a nature as to be entirely outside the scope of ordinary agreements between landlord and tenant; and I should accept such a case as that of a brewer's lease as one of those cases. I think that if in a lease you take a power of distress over property entirely unconnected with the demised premises, that would be outside; as, for instance, where there is a demise of one house—as in the case put by the learned judge in the court below—with a power of distress over the chattels in another. That is because no one could suppose that in the ordinary course of events the owner of a town house had in any way pledged his furniture for the rent of a property which might be situated far away in the country, and with which there was no apparent connection at all. Such a power of distress, it appears to me, would really be a licence to seize whatever chattels there might be in the house at the time when it was exercised; and with regard to those chattels in that house the rent would not be rent at all; it would be a debt and nothing else. That being so, we have to consider whether we can distinguish the present case from cases of that description. I think that we can, and on this plain ground: Here we have a mining lease containing provisions which, construed as they have been by Lindley, L.J.,—a construction which I do not differ from—are, I will not say "usual," because I have no means of knowing whether they are usual or not, but at any rate not uncommon and not unreasonable terms in a mining lease, where the minerals are of necessity worked through an adjoining or neighbouring mine in the sense which we give to the words in this lease, and where the chattels may or may not be at the moment when a distress is being put in, on the very mine which is the subject of the lease, or on the mine through which the minerals are being carried. Of course the reasonableness of that view is made more clear by the fact that there may be mining leases in which powers of distress are given, although there be no absolute interest in any land or in any minerals demised. Though a well-known incidence of the mining industry, they are not in any way, according to my view, within the meaning of the Bills of Sale Act. I think, therefore, that the power of distress is fairly within what is understood to be an arrangement between the owner of a mine and the person who works under a lease from him, or a licence from him through a neighbouring mine.

With regard to the other question, about debenture-holders, since the learned judge in the court below did not deal with that I have nothing to add. Therefore I say nothing at all upon that except that I agree.

Ex parte WARD. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Officer retired from the Army—Appropriation of pay or salary—Pension—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 53, sub-sections 1, 2.

An officer who has retired from the Army with permission, and who is placed on the reserve list and receives retired pay under Article 1057 of the Royal Warrant, 1887, is in receipt of a salary or income within the meaning of sub-section 2, and not within sub-section 1 of section 53 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and therefore, in the event of his bankruptcy, the court may order so much of such pay as it thinks just to be distributed amongst the creditors without obtaining the consent of the chief officer of the department under which the pay is enjoyed, as required by sub-section 1.

Sub-section 1 relates to the case where a bankrupt is in receipt of pay for services which he is still rendering, while sub-section 2 relates to the case where he is in receipt of pay for services which he has already performed.

This was an appeal by the debtor, from an order made by Mr. Registrar Linklater under section 53 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, whereby the appellant, a retired military officer, was ordered to pay the official receiver the sum of £40 per annum out of the pension he received as a retired officer.

The appellant had been formerly lieutenant-colonel of the 2nd Battalion Cameronians.

In April, 1888, he retired from the Army under article 77 of the Royal Warrant (Pay and Promotion) of 1887, and was placed upon the reserve list. He elected to retire, and so was not placed upon half-pay, but received a pension of £420 per annum, which, after deduction of income tax, amounted to £406.

The Royal Warrant of 1887 provides as follows:

Article 77: "A lieutenant-colonel shall, if not previously liable to retirement on account of age, be placed upon half-pay, unless he elect to retire from our Army, on completing four years' service in command of a regiment of cavalry or a battalion of infantry."

Article 103: "A retired officer, whether he shall have commuted his retired pay or not, shall remain liable to be recalled to service in our regular forces at a time of emergency until the age of . . . fifty-five, if he retire as major, lieutenant-colonel, or colonel."

Article 519: "The reserve of officers shall be composed of (a) officers who have served in our regular forces, but who, having retired either with retired pay or gratuity are still liable for service in case of emergency."

Article 520: "An officer retired from our Army on a pension or gratuity with the condition of being liable for service in a case of emergency shall be an Army reserve officer, so long as he is liable for service."

Article 1057: "An officer permitted to retire from our Army shall receive upon retirement a gratuity or retired pay according to the following scale. . . . After four years' employment as substantive lieutenant-colonel or colonel in our cavalry or infantry, £420 yearly."

The appellant was under fifty-five years of age. He had no other income than his pension, and out of this had to support himself, his wife, and a young child.

The appellant was indebted to his solicitor to the amount of about £250. This was his only liability, and was a judgment debt.

On the application of the official receiver the registrar made the above order.

Section 53 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, provides as follows:

(1) "Where a bankrupt is an officer of the Army or Navy, or an officer or clerk or otherwise employed or engaged in the Civil Service of the Crown, the trustee shall receive for distribution amongst the creditors so much of the bankrupt's pay or salary as the court, on the application of the trustee, with the consent of the chief officer of the department under which the pay or salary is enjoyed, may direct. Before making any order under this sub-section the court shall communicate with the chief officer of the department as to the amount, time, and manner of the payment to the trustee, and shall obtain the written consent of the chief officer to the terms of such payment."

(2) "Where a bankrupt is in receipt of a salary or income other than as aforesaid, or is entitled to any half-pay, or pension, or to any compensation granted by the Treasury, the court, on the application of the trustee, shall from time to time make such order as it thinks just for the payment of the salary, income, half-pay, pension, or compensation, or any part thereof, to the trustee to be applied by him in such manner as the court may direct."

H. Reed, Q.C. (E. P. Willes with him), for the appellant.—The appellant is an officer in receipt of pay within the meaning of sub-section 1 of section 53, as he is still liable to serve in a case of emergency, and therefore the consent of the chief officer of the department under which such pay is made must be obtained. This consent was not obtained, and therefore the order of the registrar is void. Sub-section 2 does not apply in this case, as the appellant is not an officer in receipt of half-pay, nor a pension for past services, as he is still in the service of the Crown, nor in receipt of compensation. The pay or salary which the appellant receives comes within the rule laid down in Ex parte Webber, 35 W. R. 308, 18 Q. B. D. 111. The court ought not, in the exercise of its discretion, to make an order where the officer has no other income than his pay: Ex parte Saunders, 44 W. R. 30, [1895] 2 Q. B. 424; In re Shine, 40 W. R. 386, [1892] 1 Q. B. 522.

Sir R. Webster, A.G. (Muir Mackenzie with him), for the official receiver.—This case comes within sub-section 2. The appellant is in receipt of a pension for past services. Sub-section 1 applies only to officers on active service. The appellant is not on active service, though he is liable to serve in a case of emergency. Therefore, the consent of the chief of the department is not necessary before an order can be made, and the order now appealed from is valid. The amount ordered to be paid is entirely a matter of discretion. The registrar in this case has exercised his discretion properly.

Counsel cited Ex parte Huggins, 30 W. R. 878, 21 Ch. D. 85.

E. P. Willes replied.

(a) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The first thing we have to do is to construe section 53 of the Bankruptcy Act, and then to apply it to the case of an officer in the Army in the position of the bankrupt.

Now, the first sub-section appears to me to relate to the case where the bankrupt is an officer who is in receipt of pay or salary for services which he is still rendering, and does not apply to the pay, or whatever the other sum may be called, which is not given to him in respect of services which he is performing, but which is given to him in respect of services which he has already performed. Then the second sub-section provides for the case "Where a bankrupt officer is in receipt of a salary or income other than aforesaid"—that is, in receipt of salary or income other than pay for services which he is rendering, 'or is entitled to any half-pay or pension, or any compensation granted by the Treasury.'"

Now, what is this officer entitled to? He is an officer who has been permitted to retire from the Army under the Royal Warrant of 1887. Now, that cannot mean retired altogether from the Army so that he has no longer any relation to it, because he is still bound by certain rules of the Army, therefore it means retired from the Army in the sense in which that is meant in article 1057 of the Royal Warrant. "An officer permitted to retire from our Army shall receive, upon retirement, a gratuity or retired pay according to the following scale." Now, that gratuity is not in respect of services which he is rendering, because if he has retired from the Army in the sense in which that article means, he is not doing any service. It is true he may, if he is put on the reserve list, be called upon to serve in the event of an emergency; but what he is receiving is a payment, not in respect of services which he is rendering, but for services which he has rendered. I am of opinion that wherever that is so—that is to say, wherever article 1057 applies—the case is within sub-section 2, and not sub-section 1. That is the short way of enunciating the rule applicable to this case. Therefore the objection to the order on the ground that the leave of the chief of the department was not obtained falls to the ground. Now there comes a rather more difficult question, which is this: How ought the discretion given by section 53 to be exercised in this case? The registrar has exercised his discretion and has said that £40 a year must be given over to the trustee. He first of all laid down the right rule—that this is a matter of discretion depending upon that knowledge of life which the court is assumed to have, and which it is bound to have—the general knowledge of life, not a knowledge of law—and that it must bring to bear that knowledge of life to each particular case itself, without reference to any other; then, having said that he broke from that rule which he had laid down, and which is the right rule, and began to consider it, not from his general knowledge of the world applied to this case, but he looked out for what he calls help or assistance from what learned judges have said in other cases.

It is now for me to exercise my knowledge of life. I take into account in this case that the bankrupt is an officer who has been a colonel, and I take into account that he is an officer in ill-health, and who will, therefore, require medical assistance, and probably from time to time change of air. Then I consider that this officer has nothing but this allowance, he has nothing else, neither has his wife anything else. That is all he has to live upon. He has a young child, and he has, therefore, a nurse, and there is the washing for himself and his wife, and the nurse and the baby, and there is the medicine which is necessary for him. I think at least we ought to allow him to live, not as if he were a working man, but to live as a colonel in the Army may, without extravagance, be expected to live. I think to reduce this sum of £406, which is his only income, by £40 is a greater reduction than we ought to make; it is more than will leave him after that sufficient to live with his wife and child as I think he ought to do. I think, therefore, that this £40 is more than I should take off in this case. I should think if £20 a year is taken from him that would be sufficient to meet the justice of the case. I think, therefore, we should reduce the sum mentioned in the registrar's order from £40 to £20, leaving the whole of the rest of the order exactly and precisely as it is.

LOPES, L.J.—The question here is whether this case is brought within sub-section 1 or sub-section 2 of section 53 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Now it is important, in the first place, I think, to consider what Colonel Ward is. He is an officer coming under the description in Article 1057—namely, an officer permitted to retire from the Army but subject to be recalled into active service in case of emergency. That he comes under that rule is pretty clear, because I find that £420 is the exact sum which is given as retired pay to a colonel after four years' employment as substantive Lieutenant-Colonel or Colonel in the cavalry or infantry.

Now, that being so, does he come within sub-section 1 or sub-section 2? In my judgment sub-section 1 is intended to apply to "pay or salary"—those are the words used—"where the bankrupt is an officer in the Army receiving pay or salary," meaning thereby full pay or full salary for services then being rendered at that time. In that case it seems very intelligible indeed why the consent of the chief officer of the department should be obtained before any order directing any portion of the pay or salary to be applied in payment of the debts is made. I can quite understand that because it may be that the officer is entrusted with some command, and it is necessary that he should maintain a certain position and would require certain funds in order to support that position. I can quite understand it is very undesirable indeed that any reduction should be made in the remuneration that he is receiving unless the consent of the chief of the department is first obtained. I should say, if Colonel Ward was brought within the first sub-section of section 53, this order could not be made, because this consent has not been obtained; that is admitted. However, I think that sub-section 1 applies to an officer who at the time in question is engaged on active service, and receiving for services then being rendered full pay or salary. But then, when we come to sub-section 2 the words are very different. They are: "Where the bankrupt is in receipt of a salary or income other than as aforesaid." Now "other than as aforesaid" I understand to mean other than pay or salary spoken of in the previous sub-section. The case of Colonel Ward comes within that section. I think, therefore, the order was properly made, and that there was jurisdiction to make it under that section.

Then, with regard to the amount, of course that is a matter entirely in the discretion of the court, and it is said here in this case that the sum of £40, which has been directed to be paid to the trustee for the purpose of discharging the debt, is too large. I am inclined on the whole to think that probably it is more than should be directed. We have had furnished to us a very carefully prepared list of the expenses to which the Colonel and his establishment are subjected. The Master of the Rolls has dealt with that at length, and as he has had a very long experience of life, and thinks that £20 would be sufficient, I think the order should be so varied.

CHITTY, L.J.—I also think there was jurisdiction to make this order, and that the case falls within sub-section 2 of section 53. There was an attempt made to argue that the case did not fall within section 53 at all. I agree with the argument so far as the first sub-section is concerned. I think that the first sub-section, which applies not merely to an officer in the Army or Navy, but to an officer or clerk "otherwise employed or engaged in the Civil Service of the Crown," applies to them when they are in active employment, and that is the reason why the consent of the chief officer of the department is required before the court sees fit to deal with the case. With regard to an officer in the Army on active service, the reason for obtaining the consent of the chief officer of the department is to see whether his reduced salary would be sufficient to support him in the position in life in which he is while in the service.

Then I pass to the second sub-section, which deals not merely with officers in the Army and Navy, but also with officers and clerks, and I think these are the words which bear upon the case, "entitled to any half-pay or pension or to any compensation."

Now, this officer has retired from the Queen's Army, and what he is now in the enjoyment of is, in substance, a pension for past services, not the less so because there may be included in what he receives a sort of retaining fee for serving his country or the Queen again.

Then with regard to the discretion, it is quite unnecessary for me to go over the circumstances again. They have been very carefully considered by us all, and I think the proposed reduction is right. The discretion must be exercised judicially and carefully upon all the circumstances of the particular case, and I cannot find any assistance from decisions in other cases under other circumstances.

Order varied accordingly.

In re THE MANCHESTER AND MILFORD RAILWAY CO. Ex parte THE CAMBRIAN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway company — Judgment against — Execution — Private Act of Parliament—Action not on a contract —The Railway Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 127), s. 4.

Section 4 of the Railway Companies Act, 1867, prohibits the issue of execution against a railway company in two classes of cases only—i.e., where the judgment is recovered (a) in an action on a contract entered into after the passing of the Act; and (b) in an action not on a contract commenced after the passing of the Act—and the burden of proof is upon those who assert that in any particular case the issue of execution is prohibited.

A private Act of Parliament, passed in 1862, imposed upon the L. Railway Co. a liability to do certain acts for the benefit of the M. Railway Co., in respect whereof certain payments were thereby directed to be made by the M. Co. to the L. Co., and for the recovery of such payments a remedy by action against the M. Co. was thereby given to the L. Co. Neither of the said companies was competent to enter into any agreement embodying the said provisions of the Act.

Held, that actions brought after 1880, by the L. Co. against the M. Co. to recover the aforesaid payments were actions "not on a contract" within the meaning of section 4 of the Act of 1867; and that, such actions having been commenced after the passing of that Act, the judgments obtained therein could not be enforced by the issue of execution.

This was a summons on behalf of the Cambrian Railway Co. for leave to issue execution in respect of ten debts due on judgments recovered against the Manchester and Milford Railway Co. at various dates from the 19th of May, 1883, to the 28th of June, 1895, on the rolling stock and other chattels of the company; or in the alternative, for a declaration that the applicants were entitled to a charge on the rolling stock and other chattels in respect of the judgment debts, and that a proper sum might be fixed and paid by the receiver for the use and occupation of the rolling stock and chattels.

It was admitted at the hearing that although the summons was expressed to be in the alternative, the strict right, if any, of the applicants was according to the first alternative, but it was stated that they were willing to accept relief in accordance with the second.

The circumstances which gave rise to the application were shortly these:

In 1860 there were three railway companies authorized to make lines of railway to stations in Llanidloes, in Wales—viz., the Llanidloes and Newtown Railway Co., the Mid-Wales Railway Co., and the Manchester and Milford Railway Co.; and the railways, as they appproached Llanidloes, ran parallel and close to each other.

To avoid unnecessary expense an arrangement was made between the three companies and embodied in a written agreement, whereby it was provided, inter alia, that the Llanidloes and Newtown Co. should adopt and pay for the lands and works between Llanidloes and Penpontbren, then in possession of the Mid-Wales Co. and the Manchester and Milford Co., to a point at Penpontbren equally suitable to the departures of both the above lines for their respective routes, and make a double line to such point; that the station at Llanidloes, including both passengers' and goods', and all accommodation required for the three companies should be made by and be the property of the Llanidloes and Newtown Co.; that the Mid-Wales, and the Manchester and Milford Companies should have equal rights of user of the station with the Llanidloes and Newtown Co.; and should each pay 5 per cent. upon one-third of the cost of such station; that the line, when made, was to be, without the right of user except for the purposes of maintenance, the property of the Llanidloes and Newtown Co., who were to grant to each of the other two companies full powers to use the line, they paying 5 per cent. each on a moiety of the whole outlay, with a pro rata proportion of the costs of sustaining and repairing the lines; and that each of the three companies should join in doing all that was necessary to obtain the authority of Parliament to carry out these arrangements.

This agreement received Parliamentary sanction by Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. clxii.) passed the 17th of July, 1862.

This Act provided for the transfer of the lands and line of railway to the Llanidloes and Newtown Co.,

and for the construction and maintenance by them of the joint line and station, and for the user of the joint line by the other two companies, and of the joint station by the three companies. Section 27 enacted that after the opening of the joint line for public traffic, the Mid-Wales Co. and the Manchester and Milford Co. should pay half-yearly to the Llanidloes and Newtown Co. interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on the amount actually expended by the Llanidloes and Newtown Co. upon the joint line, and should also, at the end of each half-year after such opening, repay to the Llanidloes and Newtown Co. the amount actually expended by them in the previous half-year in maintaining the joint line, and that the interest and other payments should be due from and paid by the Mid-Wales Co. and the Manchester and Milford Co. in moieties, and that if those companies, or either of them, should make default in payment of the moiety of such interest or other payments due from each of them respectively, after demand should have been made by the Llanidloes and Newtown Co. for payment thereof, such moiety might be recovered by such company from the company making such default in any county or other court having by law cognizance of the action. Section 30 contained similar provisions for the payment to and recovery by the Llanidloes and Newtown Co. of interest at the rate aforesaid, on one-third of the amount actually expended by such company on the joint station, and also of one-third of the amount of the cost of maintaining the same.

The joint line and station were duly constructed by by the Llanidloes and Newtown Co., whose undertaking and rights subsequently became vested in the Cambrian Railway Co., the applicants.

The joint station had been maintained by the applicants.

The Manchester and Milford Co. never completed their line, and never were in a position to use the joint line and station; but it was decided in an action in the Queen's Bench Division, brought by the Cambrian Co. against the Manchester and Milford Co., that the Manchester and Milford Co. were, nevertheless, bound to make the payments provided for by sections 27 and 30 of the said Act of 1862; and the judgments mentioned in the summons had been obtained in respect of arrears of such payments.

On the 23rd of July, 1875, upon the petition of certain judgment creditors of the Manchester and Milford Co., a receiver of the undertaking was appointed under the Railway Companies Act of 1867; subsequently, on the 14th of April, 1880, an order was made on the application of the Cambrian Co. for the appointment of a manager and receiver of the undertaking (see In re Manchester and Milford Railway, Ex parte Cambrian Railway, 14 Ch. D. 645, 28 W. R. Dig. 190).

The undertaking still remained in the hands of such manager and receiver.

Section 4 of the Railway Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 127), which was passed on the 20th of August, 1867, provides that "The engines . . . used or provided by a company shall not . . . be liable to be taken in execution at law or in equity at any time after the passing of this Act where the judgment on which execution issues is recovered in an action on a contract entered into after the passing of this Act, or in an action not on a contract, commenced after the passing of this Act," and enables the judgment creditor to obtain the appointment of a receiver and (if necessary) a manager of the undertaking of the company.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and G. Cave, for the applicants.—The Act of 1867 does not apply here. The applicants are seeking to enforce a contract made in 1862 and sanctioned by the Act of 1862—that is to say, it is a contract not made since the passing of the Act of 1867: Rothes (Countess of) v. Kirkcaldy, &c., 7 App. Cas. 694.

Buckley, Q.C., and F. C. Norton, for the Manchester and Milford Railway Co.—The agreement of 1862 was not a contract at all, it was an obligation imposed upon the parties under a Parliamentary sanction not having any of the ordinary incidents of a contract, for the parties had no power to rescind or vary it, and the actions in which these judgments were obtained were therefore not actions upon any contract.

Hastings, Q.C., replied.

STIRLING, J., stated the facts and said: The present application is to be regarded as one not for payment by the receiver, but for leave to issue execution against property in his hands as an officer of the court; and the question is whether section 4 of the Act of 1867 has deprived the applicants of the right to issue such execution. [His lordship read section 4.] I read that section as prohibiting the issue of execution in two classes of cases only—viz., (1) where the judgment is recovered in an action on a contract entered into after the passing of the Act; and (2) where the judgment is recovered in an action not on a contract commenced after the passing of the Act (the 20th of August, 1867).

It lies, therefore, with those who say that the issue of execution is prohibited to show that the judgment falls within one or other of these two classes of cases.

On behalf of the Manchester and Milford Co. it is said that the actions in which these judgments were recovered were actions "not on a contract" within the meaning of the Act of 1867. On the other hand the applicants contend that these actions were brought on a contract—i.e., that constituted by the Private Act passed on the 17th of July, 1862, a date prior to the passing of the Railway Companies Act, 1867.

I think that under the terms "actions on a contract," and "actions not on a contract," as used in section 4, every kind of action is included. If, then, the actions in which these judgments were recovered do not fall within the first class of cases they fall within the second class, all of them having been commenced subsequently to the passing of the Act of 1867.

The question, then, is, were these actions "actions on a contract"?

Now, at the date when the arrangement embodied in the deed of the 20th of October, 1861, was made, these companies had no power to enter into a contract to any such effect as therein expressed. The arrangement of 1861 was ultra vires of the three companies, and the heads of agreement in which it was embodied, though under the seals of the three companies, could not give rise to any rights as between them, and did not constitute a contract between them.

The rights and obligations of the several companies depend entirely on the Act of Parliament. The Act does not purport to ratify or make binding on the companies the heads of agreement. It empowers the Llanidloes and Newtown Co. to construct certain works; it then, by sections 27 and 30, confers on the same company, upon its constructing and maintaining those works, a right to receive from the Manchester and Milford Co. certain payments, and imposes on the Manchester and Milford Co. an obligation to make those payments, and those payments are specially made recoverable by action.

The Act therefore imposes a liability on the predecessors of the Cambrian Co., and gives a remedy in respect of that liability, by action. Those predecessors were no doubt willing that the liability should be imposed, but they had no capacity to enter into a contract to that effect. Moreover, the liability becomes absolute not upon the Manchester and Milford Co. doing any act whatever, but simply upon certain things being done by the Llanidloes and Newtown Co. It seems to me under those circumstances that the action to enforce the liability is not an action on a contract, but an action on a statute. It is no doubt true that there are cases in which "a statute enables an action to be brought which, nevertheless, is not an action on a statute," per Maule, J., in Cork and Bandon Railway v. Goode, 1 W. R. 410, 13 C. B. 826. An illustration of this is afforded by the case of the Tobacco Pipe Makers' Co. v. Loder, 16 Q. B. 765, which was brought to recover a penalty under a bye-law from the defendant, who was a member of the plaintiff company. There the bye-law was made under powers contained in a Royal Charter incorporating the company, and it was contended that the right to recover was under the Charter so as to be a specialty and not a simple contract, debt, but it was held that the defendant had incurred the liability to the penalty by becoming a member of the company, and thus impliedly contracting to fulfil the obligations imposed by the bye-laws on the members of the company. If the bye-law had been made under the powers conferred by statute the result would, I apprehend, have been the same. If in the present case it had been necessary in order that the Manchester and Milford Co. should incur liability that that company should do some act, as, for example, use the joint line or station, then there would have been much ground for contending that the case fell under the principle of the last mentioned case, but the decision of the Queen's Bench Division shows conclusively that the liability of the Manchester and Milford Co. became absolute without any act on the part of that company.

For the applicants reliance was placed on the case of Rothes (Countess) v. Kirkcaldy Waterworks, in which it is said [7 App. Cas. p. 707] that a statutory provision such as was found in a particular section of the private Act of Parliament there under consideration "must be regarded as a contract between the parties, whether made by their mutual agreement or forced upon them by the Legislature." The section there under consideration conferred a benefit on a private person whose estates were affected. Whether the same principle applies to a case such as the present, where the Legislature is modifying statutory rights conferred upon public companies may require further consideration. In any case, it appears to me that this language does not mean that such enactments constitute contracts for all purposes. I think it means simply that for certain purposes—e.g., ascertaining the legal effect of such clauses and the nature of the rights conferred by them, enactments of this kind are to be treated as if they were contracts. I cannot look upon that language as authorizing me to hold that these actions were "actions on a contract" within the meaning of section 4 of the Act of 1867.

In my judgment, therefore, the application must be refused.

[Notice of appeal against this decision was given, but on the appeal coming on to be heard on the 11th of January, 1897, the appeal was withdrawn.]

Inland revenue—Account stamp duty—Voluntary disposition—Death of donor within twelve months—Incidence of duty—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 12), ss. 38, 39—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 7), s. 11.

Account stamp duty in respect of property coming within the meaning of section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, is payable by the person delivering the account thereof required by section 39 of that Act, and not out of the estate of the deceased.

Adjourned summons.

The question which arose for determination upon this summons was whether account stamp duty in respect of a certain sum of £1,700, given by the testatrix, Mary Foster, to the defendant, Arthur Foster, within twelve calendar months previous to her death on the 14th of November, 1892, ought to be paid by the said defendant or out of the estate of the testatrix.

Sub-section 2 of section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, provides that the personal or moveable property to be included in an account shall be property of the following descriptions—viz., (a) "Any property taken as a donatio mortis causâ made by any person dying on or after the 1st of June, 1881, or taken under a voluntary disposition made by any person so dying, purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos, whether by way of transfer, delivery, declaration of trust, or otherwise which shall not have been bonâ fide made three months before the death of the deceased"; and section 39 of the same Act enacts as follows: "Every person who as beneficiary, trustee, or otherwise, acquires possession or assumes the management of any personal or moveable property of a description to be included in an account according to the preceding section shall, upon retaining the same for his own use, or distributing or disposing thereof, and in any case within six calendar months after the death of the deceased, deliver to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue a full and true account, verified by oath, of such property, duly stamped as required by this Act."

By section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, the period of three months specified in section 38 of the Act of 1881 was extended to twelve months.

G. Henderson, for the plaintiff, one of the residuary legatees under the testatrix's will.—Section 39 of the Act of 1881 requires that the donee of such a gift as this should bring in a full and true account verified by oath and duly stamped; and the true inference is that the duty of providing the stamp is imposed upon him. There is no action known to the law by which the donee, having himself paid this duty, can recover it from the deceased's estate.

In re Croft, 40 W. R. 425, [1892] 1 Ch. 652, was referred to.

Warrington, Q.C., and Beaumont, for the defendant.—The duty is payable by the testatrix's estate. The object of the Act is to prevent the Crown from being defrauded. If this money had been left in the estate the estate would have been larger and the amount of duty payable in respect of it would have been greater. The estate, therefore, ought to bear the burden of this duty.

(a.) Reported by R. J. A. MORRISON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They referred to In re Bourne, 41 W. R. 70, [1893] 1 Ch. 188.

KEKEWICH, J.—It seems to me that this question is not covered by authority. In re Croft was cited to me, but I do not think it has anything to do with this case. In this Act there is not to be found a direction how probate duty is to be paid, but one does not expect to find administration rules laid down in an Act of Parliament. Section 38 imposes new duties [his lordship referred to the section] and says that the property therein specified shall pay duty. Now, if the matter rested there, the duty would be borne by the testatrix's estate. Section 39, however, says that "every person who as beneficiary, trustee, or otherwise, acquires possession, or assumes the management of any personal or moveable property of a description to be included in an account according to the preceding section," must render an account as therein specified, and this provision is, no doubt, for the protection of the Crown. Such person is to render the account, and the account is to be brought in duly stamped. The obvious result is that the person who renders it must pay the stamp duty, and that the liability to render the account must carry with it the liability to pay the duty. It has been urged in argument that there is no right of action left to the donee by which, if he pay the duty, he can recover it from the testatrix's estate. I am of opinion that in the circumstances he would not have any such right of action. Whether, on the other hand, if the duty were paid out of the estate, the residuary legatees would have any right of action for the recovery of the duty against the donee, I do not decide, as the question does not arise. As regards the liability to the Crown under the account, therefore, I think the donee ought to pay the duty.

Q. B. Div.
(Wright and Bruce, JJ.) Jan. 19, 29.

BRETT v. ROGERS. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Covenant by lessee to pay all taxes, rates, and duties imposed in respect of the premises—Cost of new drainage—Liability of lessee.

By indenture of lease a tenant covenanted that he would "pay the land tax, sewers rate, and all other taxes, rates, duties, assessments, and impositions, parliamentary, parochial, or otherwise, which now are or shall at any time during this demise be assessed or imposed on, or in respect of, the said demised premises, or of the rent hereby reserved." The vestry of the parish having, under the provisions of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, required the landlord to lay down new drainage on the demised premises, the latter executed the necessary works.

Held, that the landlord was entitled under the covenant to recover from the tenant the expenses the landlord had incurred in complying with the order of the vestry.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of his Honour Judge Bacon at the Bloomsbury County Court.

The plaintiff was the landlord of a house in York-terrace, Regent's Park, which, by a lease dated the 24th of April, 1896, he demised to the defendant for 25 years. In the lease the defendant covenanted that he would "pay the land tax, sewers rate, and all other taxes, rates, duties, assessments, and impositions, parliamentary, parochial, and otherwise, which now are or shall at any time during this demise be assessed or imposed on, or in respect of, the said demised premises, or of the rent hereby reserved."

The plaintiff, by notice served upon him by the vestry under the powers conferred upon them by the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, was required to abate a nuisance arising from the defective state of the drains of the demised house, by putting in a new and proper system of drainage. The plaintiff did the work as required by the vestry, and in so doing incurred an expense of £43 18s. He then brought this action to recover this sum from the defendant on the ground that the latter was liable under the aforesaid covenant.

The county court judge held the defendant was so liable, and gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendant now appealed.

Archibald Brown, for the appellant.—The tenant is not liable under the covenant. The word "duties" in the covenant does not impose an obligation on the tenant to lay down a new drainage. That is a duty imposed by statute upon the landlord. The word "duties" has no wider meaning than "rates and taxes." The tenant is not liable to lay down new drains unless words are used in the covenant that imply a much larger obligation than the words employed here do. This case differs from Budd v. Marshall, 29 W. R. 148, 5 C. P. D. 481. In that case the covenant contained the words "bear, pay, and discharge." In the present case the covenant only says "pay." The same words as in Budd v. Marshall are found in Smith v. Robinson, 41 W. R. 588, [1893] 2 Q. B. 53. In both those cases the words "whether upon the landlord or tenant" also occur; but not so in the present case. Those words are also used in Sweet v. Seager, 5 W. R. 560, 2 C. B. N. S. 119; Crosse v. Raw, 26 W. R. 6, L. R. 9 Ex. 209; Clayton v. Smith, 11 Times L. R. 374; and Aldridge v. Ferne, 34 W. R. 578, 17 Q. B. D. 212. In the case of Tidswell v. Whitworth, 15 W. R. 427, L. R. 2 C. P. 326, the words "on landlord or tenant" do not occur, and in that case the judgment was for the tenant.

He also cited Hill v. Edward, 1 Times L. R. 253, and Payne v. Burridge, 12 M. & W. 727.

Haldinstein, for the respondent.—The covenant in this case renders the tenant liable. It is similar to the covenants in Budd v. Marshall and Thompson v. Lapworth, 16 W. R. 312, L. R. 3 C. P. 149. Hartley v. Hudson, 4 C. P. D. 367, 28 W. R. Dig. 119, is also a case in point.

Brown replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 29.—BRUCE, J., read the following judgment of the court: In this case I am of opinion that the decision of the learned county court judge must be upheld. [His lordship stated the facts, and read the covenant above stated, and continued:] I think that the obligation imposed upon the landlord to take up the defective drain and lay a new one was a duty imposed on him in respect of the demised premises, and so is within the words of the covenant.

I cannot distinguish this case from the case of Payne v. Burridge, where the words of the covenant were almost precisely the same as the words in the covenant in the present case. Payne v. Burridge was followed in Sweet v. Seager. That was a case in which the question arose respecting the expense of drainage works under the Metropolitan Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), the provisions of which very closely resemble the enactments by virtue of which the plaintiff in the present case was compelled to pay the money now in question.

The covenant in that case contained the words, "charges, impositions, contributions, burthens, duties, and services." The covenant in the present case does not contain the words, "charges, contributions, burthens," but it does contain what I think is the governing word—namely, "duties," and I think that the case of Sweet v. Seager applies.

In Thompson v. Lapworth, where the vestry of a parish compelled the landlord of premises to pay his proportion of the expense of paving the street upon which the premises abutted, it was held that he was entitled to recover the amount from his tenant, who had entered into a covenant to pay all taxes, rates, duties, and assessments which, during the continuance of the demise, should be taxed, assessed, or imposed on the tenant or landlord of the premises in respect thereof. The words of the covenant in that case, so far as the description of the assessments or duties imposed are concerned, contain no words that are not to be found in the present case; but it was contended by the defendant's counsel that the words "imposed on the tenant or landlord," which were in the covenant in that case and are not in the covenant in the present case, distinguished that case from the present. I cannot attach any importance to the omission of those words in the present case. The expenses in question in the present case were incurred by virtue of a duty imposed in respect of the premises. If the words had been inserted, "assessed or imposed upon any person or persons in respect of the premises," the added words would not, as it seems to me, have given any greater scope to the covenant. The words "in respect of the premises" are used in contradistinction to the words "on the premises," and an assessment or duty made or imposed not on the premises but in respect of the premises, and an assessment duly made or imposed upon any person in respect of the premises, seems to me to come within the meaning of the covenant. This, I think, is sufficiently clear from the judgment of the court in Thompson v. Lapworth. The court in that case proceeded upon the authority of the case of Payne v. Burridge. In the covenant in Payne v. Burridge the phrase "imposed on the tenant or landlord" did not occur, and yet Willes, J., in his judgment (in Thompson v. Lapworth) says: "I cannot, without carping at words, point out any distinction between that case" (referring to Payne v. Burridge) "and the case now before us." It is quite true in the later part of his judgment in Thompson v. Lapworth, Willes, J., when speaking of Tidswell v. Whitworth, said that the covenant in that case did not contain the language which the covenant in Thompson v. Lapworth contained—viz., "duties and assessments assessed or imposed on the landlord in respect of the premises." But the observation was made with reference to the decision in Tidswell v. Whitworth, which was a decision upon the terms of the Local Improvement Act, and was in effect that the payment made by the plaintiff, the landlord, was not for a rate, assessment, or imposition which had become payable in respect of the demised premises, but for a breach of duty imposed upon the landlord and not within the words of the tenant's covenant. In Tidswell v. Whitworth the word "duties" does not occur in the covenant, and it is clear from the judgment of Bovill, C.J., that the absence of that word was relied upon by the court. The observations of Willes, J., in Thompson v. Lapworth upon Tidswell v. Whitworth may go to show that in the absence of the word "duties," such words as "assessed or imposed upon the landlord" might give a wider scope to the covenant, but certainly cannot, I think, be taken to imply that when the covenant contains the word "duties" the absence of such words as "assessed or imposed upon the landlord" can be taken to narrow the force of the phrase "duties imposed in respect of the premises."

In Rawlins v. Briggs, 27 W. R. 138, 3 C. P. D. 368, the covenant was held not to apply, because the money the landlord sought to recover did not come within the words "rates, charges, assessments, and impositions charged, assessed, or imposed on the premises demised, or in respect thereof." Following the case of Tidswell v. Whitworth, it was held that the Public Health Act imposed upon the landlord (the plaintiff) the duty of removing the nuisance, and that the performance of that which was imposed as a duty cannot become a charge upon the tenant without express words. But had the covenant in that case contained the word "duties," it is quite consistent with the reasoning of the judgment that the covenant would have been held to cover a duty imposed in respect of the premises. Indeed, Lindley, J., in distinguishing the case from Thompson v. Lapworth, points out that in Thompson v. Lapworth the covenant contained the word "duties."

In the case of Budd v. Marshall the majority of the Court of Appeal approved of the decision in Thompson v. Lapworth, and held that a tenant who had covenanted with the landlord "to bear, pay, and discharge all taxes, rates, duties, and assessments" was liable on that covenant to make good to the landlord the expenses of sewage works which the landlord had been compelled to execute under the Public Health Act, 1875.

Allum v. Dickinson, 30 W. R. 930, 9 Q. B. D. 632, was decided upon the ground that the sum sought to be recovered was not a charge upon the premises, but was a charge imposed upon the owner, and there were no words in the covenant rendering the tenant liable for charges or duties imposed upon the owner; and in Wilkinson v. Collyer, 32 W. R. 614, 13 Q. B. D. 1, Manisty, J., in giving judgment in favour of the tenant, expressly distinguishes the case from Thompson v. Lapworth and Budd v. Marshall, on the ground that the word "duties" was not contained in the covenant. In Aldridge v. Ferne, where the tenant was held liable, the covenant contained the word "outgoings," which Grove, J., said was at least as strong as "duties," which had been relied upon in some of the cases.

The cases are very numerous. I have not reviewed the whole of them, but I have, I think, referred to most of the important decisions, and I think we should be going contrary to the current of the decisions if we were to hold that the words in the covenant—"duties imposed in respect of the premises"—are not wide enough in scope to entitle the plaintiff to recover in the present action.

REG. v. CAMBERWELL VESTRY. (a.)

Metropolis management—Sewer—Drain—Liability to repair—Vestry—Writ of mandamus—Alternative remedy—Action for declaration of right—Ord. 25, r. 5.

The owner of premises in the metropolis alleged that a defective drainage pipe on his premises was a sewer within the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and therefore repairable by the vestry. The vestry denied that the pipe was a sewer.

Held, that a prerogative writ of mandamus ought not to be issued to the vestry directing them to repair the pipe. The proper proceeding was for the owner of the premises to bring an action against the vestry for a declaration of right and for a mandamus.

Rule nisi for a mandamus.

The Property and Estates Co. (Limited) were the owners of certain premises at Camberwell. A drainage pipe on the premises became defective.

The company alleged that this pipe drained other premises as well as those of the company, and that therefore, by reason of the definition of "drain" in section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, the pipe in question was not a "drain" but was a "sewer," for the repair of which the vestry of Camberwell were liable.

Under these circumstances the company obtained a rule nisi calling upon the vestry of Camberwell to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue, directed to them commanding them forthwith to take such steps and to execute such works as might be necessary to abate a certain nuisance at the applicants' premises and to repair and maintain in an efficient and proper state a sewer existing upon the said premises.

In answer to the rule, affidavits had been filed on behalf of the vestry alleging that the pipe in question drained the company's premises only, and that it was therefore a "drain," and repairable by the company.

Robson, Q.C., and S. G. Lushington, showed cause against the rule. This is not a case in which the court will grant a mandamus, for there is an alternative and sufficient remedy open to the applicants—viz., an action for a mandamus to the vestry to repair the pipe, and for a declaration of right: Appleyard v. Lambeth Vestry, ante, p. 173; Reg. v. Lambourn Valley Railway Co., 22 Q. B. D. 463, 37 W. R. Dig. 116.

Macmorran, Q.C., and R. C. Glen, in support of the rule.—In order to oust the prerogative writ of mandamus it must be clear that an action will lie. It is doubtful whether any action will lie in this case, and it is certain that an action for damages will not lie: Robinson v. Mayor of Workington, 102 L. T. Newsp. 243; Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board, [1892] A. C. 345, 41 W. R. Dig. 85.

WRIGHT, J.—This is an attempt to use the writ of mandamus as the machinery for remedying a private grievance. I have never before seen such a rule nisi as has been granted in this case. If the applicants have any personal right against the vestry, their remedy is by an action for a declaration of that right. Such an action can be brought under ord. 25, r. 5, and in that action a mandamus might be granted. If, on the other hand, the applicants have no personal right against the vestry, then a fortiori, it is not a for a writ of mandamus.

BRUCE, J.—I agree. I think the rule nisi which has been granted in this case is far too general. It seems to me, if the applicants have any such right as would entitle them to the mandamus which they ask for, they have a sufficient personal right to found an action for a declaration of that right.

REG. v. THE CHARITY COMMISSIONERS. (a.)

*Charity—Commissioners—Scheme under Endowed Schools Acts—Recommendation of woman as almoner—Refusal of Commissioners to appoint—Mandamus—Discretionary power of court to grant prerogative writ—Alternative remedy—Christ's Hospital Foundation Administration Scheme,* 1890, clauses 19 and 143.

An application by the London School Board for a mandamus directing the Charity Commissioners to determine under clause 43 of Christ's Hospital Administration Scheme, 1890, the validity of the proceedings of the governors of the hospital in refusing to appoint as almoner a lady nominated by the applicants, was refused, the court being of opinion that mandamus was not the only and more convenient means of remedy open to the applicants.

In this case cause was shown against a rule nisi for a mandamus obtained at the instance of the School Board for London calling upon the Charity Commissioners to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding them to determine, under clause 143 of the Scheme for the Administration of the Foundation of Christ's Hospital, the question whether or not the governors were bound to accept the nomination of the School Board for London, and appoint Miss Eve as an almoner of the institution.

By virtue of the scheme which came into force the 15th of August, 1890, the School Board for London had the right to nominate six representative members on the governing board of the hospital, the same to be "competent persons duly qualified to discharge the duties of the office."

When the scheme came into operation the School Board nominated, and the governors duly appointed six almoners. In January, 1896, the Hon. E. Lyulph Stanley, one of those appointed, resigned, and the School Board nominated Miss Eve to fill the vacancy. The governors refused to appoint Miss Eve on two grounds—(1) that she was a woman, and therefore not qualified to be an almoner; and (2) that they had a discretion to refuse to appoint a competent person even though duly qualified and recommended. The School Board thereupon appealed to the Charity Commissioners under clause 143 of the scheme to determine the question. The Commissioners, however, refused to determine the question, being of opinion that "regard being had to the nature and importance as to the possible contentious character of the question raised by the School for London, it was undesirable that they should decide this matter under clause 143." That clause provided "that any question affecting the regularity or validity of any proceeding under the scheme should be determined conclusively by the Charity Commissioners upon such application made to them for the purpose as they thought sufficient."

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Dibdin, on behalf

the Charity Commissioners (with them Warrington, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Governors of the Hospital), showed cause against the rule. The question was an important one and ought to be decided in a court of law, and not referred to the Charity Commissioners to decide under the powers vested in them by clause 143 of the scheme. Mandamus was not the proper proceeding for the School Board to take in order to raise this question upon, and the rule ought therefore to be discharged. Moreover, the recommendation of the School Board was not a "proceeding under the scheme" within the true meaning of that clause.

The following cases were referred to: Hodgson's School, 3 App. Cas. 857, 26 W. R. Dig. 207; Reg. v. The Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies, 36 W. R. 695, 21 Q. B. D. 131. [Per BRUCE, J.: Wolverhampton and Walsall Railway Co. v. London and North-Western Railway Co., L. R. 16 Eq. 433, 22 W. R. Dig. 118. On this authority I see no reason why an action should not be brought for a declaration of right by the School Board.]

Ram, for the School Board, contended that the nomination of an almoner by the Board was a "proceeding under the scheme." The scheme had the force of an Act of Parliament. The Commissioners were the proper persons to decide the question raised, and a mandamus ought therefore to be granted.

WRIGHT, J.—It seems to me that the rule ought to be discharged on two grounds—firstly, on the true construction of the 143rd clause of the scheme; and secondly, that the remedy by mandamus is not applicable to this case. In my opinion the 143rd clause has reference only to internal matters, and I think it is impossible to suppose that it was ever the intention of those who framed the scheme that outsiders, such, for example, as the London School Board, should submit themselves to be bound by the extraordinary tribunal therein constituted, which is neither a legal tribunal nor one from which any appeal lies. Moreover, it is a tribunal which has power to decide any matter referred to it without hearing evidence or argument if they so think fit. But there is a second ground upon which I think the rule ought to be discharged even if we are wrong in discharging it on the first ground. There is no doubt that on an application for a mandamus this court has always discretion to refuse that remedy to any applicant, unless such refusal would deprive him of his legal right by leaving him without any other remedy. In the present case that is not so, for those who obtained the rule have another and more convenient course open to them under the 28th section of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853. Also I see no reason why the question should not be raised by way of ordinary injunction or in an action for a declaration of statutory right.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I am satisfied that the question may be very much more conveniently tried in some other way than by mandamus, and therefore I think the rule ought on that ground, at any rate, to be discharged.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Chitty, L.JJ.), March 4.

KOOSEN v. ROSE. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Order as to costs made by judge at chambers—Power of judge at trial to interfere—Ord. 14, r. 9.

Where on an application under order 14 the judge at chambers has made an order as to costs, the judge at the trial has no jurisdiction to interfere with those costs.

Appeal from the judgment of Wright, J., at the trial of an action without a jury.

The action was brought to recover the sum of £150, the price of a motor carriage. The plaintiff having taken out a summons for judgment under order 14, Day, J., at chambers, gave the defendant leave to defend, and ordered that the costs of the application should be costs in the cause, and further directed that the case should be put into the short cause list.

Wright, J., at the trial, gave judgment for the plaintiff with costs, less the amount of the costs of the proceedings under order 14. He said that in his opinion the case was not one fit to be tried under order 14, and that in all probability if the facts had been fully known to Day, J., he would have made the plaintiff pay his own costs.

The plaintiff appealed from so much of the judgment as deprived him of his costs of the application at chambers.

Wheeler, Q.C. (W. H. Nash with him), for the plaintiff.—Ord. 65, r. 1, says that the costs of all proceedings shall be in the discretion of the judge, "subject to the provisions of the Acts and these rules." Rule 9 of order 14 expressly provides that the costs of all applications under that order shall be dealt with by the judge at chambers, unless he refers them to the judge at the trial. Wright, J., therefore had no jurisdiction to interfere with the costs of the application at chambers, which had been dealt with by Day, J.

C. W. Mathews, for the defendant.—Ord. 14, r. 9 (b), provides that, if the plaintiff makes an application under that order when the case is not within the order, the application shall be dismissed, with costs to be paid forthwith by the plaintiff. And by ord. 65, r. 27 (20), the court or judge may, at the hearing of any cause or matter, direct the costs of any proceeding which is improper or unnecessary to be disallowed.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—Wright, J., at the trial assumed to himself the power of altering a decision which had been come to by Day, J., at chambers with regard to the costs of an application under order 14. This appeal is brought on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to interfere with that order as to costs. The rule must be this, that a judge cannot interfere with an order of a judge of co-ordinate jurisdiction by way of appeal or otherwise, unless some statute has expressly given him the power to do so. In my opinion that part of the judgment which deprived the plaintiff of his costs of the application under order 14 was without jurisdiction and void, and must be overruled.

LOPES, L.J.—The question is, had Wright, J., any jurisdiction to interfere with the costs of the proceedings at chambers? In my opinion he had not. The costs of applications under order 14 are provided for by rule 9 (a) of that order. They are to be "dealt with by the judge on the hearing of the application, who shall order by and to whom and when the same shall be paid, or may refer them to the judge at the trial." In this case Day, J., did not refer the costs to the judge at the trial, but dealt with them himself. In my opinion Wright, J., had no power to interfere with these costs at the trial. The defendant relied on rule 9 (b) of order 14, but that relates to the proceedings at chambers and not to what takes place at the trial.

CHITTY, L.J., concurred.

THE MINNA CRAIG STEAMSHIP CO. (LIMITED) (Appellants) v. THE CHARTERED MERCANTILE BANK OF INDIA, LONDON, AND CHINA (Respondents). (a.)

Ship—Bill of lading—Proceedings in foreign court—Sale of ship in foreign port—Judgment in rem.

A ship, the property of an English company sailed to Bombay. Whilst at Bombay for the purpose of taking in cargo, her master, by the fraud of the company's manager there, was induced to sign bills of lading for goods which had not been placed on board. These bills were indorsed for value to an English bank. The ship sailed for Hamburg, but in the meantime a petition to wind up the company was presented in England, and a winding-up order was made on the very day, but a few hours before, the ship arrived at Hamburg. On her arrival there she was arrested by the Court of Hamburg on the information of the bank, and that court held that by German law the bills of lading were conclusive as against the company, and ordered the ship to be sold. The ship was sold for a sum less than the amount of the bank's claim, and the Court of Hamburg paid over the proceeds of the sale to the bank. The company then brought an action in the Queen's Bench Division against the bank, claiming that the money paid to the bank by the German court was money had and received by the bank to the use of the company for distribution amongst their creditors.

Held, affirming the judgment of Collins, J., that the proceedings in the German court were proceedings in rem, and that the judgment of that court was therefore good against the world; that the money received by the bank was not subject to any trust in favour of the creditors of the company, and that therefore the company could not recover.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Collins, J., dated the 10th of November, 1896, in an action without a jury. (See [1897] 1 Q. B. 55.)

The appellant company were the owners of a single steamship, The Minna Craig.

The respondents were an incorporated company, whose registered place of business was in London.

The appellant company was in liquidation, and the action was brought by the liquidator to recover from the respondents the sum of £10,944 as money had and received to the use of the appellant company.

The circumstances were as follows:

One James Laing, one of the plaintiffs in the court below, but who did not appear in the prosecution of this appeal, was mortgagee of The Minna Craig under a statutory deed of mortgage, dated August, 1891.

In June, 1892, the ship was at Bombay, for the purpose of being loaded with cargo for Hamburg. Through the fraud of the manager of the appellants' business in Bombay, the master of the ship was induced to sign certain bills of lading for goods which were never in fact put on board.

The respondents purchased the said false bills of lading for value without notice of the fraud.

On the 23rd of June, 1892, the ship sailed for Hamburg, and early in the following month the fraud was discovered.

On the 20th of July a petition was presented for winding up the appellant company; the petition was duly advertised, and on the 11th of August a winding-up order was made and a liquidator appointed. On that same day, but a few hours subsequent to the winding-up order, the ship arrived at Hamburg. On her arrival, the respondents' agents took proceedings on their behalf in the German court at that town in the nature of an action in rem against the ship and her freight in respect of all the cargo which by the said bills of lading purported to have been shipped on board.

Other creditors of the ship also made claim.

The several claims on the ship amounted to £76,000.

According to the German Commercial Code the rights of a ship's creditor are acquired by virtue of claims for non-delivery of or damage to goods forming part of the cargo and ship's creditors have a legal lien on the vessel, and according to German law statements in a bill of lading as to the shipment of goods are conclusive, not only against the master, but also against the owners of the vessel and all others having any interest in her.

On the 7th of December the ship was condemned by the Hamburg court and ordered to be sold, and Laing, the mortgagee, became the purchaser for the sum of £43,206, and the court published a scheme for the division of the proceeds. The respondents put forward their claim under the bills of lading, and the court gave priority to their claim over the claims of the mortgagee and other English creditors. This decision was affirmed on appeal both by the Appeal Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal at Leipzig.

On the 13th of June, 1894, the respondents' agents received on their behalf from the German court the sum of £10,944, which amount they paid over to the respondents. The appellants thereupon brought this action in the Queen's Bench Division against the respondents, claiming the above amount as money had and received by the respondents to their use, and also that the said sum should be handed over to the liquidator for distribution amongst the appellants' creditors generally. The action was tried without a jury before Collins, J., who held that the judgment of the German court, being a judgment in rem, was conclusive, and that the money received by the respondents under it was therefore not subject to any trust in favour of the general body of the appellants' creditors, and that neither the appellants nor the mortgagee, Laing could recover.

From this judgment the Minna Craig Steamship Co. now appealed.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Boyd, Q.C., for the appellants.—The judgment in the court below is wrong, and cannot be supported. Firstly, the respondent bank cannot retain this money, but must hand it over to the liquidator for distribution amongst the creditors of the appellant company. The title of the creditors accrued prior to any lien declared by the German courts. The only lien which those courts did declare was a lien in respect of non-delivery of goods at Hamburg. Secondly, the judgment of the German court was not a judgment in rem. The German court no doubt may sell the ship and give a good title to the purchaser, but in so far as that court divided the proceeds of the sale, that is only binding on the parties privy to the sale, and does not affect other parties, except in the case of a judgment in rem, when, of course, it would be binding on the whole world. But this is not a judgment in rem, and there is no maritime lien here. The words "in rem" used in the case of Castrique v. Imrie, 19 W. R. 1, L. R. 4 H. L. 414, are ambiguous. A trust was created for the benefit of the creditors when the winding-up proceedings were taken, and therefore the respondents should hand over the money paid to them for distribution amongst the creditors. Even if the judgment of the German court was a judgment in rem, here that would not amount to more than a charge on the property: In re Oriental Inland Steam Co., Ex parte Scinde Railway Co., 22 W. R. 810, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 557. The holders of the bill of lading had no right of action until the ship arrived at Hamburg, and that arrival was long after the petition was filed. There was, therefore, no antecedent lien. Anyone getting a declaration of a right or share in the ship would only hold that share in trust for the creditors. The judgment in favour of the respondents was no doubt good, but they only held money under it that was subject to a trust. A creditor cannot, by an action in rem or other proceeding subsequent to a liquidation, put himself in the position of a prefential creditor: Hunter v. Potts, 4 T. R. 182; Sill v. Worswick, 1 H. Bl. 665.

They also referred to The Dictator, [1892] P. 304, and The Heinrich Bjorn, 33 W. R. 719, 10 P. 44, and the Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 84, 85, 163.

Sir R. Reid, Q.C., and English Harrison, for the respondents.—The judgment in the court below was right, and must be upheld. The appellants have been defeated in the German courts, and now they try in the English courts to obtain what they could not get in Germany. Such a proceeding is without precedent. The action in the German court was in rem against the ship herself, and the judgment, therefore, is good as against the whole world. No ship, by being placed in liquidation, can escape maritime lien.

Boyd, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the liquidator of the plaintiff company, which is being wound up, has in the name of the company sued the defendants for money had and received—that is to say, he has sued them in that form of action which at common law asserts that the defendants have money in their hands which either in law or equity they ought to hold for the plaintiff.

Now, the circumstances which give rise to that question are that the company was the owner of a ship which sailed abroad to Bombay. At Bombay she was plying for a cargo, and the captain of the ship, by fraudulent misrepresentations, was induced to do that which here he would have no authority to do, if the matter had been tried by English law, whether he was induced by fraud or not—namely, be signed bills of lading as if goods were put on board his ship, when there were none on board his ship. If the matter had been tried in England the shipowners would not have been bound by such a signature of the captain on a bill of lading. The captain has no authority to sign a bill of lading in England unless there are goods on board.

The defendants in this case became the holders of the bills of lading for value. The ship sailed from Bombay to Hamburg, and at Hamburg a law-suit ensued. Now what was that law-suit? It was suggested here that it was not an action in rem, and that is the first question which we have to determine.

The ship was seized in the way and the manner that actions in rem are commenced. It was by fastening a chain on board instead of nailing a document to the mast as is done in England when a ship is seized. The ship, therefore, was seized by a Hamburg court, and afterwards proceedings went on with regard to that ship, and no doubt the supposed owners of that ship were cited, but they had nothing to do with the law-suit. The ship was seized, evidence was given, and the evidence was that the captain of that ship had signed the bills of lading which the present defendants held. It was upon his suggestion that the ship had been seized. The Hamburg court held, according to the law of that country, that if the master had signed bills of lading the owners of that ship could not deny in court but that there had been a cargo on board, and the claim made as against the ship was that the ship had not delivered that cargo, which they could not say was not on board, to the holders of the bills of lading in Hamburg. Upon that the Hamburg court, still proceeding in the way that all actions in rem, wherever they are, are proceeded with, condemned the ship, and ordered the ship to be sold. Now, every step of that proceeding is unlike an action in personam, but is the regular course of an action in rem. The proceeds of the sale was, of course, paid into the court, and the ship not being sold for a greater amount than would satisfy the claim of the informant there, the present defendants, the court ordered the money, the proceeds of that sale, to be paid to the present defendants.

Now, inasmuch as every part of that proceeding was according to the proceedings in an action in rem, and not according to the proceedings in an action in personam, it is obvious that the Hamburg court assumed itself to be a court acting in rem. It is said that for such a complaint as non-delivery or short delivery of cargo there is not a maritime lien according to the international rules of a maritime lien; but the Hamburg court held, by virtue of a statute in their country binding them, that they had the power to proceed against this ship in rem, and that they did so. Their decision was carried to two Courts of Appeal, and the Courts of Appeal agreed with the Hamburg tribunal. Then by the comity of law with regard to courts, no court here can say that the Hamburg court had not jurisdiction to do what it did. It was suggested that the statute did not authorize them to do what they have done, but no court here can construe the statute; it is for the Hamburg court to construe their own statute as well as to give a decision. We, therefore, are bound to hold that that ship was condemned by an action in rem and as if there had been a maritime lien attached to her.

Now, what is the result of an action in rem against a ship of that kind? The moment the decision in rem is given, it dates back to the time when the cause of her condemnation came into existence. I think it was suggested here that the cause of her condemnation came into existence when the ship left Bombay. I do not accept that. I think the cause of action for non-delivery of cargo arises when the ship arrives in the port of destination, where she ought to deliver. I should say, therefore, that this condemnation reverted back to the time when the ship arrived at Hamburg. But when a ship is condemned by a court which has jurisdiction to condemn her in rem, the ship is taken out of being the property of the person to whom she originally belonged, and becomes the ship of the person, the complainant, upon whose information the decision in rem has occurred. It becomes his ship, but he has not possession of the ship, the ship is in hands of the court. He cannot sell the ship, he does not convey the ship when she is sold; it is the court who orders the sale and gives the title to the purchaser of the ship, and the person who buys the ship under an Admiralty order, or a court in rem sale, does not pay the money to the original owner of the ship, he pays it into court, and the court, treating the money as replacing the ship, orders the money to be paid to the informant or complainant who has caused the condemnation of the ship. The money, therefore, for which the defendants are now sued was the proceeds of a sale by the court, was money which was paid into that court for the court to deal with, and the court paid that money to the defendants, and they did that at Hamburg.

But then it is said on behalf of the plaintiff that before the cause of the condemnation of the ship arose—namely, before her arrival at Hamburg, and the bills arriving there signed by the captain, this company was ordered in England to be wound up, and that the liquidator who is now suing in the name of the company had become the liquidator, and therefore that he was trustee of the ship for the creditors of the company the ship belonged to, and it is said that the present defendants were one amongst other creditors of the company, and that the ship which is the subject-matter of this condemnation was an asset of the company which is being wound up, and that therefore the money which they obtained, was to be held for the liquidator as the trustee for the other creditors. Now, if there had not been a decision in rem with regard to this ship, that might be true, but this ship after she was seized by the court was condemned, and that condemnation reverted back to the time when she arrived at Hamburg, although that was after the liquidator's title in England accrued.

The present defendants did not obtain anything from that ship as creditors of the company. They obtained this money solely for themselves in their own personal right by reason of the facts which had been proved, and by reason of the condemnation of the ship by the court; they did not receive this money as creditors of the company at all, but as the persons to whom it was given by the decree of the court acting in rem. The money which was the proceeds of the sale never was in their possession until it was given to them by the decree of the court acting in rem.

It is impossible, therefore, in my opinion, to say that they ever held that money as creditors of the company; they held it as the proceeds of the sale of a ship which at the time of the sale belonged to them and to them alone. If there had been a surplus beyond their claim—that is to say—if the ship had been sold for more, they would not have got that surplus, the whole proceeds of the sale would not have been paid to them for them to hold the surplus for anybody. They never would have had a penny of the surplus. The court acting in rem, would have given them so much of the proceeds as covered their claim, and would have held the surplus in its own hands, and then if anybody claimed that surplus they would have applied to the court in rem, and the court if applied to would have listened to the application and would have done what it thought right. In all probability the court would have paid the surplus money to the liquidator, but that surplus money never would have been in the hands of the defendants, they never would have been the trustees of it for anybody, they never would have had anything but the amount of their claim against the ship given to them by the court as the proceeds of a sale of a ship which the court had declared to be theirs. It seems to me, therefore, that the claim of the present plaintiffs bringing this suit here in the name of the company wholly fails, and neither in law nor in equity can it be said that the defendants hold this money for the plaintiffs.

The appeal, therefore, will be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—The ship Minna Craig was at Bombay, and by a fraud perpetrated by persons who have since been imprisoned for that fraud, the captain was induced to sign bills of lading for a cargo which never in fact was put on board. The defendants were indorsees of the bills of lading for value in respect of those goods. The ship sailed from Bombay to Hamburg, and the defendants indorsed the bills of lading to their agents at Hamburg. These agents took proceedings to arrest the ship. Judgment was given, and was successively affirmed in two Courts of Appeal in Germany, and by that judgment the ship was ordered to be sold. The rights of the different parties against that ship were ascertained, and the agents of the defendants were declared to have a right to the proceedings in priority to everyone except the crew, who sued for wages, and some persons who had supplied necessaries for the voyage. They were held to have priority over Laing, the English mortgagee, who was added as one of the plaintiffs, and who had become mortgagee long before the ship went to Bombay.

This action is brought by the liquidator of the English company owning this one ship, The Minna Craig, to recover back from the defendant bank the sum of £10,944, which had been paid to them out of the proceeds of the sale.

On the very day on which the proceedings against the ship were commenced in Germany—namely, the 11th of August—a winding-up order was made in England, and the petition upon which the winding-up order was made was filed as far back as the 20th of July, and all the necessary advertisements were duly published in the newspapers. It would follow, therefore, that the defendants had notice of the proceedings which in England, in the circumstances stated, would have debarred them from asserting any claim against The Minna Craig. The goods in respect of which the bills of lading were given never having been on board, the defendants, according to English law, never acquired any right to these goods, or any claim upon them against the owners of the ship. According to English law, therefore, the defendants would have been prevented from making any valid claim against the ship or her owners.

In these circumstances, can the defendants retain this sum of £10,944? The defendants say that the proceedings in Germany were proceedings in rem, and that the distribution and determination of priorities which followed upon it were all parts of a judgment in rem, and consequently are binding upon all persons, whether they were parties to the suit or not. The plaintiffs contended, but only faintly, that the judgment was not a judgment in rem; but even if it were, they said the ship herself, being the property of a company in liquidation, was affected with a trust, and that anybody, whether claiming under a judgment in rem or not, who had notice of that trust, if he acquired any lien upon it by that judgment, must take it subject to the equity of recouping everything he got under it, to the proper person—namely, the liquidator of the company. It may be observed that the liquidator, or rather the company by their liquidator, did not appear in the German proceedings at all. The mortgagee, James Laing, did appear, and was a party to taking the case through all the stages to the final Courts of Appeal in Leipzig. But the plaintiff company did not appear, although the court in Germany, so far as it could, secured their appearance, and appointed counsel to appear and argue for them. The learned judge in the court below has found that the judgment in Germany was a judgment in rem, and that it was binding on all the world. I agree with him. Repeatedly in the judgments of the German courts the right of the plaintiffs is referred to as a lien. The judgment has declared that there was a lien or charge created by the act of the master in signing for the goods as he did. They asserted that that lien existed, and they have given effect to it by a judgment in rem as a conclusive judgment binding upon all the world, declaring that the persons through whom or on whose behalf the plaintiffs in the German suit claimed, had such a lien. It is a declaration as to the status of the ship binding upon everybody, and no English court can impeach it. It is a judgment declaring an absolute and antecedent lien in the person in whose favour the German court has decided, and we cannot say the defendants, on account of anything that has happened, are bound to give up to the liquidator of the company, or to anybody else, that which has been given to them by the courts of Germany as the fruits of that lien. The appeal, therefore, must be dismissed with costs.

CHITTY, L.J.—The first question relates to the ship and the distribution of the proceeds of the sale. The ship at the time of her arrest was in the territorial waters of the Empire of Germany. The court, or courts, which ordered the arrest and sold the ship were duly constituted courts of competent jurisdiction to deal with the ship and to determine its status. The proceedings were against the ship herself. It was admitted by Mr. Boyd, who argued this point of the case, that the proceedings were in rem and that the purchaser of the ship acquired a good title to her as against all the world. An attempt was made by him to draw a line at this point. The contention was that the proceedings subsequent to the sale, including the distribution of the moneys that arose from the sale, were not in rem, but in personam merely. The line cannot be drawn here. There is no authority for it. Circumstances which would have given rise to such a question must have arisen over and over again.

The distribution of the sale moneys was an essential part of the proceedings against the ship. The ground and object of the sale was to turn the ship into money, and the money as well as the ship herself was subject to the jurisdiction of the German courts. You cannot reasonably or conveniently divide or apportion the ship among the persons having maritime liens. The sale money becomes necessarily the substituted "res." The German court applied the German law. Under English law the defendants, as holders of the bills of lading, could not have succeeded against the owners of the ship, much less against the ship herself. Their claim against the owners would have at once been defeated by showing, as the facts were, that the goods had never been put on board. But by the German law the shipowners were bound conclusively by the bill of lading, and were not at liberty to deny that the goods were put on board. By the English law the holders of a bill of lading have no lien on the ship, but by the German law, declared in these proceedings, the holders of the bill of lading had a lien in the nature of a maritime lien on the ship. In the scheme of division the German courts placed the defendants, as such holders, in the category of "Ship's Creditors" carrying with it the right to be paid by the ship or out of the proceeds of sale, and gave them priority even over Laing, the mortgagee of the ship. The courts accordingly allotted £10,944, part of the sale money, to the defendants in their own individual right as creditors of the ship.

The second question relates to the effect of the English statute and the winding up of the plaintiff company, who were entitled to the ship, subject to the maritime liens and liens of that nature and to Laing's mortgage. The winding-up began on the 20th of July, 1892. The order to wind up was made on the 11th of August, 1892, and the ship arrived at Hamburg in the evening of that day after the winding-up order was made. The appellants relied on the 163rd section of the Act of 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89) and the decision of the Court of Appeal in the Oriental Inland Steam Co. It was contended by Mr. Walton, who argued this part of the case, that this authority applied, and that the assets of the company were bound by a trust for distribution among the creditors, and that accordingly the defendants were bound to hand over the £10,944, as part of the assets, to the liquidator for distribution among the creditors of the company. It was argued that no right of action or lien accrued to the defendants until after the arrival of the ship at Hamburg, and she was ready to discharge. But this is an attempt to introduce the English law into the judgment of the German court, and on that ground to question the binding effect of the judgment of the German court. It was said that the lien or right to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the ship as found by the German courts did not arise till after the commencement of the winding-up. But the German courts, applying their law, did not create the lien or right as on the 11th of August, 1892, but they ascertained and declared that it was then subsisting and bound the ship. The distinction between this case and the Oriental case is that in the Oriental case the proceedings were in personam, and not, as here, in rem. Collins, J., put this part of the case neatly and tersely when he said that the judgment of the German courts in favour of the defendants was an authoritative and final declaration of right under a judgment in rem.

There is also another view according to which the defendants would be equally entitled to succeed—namely, if they were secured creditors. The effect of the judgment of the German courts having jurisdiction over the ship was, to put it at the lowest, to hold them to be secured creditors, and to adjudge the £10,944 to them in that character. Consequently the £10,944 was not part of the assets of the company in the winding up. The mortgagee Laing is a co-plaintiff, but it is unnecessary to say anything about his claim. Counsel did not attempt to sustain the action on the ground of any right in him.

Lunatic—Payment out—Foreign subject—Lunatic ward of foreign court entitled to fund in court in this country—Jurisdiction.

An application was made on behalf of a lady who had been found a lunatic by the Royal Bavarian Court and had been made a ward of that court by her next friend, who was a judge of that court, that a fund standing to her credit in the Chancery Division might be paid out to the Deposit Commission of the Bavarian court. The lunatic was the daughter of a German father and an English mother, and she herself and her nearest living relatives were domiciled German subjects.

Held, that there was jurisdiction to make an order for such payment out, and that the order ought to be made.

In re Barlow's Will, 35 W. R. 737, 36 Ch. D. 287, distinguished.

This was an application on behalf of Baroness Virginie Aloyse Ernestine De Linden, of Baldingen, near Nördlingen, in the kingdom of Bavaria, spinster, a person of unsound mind and a ward of the Royal Bavarian Court of Justice, Nördlingen, by Hans Schütz, Royal Bavarian judge, her next friend, that a sum of £7,399 7s. standing in court to her credit, and representing the share to which she was entitled under the marriage settlement of her parents, might be sold, and that the proceeds after providing for the costs of this application might be paid to Hans Schütz and Zacharias Hoenning jointly as members of the Deposit Commission of the Royal Bavarian Court to the intent that the same might be disposed of according to Bavarian law.

In 1834 a marriage took place between Baron Ernst de Linden, a German, and Miss Amey Anne Spurrier, an Englishwoman, and upon the occasion of the marriage an English settlement was executed of the lady's fortune, whereby certain funds were settled after the death of the parents in trust for the children of the marriage absolutely.

There were several children of this marriage, of whom the applicant was one.

The applicant was born in Germany and resided in Germany, and she and all her brothers and sisters were domiciled German subjects.

In 1894 a judicial inquiry was held at Nördlingen as to the state of the applicant's mind, and upon that inquiry the chief judge of the Royal Bavarian Court, Nördlingen, adjudged that the applicant was of unsound mind, and made her a ward of the court on that ground.

In 1895 after the death of the surviving parent a petition was presented by the children for the distribution of the settled funds which had been paid into court under the Trustee Relief Act, 1847, and upon that occasion the share of the present applicant was carried to a separate account by reason of her being a person of unsound mind and a ward of the Bavarian Court.

It appeared from an affidavit of Gottfried Böhm, a Councillor of Law of Bavaria, filed in support of the present application that, according to Bavarian law, the court of justice as court of trusteeship was entitled to accept and receive the moneys of wards, and that the receipt, custody, and granting of receipts for such moneys appertained to the Deposit Commission of the court; and, further, that the Deposit Commission consisted of two members who at the present time were Hans Schütz, Royal Bavarian Judge, and Zacharias Hoenning, Royal Bavarian Secretary. It further appeared from an affidavit of a sister of the applicant in whose charge she was, the applicant had no means whatever beyond the fund now standing to her separate account.

It was intimated that the German court would not be satisfied with a mere order for the payment of the income of the lady, but desired to have the corpus remitted to its officials, and accordingly Herr Schütz submitted in writing a number of reasons why the fund should be remitted to that country—viz., "(a), That Baroness Virginie Von Linden is a German and has nothing to do with England; (b) that Baroness Linden is under the guardianship of a German court, and the power to dispose of and administer the property of Baroness Linden appertains solely to this court of guardianship in conjunction with the guardian; (c) that in the exercise of this power of administration the court of guardianship is entitled to make, and has made, the application for the handing over of the property of the ward; (d) that the withdrawing of the Linden capital in the face of this application would constitute an unjustifiable violation of the rights of third parties; (e) that no liability can possibly be cast upon the English court by reason of the handing over of the capital in view of the evidence produced."

This document was addressed to the solicitors for the applicant; it was signed by Herr Schütz, and it was under the seal of the court.

STIRLING, J., made an order in chambers for payment out of the income of the fund to the members of the Deposit Commission, but so far as the application related to the corpus of the fund he adjourned it into court for further argument.

Hastings, Q.C., and W. C. Druce, for the applicant.—There is here a finding by a foreign court of competent jurisdiction that the applicant is a lunatic and there is what practically amounts to the vesting of the lunatic's property in the court or the Deposit Commission of the court. The permanent arrangement for the charge and care of the lunatic's property is that it should come into the hands of the Deposit Commission, and the commission has power to give receipts. This fund ought therefore to be remitted to the Deposit Commission: Scott v. Bentley, 3 W. R. 280, 1 Kay & Jo. 281; Hessing v. Sutherland, 4 W. R. 820, 25 L. J. Ch. 687; In re Elias, 3 Mac. & G. 234; In re Stark, 2 Mac. & G. 174, though in that case the court in the exercise of its discretion ordered the payment out of the dividends only. Newton v. Manning, 1 Mac. & G. 362, shows that if a person invests himself abroad with full right to receive the property of a person found lunatic there, he may, by applying to the jurisdiction of this country, obtain the lunatic's property. The essential point is that he should be armed with the authority of the foreign jurisdiction. In re Barlow's Will, 35 W. R. 737, 36 Ch. D. 287, is distinguishable because that was a case of a colonial lunatic patient not so found by inquisition, and it was held that the colonial master in lunacy had no sufficient authority under the colonial law to require payment of the fund out of court. It did not turn on the point that there had been no formal vesting order, see per Lindley, L.J., in In re Brown, 44 W. R. 17, [1895] 2 Ch. 666. The application in this case is virtually a request by the Bavarian court itself.

STIRLING, J.—In this case a very considerable sum of Consols was standing to the credit of a lady named the Baroness Virginie Aloyse Ernestine De Linden, a person of unsound mind so found by the Royal Bavarian Court at Nördlingen. An application is now made by her through her next friend, being a judge of that court, for the transfer to the Bavarian court of this fund. The lady is a daughter of an Englishwoman, but that is her sole connection with England; her father was a German, her nationality is German; her domicile is German, and her present residence is German—viz., in Bavaria; and, therefore, it is clear that in every point of view the tribunals of Germany are the proper courts to determine the legal status of this lady. Also, it is in evidence that the Royal Court of Bavaria at Nördlingen, being the proper tribunal for the purpose, has given a judgment by which the lady is made a ward of that court as being of unsound mind. There is, therefore, a finding by the Royal Court that this lady is of unsound mind and she has become a ward of that court, by which I understand that both her person and property are put under the charge of the court. It further appears that that court acts not merely in a judicial but also in an administrative capacity, very much in the same way as our own court; and it further appears that that court has full power to give receipts for all the property of the lunatic. Further, I understand that this sum of Consols is the sole property of this lady, and I have made an order in chambers directing payment of the interest to the two gentlemen who constitute the Deposit Commission, which is the administrative section of the court.

But as the fund is a large one I was desirous that with regard to the capital the matter should be fully argued in court in order that I might satisfy myself that this was a proper order to make.

The difficulty which I felt was occasioned by the case of In re Barlow's Will, and I am bound to say that there are some expressions used by the Court of Appeal in that case which would have presented some difficulty to my mind had it not been for the more recent case of In re Brown. The decision in the latter case is not in point because it was an appeal to the statutory jurisdiction of the court under the Lunacy Act, 1890. But the importance of the case is that it contains a full discussion by Lindley, L.J., of the previous cases, including In re Barlow's Will. He there says: "If now we turn to previous decisions, we find that orders have been made, transferring stocks, funds, and securities to curators of lunatics resident out of England—namely, in France, Holland, and Scotland, although the property of such lunatics was not vested in their curators in the strict technical sense of that expression," so that he recognizes the fact that a transfer may be made, although the property is not technically vested in the person to whom it will be transferred. Then, dealing with In re Barlow's Will, he says: [His lordship referred to the report in L. R. [1895] 2 Ch., at p. 671.] "The Master in Lunacy, appointed by the Supreme Court of New South Wales under the New South Wales Lunacy Act, applied for a transfer to him of a sum of £2,249, eighteen new 3 per cent. annuities belonging to the lunatic, and paid into court under the Trustee Relief Act. The lunatic there was not judicially declared lunatic, and the court held first that the colonial master had no absolute right to have the whole sum transferred to him, but an order was nevertheless made for the payment to him of part of the capital—viz., £803, and of the future dividends. The lunatic in that case was only a patient not judicially declared to be insane, and the court felt considerable difficulty in making any order at all for payment to the colonial master. But it is obvious from the judgments that if the lunatic had been judicially declared lunatic, so that his legal status had been altered, the court would not have felt any difficulty in making any order which the court thought proper for transferring the annuities to the colonial master."

Now, what have we here? Really, in substance though not in form, a request from the court of Bavaria itself asking me to direct a transfer. There is in evidence a document signed by one of the members of the Deposit Commission who is himself a judge of the Royal Court of Bavaria, sealed with the seal of the court, authorizing the solicitors in the matter to make the application, and stating the grounds upon which the money ought to be remitted to the German court. It further appears that the lunatic has brothers and sisters who are presumably her next-of-kin living in Germany.

Looking at all the circumstances of the case, seeing that the lady's connection with England is of the slightest possible description, seeing that there has been a legal adjudication by a court of competent jurisdiction, by which the lady's legal status has been declared to be that of a lunatic, and that there is attached to that court a Deposit Commission which is appointed for the purpose of taking charge of the property of lunatics, and seeing that this fund is the only property of the lunatic and that her relatives are resident in Bavaria. I think that if I have jurisdiction, as I undoubtedly have, this is a case in which I ought to exercise it and make an order that the fund should be dealt with in the manner proposed by the summons.

Petition.

This was a petition for the sanction of the court to the reduction of the capital of the above company, which was a limited company carrying on business at Bath.

The capital of the company was originally divided into preference shares of £10 each, entitling the holders to a cumulative preferential dividend and to priority for return of capital, and ordinary shares of £10 each, the issued capital consisting of certain fully paid-up preference shares, and certain ordinary shares, on which £8 only was fully paid up, leaving a liability of £2 per share uncalled.

articles of association every member had one vote for every share held by him.

By clause 33 of the articles it was provided that "the company shall have power to reduce its capital, whether paid up or uncalled, and whether by cancelling unallotted shares or otherwise, and to consolidate and also subdivide its shares, or any of them, into shares of a larger or smaller denomination. Upon a reduction of capital capital shall be written off in inverse order to that of its priority in repayment of capital."

Article 51 empowered the holders of any class of shares, by a resolution passed by such majority as therein mentioned, at a meeting of such holders convened as therein mentioned, to consent on behalf of all the holders of shares of the class to (among other things) any scheme for the reduction of capital affecting prejudicially the class of shares, and provided that a resolution so passed should be binding upon all the holders of shares of the class.

Article 58 (so far as is material) was as follows: "Every member shall have one vote for every share held by him."

In 1896 special resolutions of the company were duly passed and confirmed for reduction of the capital, the reduction to be effected by reducing the nominal amount of the ordinary shares from £10 to £8 each and extinguishing the liability in respect of uncalled capital on the ordinary shares to the extent of £2 per share. The resolutions were passed with a view of subsequently subdividing the capital into shares of £1 each, fully paid up, and with this object in view the company at the same time passed and confirmed a special resolution altering the articles by giving every member one vote for every £1 of the issued capital for the time being.

Immediately after the passing of these resolutions separate meetings of the holders of the preference and ordinary shares were held, at which resolutions consenting to the reduction and proposed alteration of the articles were duly passed by the requisite majority of each of the classes of shareholders.

Levett, Q.C., and Wace, in support of the petition.—By the proposed reduction the voting power of the ordinary shareholders is diminished, and that, according to the decision of Chitty, J., in In re Continental Union Gas Co., 7 T. L. R. 476, is a fatal blot; but that decision was founded on Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co. (No. 2), 13 W. R. 1059, 2 Dr. & Sm. 521, which was recently overruled by the Court of Appeal in Andrews v. Gas Meter Co., ante, p. 321; and it was also dissented from by Lord Macnaghten in British and American Trustee and Finance Corporation v. Couper, 42 W. R. 652, [1894] A. C. 399, at p. 417. In any case article 51 removes any objection there may be to the reduction on the ground of the ordinary shareholders being prejudicially affected: In re Pinkney & Sons Steamship Co., 40 W. R. 698, [1892] 3 Ch. 125.

ROMER, J.—In my opinion the fact that by the resolutions the voting powers of the two classes of shareholders are somewhat altered is not of necessity fatal to those resolutions.

In the case before me there are special provisions in the articles enabling a majority of each class to bind their class in certain matters, which would, I think, cover an alteration in voting power consequent on a reduction of capital; and meetings of each class of shareholders have been duly held, and resolutions passed so as to bind the class.

I cannot help thinking that the decision of Chitty, J., in the case of In re Continental Union Gas Co. was based on the principle supposed to be established by Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co., and would not have been given if, at the time, the last-mentioned case had been overruled (as it has since been) by Andrews v. Gas Meter Co.

I think that in a proper case the court has power to confirm a reduction of capital, notwithstanding the voting powers may thereby be affected. I therefore sanction the reduction.

This was a summons for the determination of questions arising under the will of Edward Hunter, late of Blackheath and County Wicklow, Ireland.

The testator died in July, 1896. By his will made in May, 1877, after various specific bequests and a gift to his wife if she should survive him, which did not happen, and subject in certain events which did not happen to the respective life interests each in one moiety of his residuary estate of a sister and and brother-in-law, the testator gave the whole of his estate, which was about £90,000 in personalty and some real estate, as follows:

"And I delare that on the death of such of them my said sister and brother-in-law the moiety in which she or he shall have had a life interest as aforesaid or so much thereof as shall be legally applicable for charitable purposes shall be paid or transferred by my general trustees for the time being to special trustees to be held and applied by them upon the trusts and in manner following, that is to say—

"The special trustees may retain or invest such part of my residuary estate as shall come to or devolve upon them in or upon any stocks, funds, shares, or securities which they may think proper and whether of the class herein before prescribed by me or not, and they may apply the income or any portion of the capital in grants (a) for or towards the purchase of advowsons or presentations; or (b) in creating or contributing to the erection, improvement, or endowment of churches, chapels, or schools; or (c) in paying or contributing to the salaries or income of rectors, vicars, or incumbents, masters, or teachers, but upon the following conditions:

"(1) That only such churches or chapels shall be subscribed or contributed to wherein the service shall, in the opinion of the special trustees, be conducted upon pure Protestant and Church of England principles, by which I mean the principles of the Church of England as held and inculcated by those of her divines, clergy, and members who are distinguished as Evangelical and loyal to the work and fruits of the Reformation and as holding doctrines and principles free from all Popish or Roman Catholic tendency and opposed thereto.

"(2) That only such schools shall be subscribed or contributed to wherein true Protestant and Church of England principles are distinctly taught and inculcated with preference to those established for children of the poorer classes.

"(3) That only such masters and teachers receive grants who best show forth by their teaching and example true Protestant and Church of England principles.

"(4) That no payment shall be made directly or indirectly to or for the benefit of any rector, vicar, or incumbent unless upon condition that he shall if not prohibited in law at the principal Sunday morning service in his church, selecting a time and state of weather when the congregation is supposed to be greatest, read the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, and which I recommend he should make the subject of his discourse from time to time, and upon further condition that he shall on the first Sunday of every month at the chief morning service preach a sermon on love from a text taken from the Gospel, Epistles, or Revelations of St. John.

"And I declare that if the special trustees shall find or consider that any rector, vicar or incumbent, master or teacher, shall preach, teach, publish, inculcate, encourage, adopt, or follow any doctrines or practices which shall be contrary to or at variance with true Protestant and Church of England principles, he or she shall be disqualified from receiving any benefit under this my will; and it being my wish that as much as possible of my residuary estate shall be applicable and available for administration by special trustees in manner aforesaid, I declare that all my debts, funeral, and testamentary expenses, and the duty on all legacies under this my will or any codicil not payable by the legatees, shall be raised and paid out of such parts of my residuary estate as are not legally applicable to charitable purposes to the exoneration of the residue thereof, and that no part of my residuary estate which shall be so legally applicable shall be invested or dealt with so as to make the same inapplicable or unavailable for these purposes."

The testator further declared "that on the death of each of them my said sister and brother-in-law the moiety in which she or he shall have had a life interest as aforesaid, as shall not be legally applicable to charitable purposes, shall be held by my general trustees for the time being upon trust for my nieces Marion Edwards, Eliza Evelyn Edwards, Rachel Edwards, and Mary Ann Cooke, or such of them as shall survive me in equal shares."

The first question for decision was whether the objects of the residuary gift were of a charitable nature.

The second question was whether there was in the event of the failure of the charitable gift a valid gift to the testator's nieces or an intestacy.

It was contended by the heir-at-law and next-of-kin that there was a complete intestacy in respect of the residue as the gift to the nieces was a gift only of what could not be left for charitable purposes, and that since the Mortmain Act, 1891, all property can be so given.

W. C. Druce, for the plaintiff, the surviving trustee and executor of the testator.

Sir R. Webster, A.G., Ingle Joyce, and Dibdin, for the Attorney-General.—The gift for grants for or towards the purchase of advowsons, &c., is a good charitable gift. Advowsons can be the subject of charitable trusts: In re St. Stephen, Coleman-street, 36 W. R. 837, [1888] 39 Ch. D. 492. The purpose of this and similar trusts is to ensure greater care in the selection of incumbents. Further, the conditions in the will are applicable to this gift, and show the testator's object to be the promotion of "evangelical" doctrine—a good charitable purpose. Advowson trusts, even if not "charitable," are valid as exceptions to the rule against perpetuities: Attorney-General v. Webster, 1875, L. R. 20 Eq. 483, p. 491, 24 W R. Dig. 48; Lewis on Perpetuities, p. 694. Even if this particular purpose should be invalid, the whole gift will not fail, as there is a clear general charitable intent shown by the will: In re Douglas, Obert v. Barrow, 1887, 35 W. R. 740, 35 Ch. D. 472.

Levett, Q.C., and G. Lawrence, for the heir and next-of-kin of the testator.—The first object is bad for indefiniteness, and the whole gift fails. There is no general charitable intent expressed in the will.

Farwell, Q.C., and Ashworth James, for the nieces.—No general charitable intent. The gift for purchasing advowsons and presentions in order to present to vacancies only clergymen holding Evangelical views is uncharitable rather than charitable.

ROMER, J.—Further consideration of this case has not enabled me to see my way to support this gift. The first object mentioned by the testator upon which his special trustees are to be at liberty to expend the income or any portion of the capital of the trust fund is "in grants for or towards the purchase of advowsons or presentations." Now, if this is not a charitable purpose it appears to me the whole gift fails. It fails on the general principle, shown by a series of authorities, amongst the last of which is In re Macduff, ante, p. 154, [1896] 2 Ch. 451, that a gift by a will of the class I am dealing with is not a good charitable gift if the trustees may (speaking of substantial matters) apply the property to some purpose which is not charitable.

Now, in considering in this case whether the abovementioned object is or is not charitable, I must look to the whole will. But when I do so I am still unable to hold that the object is charitable. It may be conceded that the testator thought the objects he indicated in his will were all charitable—and some are undoubtedly charitable—but the testator's opinion, of course, will not make the gift good if his first object specified is really not charitable. And I can find nothing in the will that I can properly lay hold of which enables me to declare the first object to be charitable. None of the conditions mentioned by the testator apply in terms to the first object. At most, all I can gather from these conditions and from the will as a whole, is that the testator hoped and expected that the person or persons who might purchase the advowsons or presentations by means of grants from the trust fund would on vacancies occurring present fit Protestant clergymen of the class which (to use in an abbreviated form the language of the testator) is distinguished as Evangelical. The testator has not limited his special trustees to the purchase of advowsons or presentations in their own names. The words of the gift are "in grants for or towards the purchase," and I can see nothing in the will to enable me to hold that if a grant is made to some third person or persons to purchase an advowson or presentation such person or persons is or are to hold it when purchased upon any trust, still less upon any charitable trust. And even if the special trustees bought in their own names I cannot see upon what trust (if any) they were to hold. And, further, assuming that they were to hold upon trust to present Evangelical clergymen as vacancies occur I cannot see that this is a charitable trust. Indeed, in one sense, so far as it would tend to narrow down the number of fit and proper clergymen of the Church of England from whom to select for the vacancies and to prevent the parishioners in which the livings were given ever having any clergymen in the parish except of the Evangelical type, whether they wished it or not, it might be said to be decidedly uncharitable. Whoever holds an advowson or presentation is bound on a vacancy to present a fit and proper clergyman of the Church of England, and I cannot see what charity it can be to try and get advowsons or presentations in the hands of particular persons or in the hands of persons likely only to select from a special class of the clergymen of the Church of England. Reference was made to the case of In re Douglas. But that case in no wise conflicts with the cases above referred to, of which In re Macduff is one, and which, in my opinion, govern this. All that In re Douglas really decided I will state. In that case you could gather from the will that the testator intended to give his property to charitable societies to be selected by a person he had named, and that he thought certain societies he named were charitable, and indicated them as being within the power of selection by his nominee. But his nominee in making the selection did not include in such selection any of the societies the objects of which were disputed as not being charitable. In that state of things the court held that the gift intended for the benefit of charities was not rendered bad merely because the societies named by the testator might prove on investigation to be uncharitable. In re Douglas clearly does not apply to the case before me. For these reasons I hold the gift bad as a charitable gift, and void.

With respect to the second question, his lordship held that the declaration in favour of the nieces did not amount to a gift over of the residue, but was in terms limited to property which could not be legally applied by the testator to charity. As there was no such property, there was nothing which passed to the nieces. The result was that, with respect to the whole property in question, it must be declared that the testator died intestate.

It was stated that the nieces were among the next-of-kin.

REG. v. THE GUARDIANS OF LEWISHAM UNION. (a.)

Practice—Mandamus—Vaccination Acts—Refusal of guardians to enforce—Application by urban sanitary authority—No legal right to performance of the duty sought to be enforced.

The District Board of Works for L. as the urban sanitary authority applied for a mandamus to compel the guardians of the poor of that district to put in force the provisions of the Vaccination Acts.

Held, that, as the urban sanitary authority had no specific legal right to the enforcement of any statutory duty by the guardians, the remedy sought was inapplicable and must be refused, because it had always been held that a clear legal or equitable right to the performance of the duty which it was desired should be enforced was necessary to support an application for a mandamus.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Rule nisi for a mandamus.

The Lewisham District Board of Works had obtained a rule, calling upon the Guardians of the Lewisham Union to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding them to enforce the Vaccination Acts, 1867 and 1871, by instructing their vaccination officer to take proceedings before the justices, both in regard to special cases and also in general, against persons contravening the provisions of those Acts.

Lord Coleridge, Q.C. (with him Schultess Young), showed cause against the rule being made absolute. Both the district board and the board of the Lewisham Guardians were under the control of the Local Government Board. To the latter the district board had already applied on the same subject, but their requisition had not been complied with. The present proceedings are misconceived. [He was stopped.]

[WRIGHT, J.—The present application is quite contrary to my knowledge of the law of mandamus. No doubt the board of works have an obligation to see that the Acts are enforced, but I doubt if they have any legal interest in that sense which would enable them to proceed by mandamus against the guardians. We should like to hear counsel in support of the rule on that point.]

Macmorran, Q.C. (with him Poyser), in support of the rule.—By the Metropolitan Management Acts and the Public Health (London) Act, the district board of works were entrusted with the whole of the sanitary administration of their district. In the event of an outbreak of small-pox, the responsibility of dealing with it would fall upon them, and therefore they had the greatest possible interest in seeing that the guardians performed their duties and guarded against such an outbreak by properly enforcing the Vaccination Acts. The board of works therefore had a substantial interest in the performance of the duty which was the subject-matter of the rule. [WRIGHT, J.—That may be, but they have no specific legal right.] Reg. v. The Guardians of Keighley Union, 39 J. P. 360. [WRIGHT, J.—The guardians in that case did not think proper to show cause, and thereupon the rule was made absolute. It does not appear to be recognized as an authority by any text-book.] Ex parte Macmahon, 48 J. P. 70. The powers to enforce the Vaccination Acts which were given to the Local Government Board against private persons were not applicable against the guardians, and the district board of works had no remedy against that body other than by mandamus. The court, therefore, had no discretionary power, because the refusal to grant a mandamus would leave the board of works without remedy, since they had already petitioned the Local Government Board and that authority had refused to move in the matter.

WRIGHT, J.—The question raised by this case is one of very great importance, but the point we have first to decide is whether under the circumstances we have the power at all to grant the mandamus asked for. I think not. Certainly as long as I have had anything to do with applications for writs of mandamus I have always understood it to be the law that the applicant for the writ must show that he has a personal specific legal right to the performance of the duty which he asks the court to direct the performance of. That is a rule which has repeatedly been laid down in text-books. In Tapping on Mandamus (1848), p. 27, there is this passage: "The prosecutor must be clothed with a clear legal and equitable right to something which is properly the subject of the writ, as a legal right by virtue of an Act of Parliament." If this court were to take upon itself to enforce by mandamus the performance by public bodies of all their duties without ascertaining whether the person applying for the rule had a legal right to the enforcement of such duty, we should be assuming to ourselves a jurisdiction which these courts certainly have never had since the days of Coke. It seems to me also that this application ought to be discharged on another ground—namely, that, under the Vaccination Acts of 1871 and 1874 the Local Government Board has quite sufficient power to see to this matter and to make the local authority perform their duties by means of the machinery provided by those Acts.

BRUCE, J.—I also recognize the great importance of the question, and I regret that on a technical point this application must be refused. But the practice is well established. This court has never had a general power to compel acts by mandamus except in those cases where it has been satisfied that the person applying for the rule has a legal right which was about to be infringed.

Rule discharged.

BRADFORD, COMMISSIONER OF POLICE (Appellant) v. DAWSON AND PARKER (Respondents). (a.)

Gaming—Betting—House used for payment of bets made elsewhere—Betting House Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), ss. 1, 3.

The use of a house by a person for the payment of bets made by him previously and elsewhere, is not the using of the house for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto within the meaning of section 3 of the Betting House Act, 1853, as the payment of such a bet does not constitute the Act of "betting" within the meaning of that statute.

This was a case stated by E. Fenwick, Esq., one of the metropolitan police court magistrates.

"1. On the 27th and 29th of June and the 13th and 18th of July, 1896, the respondents, Harry Dawson (senior) and Thomas Bishop Parker, appeared before me to answer respectively the charges in the following summonses under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119.

"Harry Dawson (senior), for that he, on the 8th, 9th, 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, and 16th of May, 1896, being a person using the 'Duke's Head' beer-house, Pocock-street, Blackfriars-road, did use the same for the purposes of betting with persons resorting thereto, contrary to section 3 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119 (the Betting House Act of 1853). And Thomas Bishop Parker, for that he, on the 8th, 9th, 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, and 16th of May, 1896, being the occupier of the 'Duke's Head' beer-house aforesaid, did knowingly and wilfully permit the same to be used by Harry Dawson (senior) for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto, contrary to the same section of the Betting House Act aforesaid.

"The following facts were, I find, proved in evidence before me:

"2. The defendant Thomas Bishop Parker was, at the date of the offences alleged against him, the licensed and rated occupier of the 'Duke's Head' beer-house, Pocock-street, Blackfriars-road, and had been since the 8th of November, 1893. The said Thomas Bishop Parker resided on the said premises, and, with the assistance of his wife, carried on the business of the beer-house. Prior to the 8th of November, 1893, the defendant Harry Dawson (senior) was the licensee of the house.

"3. The defendant, Harry Dawson (senior) carries on the business of a professional bookmaker.

"4. It was proved to my satisfaction that on the seven days mentioned in the summonses the defendant Harry Dawson (senior) was at the 'Duke's Head' beer-house aforesaid between the hours of 8 and 9 p.m. for the purpose of paying out to a number of persons who resorted to and came into the said house for the purpose, sums of money which they had won from Harry Dawson (senior) on bets made by such persons with Harry Dawson (senior) on the result of horse-races.

"The defendant Harry Dawson, with the cognizance and connivance of the defendant Thomas Bishop Parker always located himself in the private part of the bar at the corner of the counter close to a back room or parlour, which he was permitted by the defendant Parker to make use of at will.

"The habitual practice (which I find to have existed on the days mentioned in the summons) was for the persons who had won bets, and who resorted to the house in considerable numbers for the purpose of obtaining payment of their bets, to present a slip of paper to the defendant Dawson, which they usually placed on the counter. Dawson would then look at the slip, step into the back room above referred to, come out again with another slip, and, after comparing the two, pay over to the person who had originally handed him the slip the sum of money which appeared to be due to such person. It was proved to my satisfaction that the defendant Parker had full knowledge of the nature of the transactions carried out by the defendant Dawson.

"5. No evidence was adduced before me on the part of the prosecution showing the receipt by Harry Dawson (senior) at the 'Duke's Head' beer-house of any slips of paper or money at the initial stage of the betting, neither was there any evidence to show when or where the agreements or contracts in pursuance of which the said sums of money mentioned in paragraph 4 and paid over by Harry Dawson (senior) as therein stated, had been entered into and made. But I was satisfied that Harry Dawson (senior) carried on the material part, as above set forth, of his business as a professional bookmaker in the said 'Duke's Head' beer-house, and used the house to that extent for the purpose of his said business.

"6. It was contended before me for the prosecution that the habitual user of the house by a professional bookmaker for the purpose of meeting customers with whom he had betting transactions, by settling up with them any bets with regard to which they were winners, amounted to a user of the house contrary to the Betting House Act of 1853. It was submitted that the paying out of bets was a most substantial and essential part of the transaction of betting, and in support of this contention the case of the Queen v. Worton, reported in [1895] 1 Q. B. 227, 64 L. J. M. C. 74, 43 W. R. Dig. 69, was referred to.

"On the part of the defendant it was argued that the transactions which it had been proved the defendant Dawson was a party to could in no way be said to come within the section of the Act in question, and for the defence the case, amongst others, of Davis

v. Stephenson, 38 W. R. 492, 24 Q. B. D. 529, was quoted.

"7. I was of opinion that the facts above stated, as proved before me, did not, in point of law constitute the commission by H. Dawson (senior) of an offence against the Betting House Act, 1853, and, being of this opinion I dismissed the summons against him. With regard to the defendant Parker, it was admitted by the prosecution that if the user by Dawson was not illegal the case against the licensee of the house failed also, and I therefore dismissed the summons against him.

"The question for the opinion of the court was whether such decision was right."

By section 1 of the Betting House Act, 1853, it is provided that "No house, office, room, or other place shall be opened, kept, or used for the purpose of the owner, occupier, or keeper thereof, or any person using the same . . . betting with persons resorting thereto."

Section 3 provides that "any person who, being the owner or occupier of any house, office, room, or other place, or a person using the same, shall open, keep, or use the same for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned, or either of them; and any person who, being the owner or occupier of any house, room, office, or other place shall knowingly and wilfully permit the same to be opened, kept, or used, by any other person for the purposes aforesaid, or either of them . . . shall, on summary conviction thereof," be liable to a penalty.

Danckwerts, for the appellant.—The magistrate's decision was wrong. It is not necessary that the bet should be actually made in the house in order to bring it within the scope of section 3. If it were to be held that that was necessary the area of the Act would be very much narrowed and great abuse would arise; betting men would use public-houses as regular places of meeting, and the object of the Act would be defeated. The word "betting" means both the entering into the agreement to pay and the actual payment or performance of the agreement.

Bigham, Q.C. (Grain with him), for the respondent Dawson.—What took place here did not amount to an act of betting within the meaning of the Act. What the Act aimed at was the making of a bet in the house.

L. W. Kershaw, for the respondent Parker.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. The Act was passed to prevent the demoralization of improvident persons. The offence with which the respondent Dawson was charged is said to have been committed under section 3 of the Betting Act, 1853. [The learned judge read the section.] Bets were made with him by a number of persons who frequented the "Duke's Head," and Dawson used the house in question, of which the respondent Parker was the occupier, for the purpose of paying bets which he had already made and which he had lost. The question we have to decide is whether such payment of bets constitutes an offence within the meaning of the Act. I unhesitatingly come to the conclusion that paying a bet is not "making" a bet. To my mind it is impossible to read sections 1 and 3 of the Act without coming to that conclusion. The object of the Act was to prevent betting in a house. It is quite true that in every fair contract of wagering there is implied an honourable obligation that the loser shall pay his losses, but the making of the bets and the payment of the losses, sometimes many months afterwards, are two totally different things. In this case the bets, having been made out of the house, the mere fact of paying them in it, does not come within the Act.

CAVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. When a person pays a bet which he has made on a previous occasion it cannot be said that he is thereby betting, any more than it could be said that a person who has purchased an article on credit is buying it when he subsequently pays for it.

WILLS, J.—I entirely agree.

WRIGHT, J.—I confess I feel some doubt in this case. The object of the Act was to prevent persons from carrying on the business of betting, and it seems to me that the payment of bets is a very important part of that business, for if bets were not paid they would not be made. However, as this is a penal statute and must be construed strictly, and as I do not feel sufficient confidence in my own opinion to dissent, I agree with the judgments that have been given.

KENNEDY, J.—I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

THE RIBBLE JOINT COMMITTEE v. THE CROSTON URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

River—Pollution—Consent order—Non-compliance—Tidal waters—Jurisdiction of county court—Estoppel—Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 75), ss. 3, 10, 20.

In 1893 an order was made in a county court, under the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, by consent between the plaintiffs and the defendants, restraining the defendants from permitting sewage to flow into a river, and ordering the defendants to construct certain sewage works. In 1896 the defendants, having not complied with the order, proceedings were taken for the recovery of penalties. The defendants desired to show that the river in question was a tidal river, and that therefore there was no jurisdiction to make the order.

Held, that, the order having been made by consent and being good on the face of it, the defendants were not entitled to show in answer to the claim for penalties that the river was one as to which a valid restraining order could not be made. If a mistake had been made proceedings should be taken to set the order aside.

Appeal of the defendants from a judgment of the Preston County Court in an action for penalties under the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876.

In 1893 an order was made by consent under sections 3 and 10 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, in the Preston County Court in proceedings to which the present plaintiffs and the Croston Local Board (the predecessors of the present defendants) were parties.

By that order it was declared that the defendants had committed an offence against the Act by permitting sewage to flow through channels under their control into the River Yarrow, and thence into the Rivers Douglas and Ribble; and that the defendants had made default in not using the best practicable means to render harmless the sewage which they had permitted so to flow; and the defendants were ordered to abstain from the commission of the offences and to forthwith construct the necessary works to prevent the further pollution of the River Yarrow and the River Douglas.

The proceeding under the order were stayed pending the construction of the sewage works. Owing, it was said, to the poverty of the district, these works had not by July, 1896, been constructed.

It was then alleged by the defendants that they had ascertained that the greater part of the River Yarrow was tidal, and that, therefore, the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, did not apply.

Thereupon the plaintiffs brought this action for penalties for non-compliance with the order of 1893.

At the trial of the action the defendants contended that, in so far as the River Yarrow was tidal, the order had no application.

The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs for penalties to the amount of £114.

The Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, s. 3, provides that "every person who causes to fall or flow, or knowingly permits to fall or flow, or to be carried into any stream any solid or liquid sewage matter, shall (subject as in this Act mentioned) be deemed to have committed an offence against this Act."

Section 10 provides that offences against the Act may be restrained by summary order of a county court, and that a penalty not exceeding £50 a day shall be imposed for non-compliance with an order.

Section 20 defines a "stream," which does not include the sea or tidal waters unless the Local Government Board so order after local inquiry.

Macmorran, Q.C. (with him Firth), for the defendants.—The county court had no jurisdiction to make an order as to the tidal part of the river, and therefore the order was to that extent not binding on the defendants. The order was made under a mistake of both parties, for it was assumed that the whole of the river was non-tidal. The order is good on the face of it, but the defendants are not estopped from proving that the order only applies to a part of the river, and that as to that part no offence has been committed. A judgment is not an estoppel, if the court which gave the judgment exceeded its jurisdiction in doing so.

E. Sutton (with him F. H. Mellor), for the plaintiffs.—When the order was made in 1893 the defendants consented to a certain state of facts without which the order could not have been made. By so doing the defendants induced the plaintiffs to stand by during all this interval of time, and to abstain from taking the necessary steps, if any were necessary, to bring these waters within their jurisdiction by application to the Local Government Board under section 20 of the Act. Under these circumstances, even if the order is not in itself an estoppel, the defendants are now estopped from alleging that there was no jurisdiction to make the order as to the whole of the river.

He referred to In re South American and Mexican Co., Ex parte Bank of England, 43 W. R. 131, [1895] Ch. 37.

Macmorran replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 17.—WILLS, J.—The facts in this case are that in the year 1893 the Joint Committee of the River Ribble made a complaint against the defendants, the Croston Urban District Council, for pouring sewage matter into the streams which were within the jurisdiction of the joint committee, and the defendants submitted to a consent order in the county court made under the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, s. 10. By this order the court declared that the defendants have committed an offence against the Act by permitting to fall or flow, or be carried through channels under their control into the River Yarrow, and thence into the River Douglas, and into the River Ribble, sewage matter contrary to the provisions of section 3 of the said Act. The defendants also submitted to a declaration that they had failed in their duty by not using the best practicable and available means to render harmless the sewage matter which they permitted to fall or flow, or to be carried as aforesaid into the said River Yarrow, and into the River Douglas, and into the River Ribble, contrary to the provisions of the Act. The present action was brought in the county court to recover penalties in respect of the breach of the injunction that was founded upon these declarations.

The defendants set up this defence. Although they admitted on the former occasion that it was an offence to allow sewage to flow out of the River Yarrow into the Rivers Douglas and Ribble, and therefore admitted that the parts of the Rivers Douglas and Ribble into which the sewage flowed were non-tidal waters, they seek now to show that they are tidal waters, and that, therefore, any order made with respect to them was beyond the jurisdiction of the county court. I am of the opinion that no such contention as that can be set up in answer to an action for penalties for not obeying the order to which they submitted.. The order is perfectly good on the face of it, and could only be shown to be beyond the jurisdiction of the county court upon proof of that which no doubt would be controverted matter, and which must have been controverted matter, but which at the time this order was submitted to was given up by the defendants and admitted by them to be incapable of settlement in their favour. It seems to me that it would never do to allow an order, which is at present a valid order of the court, to be disregarded, or to allow the defendants now to set up circumstances, which they might have urged at the time, as reasons why the order should not have been made, in answer to a complaint that they have disobeyed the order to which they so consented. I think it would be contrary to all principle and to all practice to allow that. This order of 1893 at the present time, and under the present circumstances—under the circumstances on which reliance is sought to be placed—either is or is not capable of being set right. If it cannot be set right then it must remain. But on the face of it there is no reason why it should not be acted upon. If it can be set right, an action for the purpose of setting it right on the ground on which such a claim can be made, is the proper remedy. The proper remedy is certainly not to refuse to obey the order which upon due consideration the parties submitted to at the time it was made. I am therefore of opinion that this appeal must fail.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion. The original order might have been appealed from on the the merits, but it was not. It can now be appealed from, if at all, only by leave being obtained to withdraw the consent to the original order on the ground of mistake.

Then as to the rest of the case I do not think any merits are shown here. I think there ought at least to have been an affidavit showing what evidence could have been given if the county court would have listened to it. We have had no indication of any such evidence. Having regard to the conduct of the urban district council, I do not think we ought to interfere.

Q. B. Div. (Pollock, B., and Wills, J.) — Dec. 4, 5.

The London and North-Western Railway Co. (Appellants) v. The Llandudno Improvement Commissioners (Respondents). (a.)

Railway—Rating—Station buildings—Roof, platforms, and adjuncts of station—Rating of "land used as a railway"—Llandudno Improvement Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. cii.), ss. 67, 68, 79.

Under an Improvement Act commissioners were empowered to make annually a general improvement rate, and a section of the Act provided that the owners and occupiers of houses, buildings, and all other property should be rated at the full net annual value, with an exception in favour of (inter alia) "land used as a railway constructed under the powers of an Act of Parliament for public conveyance," which was to be rated at one-fourth only of the net annual value. A railway having been constructed under an Act of Parliament for public conveyance,

Held, that, in the rating of the station buildings—the roof covering the railway, platforms, and sidings, and the platforms themselves came within the exemption "land used as a railway," and were to be rated at one-fourth only of the full net annual value; but that the roof covering the cab-drive and buildings, the cab-drive, horse and cattle landings, and pens and crane in goods yard did not come within the exemption, and were to be rated at the full annual value.

Appeal against a general improvement rate made by the respondents.

By consent and by order of a judge, the facts were stated in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court.

The appellants were the owners and occupiers of a branch railway from Llandudno Junction to Llandudno, with its appurtenances and a terminal station at Llandudno, which were constructed partly on land acquired under the powers of an Act of Parliament (the St. George's Harbour Act, 1853, 16 & 17 Vict c. cxxiii.), and partly on land acquired under subsequent Acts relating to the London and North-Western Railway Co.; and this railway was constructed, and was being used for public conveyance.

For the purposes of the present argument, but for no other purpose, it was agreed that items 1 to 9 hereinafter mentioned were to be taken as being on land formerly used and occupied by the St. George's Harbour Co. and used for the purposes of their undertaking. Those numbered 10, 11, and part of No. 12, were not so owned or occupied, but had been constructed on land acquired for public conveyance under the Railway Acts above referred to. No. 14 consisted of land (with sidings placed thereon) coming as to one-half under the former, and as to the other half under the latter, of the above descriptions.

(a.) Reported by Sir Sherston Baker, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

The respondents were commissioners incorporated by the Llandudno Improvement Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. cii.), and the said railway and Llandudno station were within the limits of this Act.

By section 67 of the Llandudno Improvement Act, 1854, the respondents were empowered to make annually a rate or assessment to be called "the general improvement rate" upon all lands, estates, and property of every sort, kind, or description, for the time being liable to be rated to the relief of the poor within the limits of the Act, according to the annual value of the same; and by sections 68 and 79 of the Act it was enacted as follows:

Section 68.—"That the owners and occupiers of houses, buildings, courtyards, and gardens, and all other property shall be rated at the full net annual value of the same, provided always that the occupier of any land used as arable, meadow, or pasture ground only, or as woodlands, market gardens, or nursery grounds, and the occupier of any land covered with water or used only as a canal or towing path for the same, or as a railway constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament for public conveyance, shall so far as respects the said general improvement rate be assessed in respect of the same in the proportion of one-fourth part only of such net annual value thereof."

Section 79.—"And whereas the said St. George's Harbour Co. are or are about to become the owners and occupiers of land within the limits of this Act to be used for the purposes of their undertaking: Be it enacted that nothing in this Act contained shall prejudice, lessen, or defeat the rights or interests of the said St. George's Harbour Co. otherwise than by this Act expressly provided, and that the said company shall in respect of the railway works and property of the said company within the limits aforesaid be rated as follows: The line of railway (when constructed) for rating purposes shall be considered as agricultural and shall be valued and rated in the same manner and proportion as the land abutting on each side of the line within the limits of the Act, and the station buildings and other hereditaments shall be rated in the same manner as other houses, buildings, and hereditaments within the limits of this Act are to be rated for the purposes of the Act."

Under the St. George's Harbour Act, 1853, the St. George's Harbour Co. were empowered to construct a harbour and certain jetties, landing places, buildings, and other works, and a line of railway.

At the time when the Llandudno Improvement Act was passed the railway in question had been authorized by the St. George's Harbour Act of the previous year, but had not been actually constructed.

In July, 1894, the respondents made a general improvement rate, in which the property occupied by the appellants was rated as set out in the rate-book, the property the rating of which was now in dispute was described as "Land occupied by Llandudno station buildings, sidings, and appurtenances," and this comprised (a) the station buildings described in the first schedule to the case, as to which there was no dispute and the full net annual value of which was £240; (b) the roof, platform, sidings, and other matters and things described in the 2nd schedule to this case and numbered 1 to 14, the improved or full net annual value of which was £1,060.

The appellants' property comprised in the fourteen items set out in the 2nd schedule was as follows: (1) that part of the station roof which covered a portion of the length of the line of railway; (2) that part of the station roof which covered a portion of the station platforms; (3) that part of the station roof which covered a portion of the length of the cab-drive; (4) that part of the station roof which covered a portion of the sidings; (5) that part of the station roof which covered portion of the station buildings; (6) portion of the station platforms under roof; (7) portions of the station platforms which are not covered by the station roof; (8) cab-drive under the roof; (9) portion of cab-drive and horse-landing uncovered by station roof; (10) cattle-landing and pens beyond the limits of roof and uncovered by roof; (11) crane in goods yard; (12) signal-boxes and appurtenances; (13) engine turntable; (14) sidings and land.

The parties agreed that the net annual values of the property described in the above schedule, were, first, as agricultural land (total £66); and secondly, in its present condition—that is, its full net annual value (total £1,060).

The appellants contended that upon the true construction of the Improvement Act, and in accordance with the principle laid down in The South Wales Railway Co. v. The Swansea Local Board, 4 E. & B. 189, 24 L. J. M. C. 30, and other cases, the appellants' property above described ought, for the purposes of the improvement rate, to have been valued as agricultural land, and rated in the proportion of one-fourth of such value, as being within section 79, as the "line of railway"; or alternatively at one-fourth of the improved or full net annual value, as being "land used for a railway" within section 68, and that the said improvement rate ought to be reduced accordingly.

The respondents contended that the appellants ought to be assessed and rated to the improvement rate in respect of items 1 to 11 at the full net annual value; but the respondents admitted, and now admit, that as to the items 12, 13, and 14, the appellants ought only to be assessed at one-fourth of the full net annual value.

The questions for the opinion of the court were whether the appellants are liable to be assessed and rated in respect of the above properties in the proportion of one-fourth of the agricultural value, or in the proportion of one-fourth of the full net annual value, or in respect of items 1 to 11 at the full net annual value, and in respect of items 12 to 14 at one-fourth of the full net annual value.

If the court should be of opinion that all the portions of the appellants' property ought to be assessed at the full net annual value, the appeal to quarter sessions was to be dismissed; if the court should be of opinion that any of the items ought to be assessed at one-fourth of the agricultural value, or at one-fourth of the full net annual value, the rate was to be reduced accordingly, and the appeal to quarter sessions to be allowed.

Pollock, B.—This case is stated for our opinion in respect of certain particular portions of the railway property which are designated in schedule 2 of the case, being numbered from 1 to 14. With regard to 12, 13, and 14 the question whether those are to be assessed at one-fourth of the full net value or at the full net value is concluded by an admission by the respondents that the appellants ought only to be assessed at one-fourth of the full net annual value, and therefore with regard to 12, 13, and 14 no question arises upon this part of the case.

The substantial question argued before us is one of considerable importance, and but for the decisions which have already passed upon the subject I should have taken time to consider what would be the true and sound rule of dealing with the different Acts of Parliament that provide for the rating of railways and adjuncts to railways, as in the present case. But it seems to me for the purposes of this case and of this court that the matter is already established by decision. The question arises under section 68 of the Llandudno Improvement Act. That section, by the specific mention of houses and buildings, would include all houses and buildings that are part of a railway station, because there is there a distinct denomination of the particular property which is rated, and that must be taken to govern—although in a minor sense those buildings may be said to be a part of the station. Therefore, so far as those buildings are concerned, no question can arise. But then comes the proviso in the section: "Provided always that the occupation of any land . . . as a railway constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament for public conveyance shall, so far as respects the said general improvement rate, be assessed in respect of the same in the proportion of one-fourth part only of such net annual value thereof." Then comes the question whether the different specified lands, and things built upon the land, numbered 1 to 11, are within the provision as part of a railway constructed under the powers of the Act of Parliament. I think the first decision in point of date upon this subject is in the year 1854 in the case of The South Wales Railway Co. v. The Swansea Local Board. In that case the court seems to have come to a conclusion which to my mind is perfectly clear when you are dealing with a road station, as it is commonly called—that is to say, where a railway is made upon an embankment or made in a cutting, so that there is at the side the embankment in the one case, and the bank of the cutting in the other, and upon that a station is built. Whatever be the length of the platform, that station, is obviously not only built for the purposes of the railway, and is of such a nature that without it the railway could not be properly used, but it is actually built upon land occupied by the railway and without which the rails themselves could not be properly maintained. The court there, clearly to my mind, could only come to the conclusion that because the company added to that embankment, or to that bank of a cutting some further accommodation in the nature of a station and platform, you could not rate that which was built upon land which already was freed from rating as being a necessary part of the railway. But that case was not in respect of a terminus, and it is quite clear that the same ground of decision would hold in the case of a terminus with regard to the actual lines of railway and the platforms on either side of those lines of railway that were built upon land of the same character as that which I have just designated. But if the decision stopped there, there would be a manifest inconvenience, because the question whether the platforms of a terminus station should be rated or not would depend upon whether the lines came into the particular station upon an embankment or in a cutting, or upon a dead level. If they came in upon a level, a great part at any rate of the grounds of argument upon which the judgment of the court in that case rested would not apply. I cannot but think that, supposing that had been the case of a dead level, still the court would have come to the same conclusion, though not exactly upon the same grounds. But it is unnecessary to decide that, because it is quite clear that by a decision which was given in the next year by the House of Lords in Adamson v. The Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Co., any court dealing with the construction of an Act of Parliament for rating purposes in which the words "a railway" were used, would be entitled to go beyond the mere physical rails and the lands that those rails immediately rest upon. I think it is quite clear that this court should obey the forcible reasoning which is indicated by the two learned lords (Lords Cranworth and Brougham) in that decision. Beyond that I do not desire to give undue weight to that case, because there are many reasons why, when you come to apply it to the purpose of this case, you find that it is not a case in pari materiâ. Therefore I only cite it for the general ground of decision to be found in it. But there is another decision, which is one I think we are bound loyally to obey, and one which is based, to my mind, on somewhat broader, and I cannot help thinking sounder, reasons, perhaps, than the case of The South Wales Railway Co. v. The Swansea Local Board; I refer to the case of The North-Eastern Railway Co. v. The Scarborough Local Board, which arose upon a question as to how far this rule was applicable to the area occupied by the Scarborough railway station. There three learned judges (Lush, Hayes, and Hannen, JJ.), having the Swansea case before them, went further, and they decided the general doctrine that the word "railway" was not confined to the rails themselves and the land beneath them, but was to be applied in a case where there were platforms which it was not shown were built absolutely upon land which was necessary for the support of the railway. They used broader words, words which, to my mind, are of more general purpose and use in construing Acts of this kind than any language that is to be found in the judgments in the Swansea case; for they say that so much of the strip of land as is necessary to the use of the railway should be included as a part of the railway. That, of course, must be construed strictly. You must not go from step to step and say it is necessary to have a booking-office, and such-like things, for many reasons. I think the first reason I gave is the right one, that directly a thing becomes a building it comes under another distinct category, and is therefore disposed of and dealt with in another way. It does, to my mind, apply to land which is not only parallel with and ends with the rails themselves, but it applies to land which is beyond the buffers, between the buffers and the street or public place with which the railway station communicates. That must all be subject to this qualification, that there must always be, in all cases, this question of degree—namely, how much is necessary for the use of the railway, and how much is necessary merely for the convenience of passengers and for other purposes. If a railway company sought to take any more land than was directly necessary for the convenience and use of the lines, then, as a matter of fact, that portion which was not necessary ought to be excluded from the exemption by any court or arbitrator before whom the case came. The result is this: 1st, the roof covering railway; 2nd, the roof covering platform; 4th, the roof covering the sidings; 6th, the platform under the roof; and 7th, the platforms uncovered; all these are included in the principle which I have mentioned, and which I consider to be decided by these cases. But as to the 3rd, the roof covering the cab-drive, and the 5th, the roof covering the buildings, a fortiori, and the 8th, the cab-drive under roof, and 9th, the cab-drive and horse landing uncovered, and 10th, the cattle landing and pens, 11th, the crane in goods yard, these are all cases to which, it seems to me, those decisions and the principle of them do not apply, and therefore they are properly rated upon a full value With regard to the other part of the case—namely, the application of the section (section 79) of the Act whereby the London and North-Western Railway Co. acquired the property and the works of the St. George's Harbour Co., I have very little to say, because it is clear to my mind that wherever the railway company acquired a portion of the line of railway under that Act they would have the same benefit as the St. Georges's Harbour Co.; but wherever the railway company created new works upon land which they had acquired since the passing of that Act they would not have that benefit. That becomes much less important seeing what our judgment is with regard to the other part of the case.

Wills, J.—I am of the same opinion. I will deal with the two questions in the inverse order, because I think a person who had to rate here would begin by considering what land is to be treated as agricultural land, and what is to be rated on another principle, and would then apply section 68 relating to the assessment of certain lands and certain property at one-fourth of the net annual value. It seems to me with regard to the application of section 79, that the subject is really free from doubt.

It is quite clear that that section means to refer to the fact that the St George's Harbour Co. had then obtained an Act of Parliament for carrying out their undertaking, but that the works remained to be constructed and completed, and it meant to give the benefits, which it does confer upon the undertaking, to such works as should be constructed under that Act of Parliament and no other. That disposes of the question as between the two classes of lands. Then another question arises—namely, what is to be included under "line of railway." It seems to me that "line of railway" is a very definite and explicit expression, and that the use of the words "line of railway" means to show that the advantage of being rated as agricultural land is confined to such land as is occupied by the rails of the undertaking. I do not mean to say to the distance merely between the two rails, but it would include whatever reasonably belongs to them—namely, that which is necessary for the use of those rails as a line of railway; I mean their physical use as rails. That would include the engine, turntable, and the sidings mentioned in Nos. 13 and 14, and nothing else. It seems to me that those are the only subjects which are entitled to the benefit of this rating as agricultural land. None of the other matters (Nos. 1 to 13) can by any possibility be designated as part of the line of railway. That disposes completely of section 79, and its applicability. Then comes the question how much of this property is to be rated at one-fourth under section 68? Section 68 is in the Act which was passed in 1854, but the legislation upon those lines is found in a general public Act of 1848, and I suppose that is the first time it appeared except in local Acts, but from 1848 this legislation has been general. The question has arisen upon exactly the same words in the two cases referred to by my brother Pollock. I certainly find a difficulty in understanding the Swansea case; and it seems to me that the ratio decidendi—how much of the ground is necessary for the support of the rails—is a very unsatisfactory test. If that were the test I cannot understand why the platform, because it happens to be above such land, has anything to do with it, as in rating matters you may rate entirely different strata of property according as it is above or below the ground with reference to occupation, and they may be treated as different subjects of rating. But this much is quite clear, that it is in accordance with The South Wales Railway Co. v. The Swansea Local Board, that whatever is absolutely necessary for the physical use of the railway is to be treated as railway.

As regards the use of the word "only" in the section (section 68) its use is not quite clear, but the interpretation put upon the section is "land used as a railway only," and it is quite clear that the expression "land used as a railway only" is a very different expression from "line of railway"; and if the intention had been to confine the exemption to "line of railway" it would have said so in unmistakable terms. "Used as a railway" means the physical use as a railway. It does not mean those adjuncts to a railway which are necessary for convenient business purposes; but it means those things whatever they be, without which the railway could not be used as a highway, as the theory was that a railway was a highway, like a turnpike road, to be used by the public on certain terms. For railways as they are now managed there must be stopping places, and at these there must be platforms for the physical convenience of people getting into and out of the carriages.

It seems to me that a platform is reasonably included under the expression "land used as a railway"; but it is a question of degree, and in many great railway stations there are parts of the platform which are not at all necessary for that purpose, or for the purposes of the physical use of the railway, but are used to make the whole place more attractive. But in the present case there is no finding that the platforms are beyond what is reasonably necessary, and it would seem from the plan that they are confined within the narrowest possible limits within which the work of the railway could possibly be carried on.

Therefore we are acting consistently with the principle of the Swansea case in holding that these platforms are part of the land used for the purposes of a railway. The other case—the case of The North-Eastern Railway Co. v. The Local Board of Scarborough—is certainly a definite decision in the same direction. The court there say plainly that the local board was wrong in having claimed to treat those platforms (amongst other things) and sidings as exposed to the rating on the full net annual value.

I think therefore that we could not decide otherwise than as we are deciding without flying in the face of a decision of a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction. I think the decision is right, and I agree entirely in the application of that principle to the particular items in the schedule with which my brother Pollock has dealt in his judgment.

Judgment accordingly.

THE GOVERNMENT STOCK INVESTMENT CO. v. THE MANILA RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Company—Debentures—Floating security—Condition allowing company to carry on business until default for certain period—Subsequent issue of bonds—Priority.

A company issued debentures "by way of floating security," and subject to conditions, one of which was that, notwithstanding the charge, the company should be at liberty, for the purposes of its business, to deal with any part of its property until default should be made in payment of any interest thereby secured for a period of three months, or until the company should be wound up. After interest had been more than three months in arrear, but before the debenture-holders had taken any step to enforce their security, the company issued bonds covered by a trust deed, which recited the issue of the debentures and that default had been made in the payment of interest.

Held, that, although the three months' period of grace had elapsed before the issue of the bonds, yet the debentures then still remained a floating security only; and, consequently, that the bonds had priority over the debentures.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 44 W. R. 166, [1895] 2 Ch. 551, affirmed.

This was an appeal by the Government Stock Investment Co. from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.) reported 44 W. R. 166, [1895] 2 Ch. 551, which had reversed a decision of North, J.

The respondents were an English company formed in 1888. In 1889 they issued debentures to the extent of £730,000 as a floating security.

The words of charge were: "And the company hereby charges, by way of floating securities, all its property whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future, including its uncalled capital for the time being."

Indorsed on these debentures were certain conditions, one of which (condition 2) was that "Notwithstanding the said charge the company shall be at liberty, in the course and for the purposes of its business, to use, employ, sell, lease, exchange, or otherwise deal with any part of its property until default shall be made in payment of any interest hereby secured for the period of three calendar months after the same shall have become due, or until an order of some court of competent jurisdiction shall have been made, or a special or extraordinary resolution shall have been duly passed for the winding-up of the company."

After default had been made in payment of interest on the debentures for more than three months, but before the debenture-holders had taken any active steps to enforce their security, the respondent company issued bonds, covered by a trust deed, which recited the issue of the debentures and that default had been made in the payment of interest on such debentures.

The debenture-holders claimed priority, and North, J., held that the debentures ceased to be a floating security on the expiration of three months after default had been made in the payment of interest on the debentures, and that they were entitled to priority.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal.

Farwell, Q.C., and Disturnal, for the appellants.—The debentures must be read with condition 2, so that the charge ceases to be a floating one after three months' default.

They referred to Holroyd v. Marshall, 11 W. R. 171, 10 H. L. Cas. 191; In re Florence Land and Public Works Co., 27 W. R. 236, 10 Ch. D. 530, 540; Driver v. Broad, 41 W. R. 744, [1893] 1 Q. B. 744; In re Horne v. Hellard, 29 Ch. D. 736, 744, 33 W. R. Dig. 234.

Levett, Q.C., and P. A. Abraham, for the Manila Railway Co.—[They were stopped.]

A. R. Kirby, E. Beaumont, and C. E. E. Jenkins, for other parties, were not heard.

Lord HALSBURY, C.—This is a question turning on a very small point, the construction of the terms of the second condition endorsed on the instrument in question. It seems to me that it is impossible in the construction of any human language to exclude the situation of the parties, and the meaning that the transaction in which they themselves are at the moment engaged will present to the mind of either of the contracting parties. Now, what is this instrument? It is a debenture, upon which it is intended that money should be lent to a company which makes its money by trade, and I am asked to suppose that it was the intention of this condition that, upon default being made in the additional period of grace given, from that moment the whole of the commercial career of this trading company was to come to an end. I entirely repudiate the idea that Mr. Farwell has suggested as to standing by and not interfering, and so on. The parties contemplated that the thing might go on and not be wrecked by mere lapse of time, because there would be a power of standing by, and things might be done which were not strictly within the meaning of what both the parties contemplated by these debentures. That, therefore, is the security which they had in their minds. The effect of Mr. Farwell's construction would be not such a security as was agreed to. I must construe the document as it is, and, looking at the document as it is, it appears to me that it would be so absolutely unworkable in its operation that I do not think that the parties could have contemplated such a condition of things as this, that the moment the period of grace has elapsed, at that moment the power of the company to do anything with the property of the company ceased. How could that be the meaning? As a matter of business I should have thought it was impossible. I quite agree that mere absurdity of the conclusion will not necessarily govern the language used, unless it is not susceptible of another interpretation. Is the language susceptible of another interpretation? I think it is. I quite agree with Mr. Farwell that in some cases, looking at the nature of the transaction and the thing that is being dealt with, if you use the phrase that you may do so and so until a certain time, you may imply what, if you are reading it at large, you must supply in terms, "and no longer." One is familiar with a great many cases in which those words have actually occurred, where that negation is actually given to the words, but until one knows the concrete case in respect of which the language is so to be construed, I deny that it is true to say that in every case where you give some power or some liberty to deal with some matter up to a given time you must necessarily imply the words "and no longer." Here, when I come to look at the thing to be done, the object of the parties, the interest to both that the commercial power of the company should continue until it was absolutely brought to an end by course of law or the contingencies contemplated by the parties themselves, I deny that I am bound to put in the words by construction "and no longer." If the words, therefore, are at all susceptible of the meaning which has been attributed to them by the Court of Appeal, it appears to me, looking at the nature of the document and the nature of the transaction in which the parties were engaged, that it is much more reasonable to suppose that there was to be no interference with the power of the company to treat this as a floating security until the intervention of those things, which were familiar to both parties, might and could at the option of the parties, put an end to any such transaction at all. Under these circumstances it appears to me that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed, and that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I also think that the judgment of the Court of Appeal is quite right. A floating security is an equitable charge on the assets for the time being of a going concern. It attaches to the subject charged in the varying condition in which it happens to be from time to time. But it is of the essence of such a charge that it remains dormant until the undertaking charged ceases to be a going concern, or until the person in whose favour the charge is created intervenes. His right to intervene may of course be suspended by agreement, but if there is no agreement for suspension, he may exercise his right whenever he pleases after default. In the present case, it was intended that the right of intervention on the part of the debenture-holders should be suspended for a time after default. That is what the second condition points to, and I do not think that it was meant to do more. The condition no doubt is awkwardly expressed. If the condition had said "Notwithstanding the said charge, the debenture-holders shall not be entitled to enforce their security during the prescribed period of grace," there would have been no difficulty. What it does say is "notwithstanding the said charge," that is, as I understand it, "notwithstanding the right of the debenture-holders under the said charge." And then it goes on to say the company shall be at liberty to carry on their business for the prescribed period, or until a winding-up order. During the period of grace, or until there is a winding-up order, the company are to be free to carry on their business, and they are to carry it on as of right. When that period comes to an end the charge is to have its ordinary effect. Thenceforward the business is to be carried on not as of right, but by the sufferance of the debenture-holders, and at their mercy. That, I think, is all that was really meant. Any other construction would obviously lead to consequences which it is impossible to suppose the parties could have intended. It is impossible to suppose that they could have meant that at the end of the period of grace the floating security should be turned into a fixed and binding charge, and that the business, without being stopped, should be allowed to drag on in a paralysed and helpless condition. For these reasons I think that this appeal should be dismissed.

Lord SHAND.—I am also of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed. I confess that upon reading the words contained in the second condition indorsed on the debentures, I was impressed, as others have been before whom the case has come for decision, with the view that the appellants' interpretation was sound; but upon further consideration, and after careful examination of the language, I have come to a different opinion. The inconveniences which would result from the construction maintained by the appellants are obviously so great that I think the court should scrutinize the language in order to see whether that is the only construction that can be adopted, or whether it is a reasonable construction, and I do not think it is either necessary or reasonable. The result of the argument presented by Mr. Farwell appeared to be this, that the company going on with its business after default for upwards of three months in the payment of interest on its debentures, there might be two classes of persons in different situations; one class of persons, in ignorance of the terms of the debentures, would be safe in dealing with the company, while another class, with a knowledge of the terms of the debentures, would be unsafe in dealing with the company. I should have very great difficulty in any case, even upon the construction of the instrument which has been presented, in holding that if the creditors on these debentures lay by and took no step whatever to arrest the business, or to put a receiver in charge of the business, they could affect anyone in the transaction of business with the company. But I have come to be of opinion with your lordships, and with the Court of Appeal, that the true construction of this deed is that contended for by the respondents, to which effect has been given in the judgment complained of. The purpose and effect of the condition which was added—the condition which was appended to the debenture, and must be regarded as part of the debenture—was simply, as it appears to me, to secure that the company, for three months after default, in any case should have the power to go on with the business, unless, of course, there was a receiver appointed in the meantime. The deed gives the company that power of going on, but it does not say that at the expiration of three months after default they shall not go on with the business. It does not use any words such as the words "and no longer," which I think one would have expected to be used there considering the inconveniences that would result in the transaction of the business from the construction put upon the words by the appellants. It appears to me that the company were entitled to go on with the business longer, and until something would be done in the way of active interference on the part of the debenture-holders to make it known to all concerned that they acted on the power which they had in respect of default in payment of interest. And in the absence of any application for a receiver, or of any order of the court to bring the company to an end, I am of opinion that the debenture-holders' security remained as it was, and that it cannot be said that the company was paralysed as from the moment when the default occurred.

Lord DAVEY.—I am not afraid to say that I have had very considerable doubt about the true construction of this instrument. I think it is susceptible of both constructions which have been put forward, but I am bound to say that, if I merely confined myself to trying to put a meaning on the words that are used, I should come to the conclusion to which North, J., came and agree with Mr. Farwell's argument. But, on the other hand, one sees that these are conditions and terms inserted in an instrument regulating the rights of the mortgagees of the company relatively to the company, and of the company relatively to its mortgagees; and, like Lindley, L.J., when I look to the way in which Mr. Farwell's construction would work, and when I see that it would work somewhat, I will not say unjustly, but in the direction of bringing about a resul. which could hardly have been within the contemplation of the parties—or perhaps it might be sufficient to say that when, as it appears to me, Mr. Levett's construction is conceivably more likely to have been the meaning — I think it is a reason when two considerations so evenly balanced are presented to you for preferring Mr. Levett's construction to the other. Both constructions present great difficulties. I think that the words "notwithstanding the said charge" present difficulties in the way of both the learned counsel who have argued the case before your lordships. Mr. Farwell has to read the words "notwithstanding the charge" as if the words "floating security" were left out, but then he has to face the difficulty that the charge is only given as a floating security. On the other hand, Mr. Levett has a difficulty to meet in those words, I think, because certainly the expression "notwithstanding the floating security the security shall float for a certain time" is an unnatural one. At one time I thought that the latter words of the condition relating to a winding-up order or resolution were rather in favour of Mr. Farwell's construction, but I see now that those words are capable of a construction which would make them fit in with the view of Mr. Levett, and they do not import, as I thought they did at first, that this reference to this unhappy condition of things was intended to be a definition, for the purpose of this deed, of what was intended by a floating security. I think that they may be construed, as I think Lindley, L.J., intended to construe them, as meaning "unless in the meantime a winding-up order is made or a winding-up resolution is passed." On the whole, therefore, while admitting that the matter is one of very considerable difficulty of construction, I think that the better course is to agree with the opinion of the Court of Appeal.

DUNN v. MACDONALD. (a.)

Principal and agent—Liability of agent—Warranty of authority—Contract by public servant on behalf of Crown.

A public servant of the Crown who makes a contract on behalf of the Crown is not personally liable upon an implied warranty of authority to make such a contract.

Appeal from the judgment of Charles, J., [1897] 1 Q. B. 401.

The statement of claim alleged that the defendant, Sir Claude Macdonald, who was her Majesty's Commissioner and Consul-General for the Oil Rivers Protectorate (now known as the Niger Coast Protectorate), untruly represented and warranted to the plaintiff that as her Majesty's Commissioner for the Protectorate he was duly authorized and empowered to engage the plaintiff for the service and on behalf of her Majesty in the Protectorate for the term of three years certain, and thereby induced the plaintiff to accept an engagement to serve in the said Protectorate, whereas he was not so authorized, and the engagement was determined before the expiration of the three years. The plaintiff claimed damages for breach of the warranty of authority.

The plaintiff had previously presented a petition of right against the Crown claiming damages for wrongful dismissal, in which judgment was entered for the Crown: see Dunn v. Regina, 44 W. R. 243, [1896] 1 Q. B. 116.

Charles, J., held that doctrine as to implied warranty of authority by an agent was not applicable to a public servant of the Crown when contracting in his public character. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

W. H. Stevenson, for the plaintiff, contended that the doctrine of Collen v. Wright, 6 W. R. 123, 8 E. & B. 647, as to an agent being liable upon an implied warranty of authority, was applicable to a servant of the Crown entering into a contract on behalf of the Crown.

He referred to Macbeath v. Haldimand, 1 T. R. 172; Gidley v. Lord Palmerston, 3 Brod. & B. 275.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., and H. Sutton, for the defendant, were not called upon.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—I entirely agree with the ground upon which Charles, J., rested his judgment. There is another ground, however, upon which the judgment might be put. The cause of action alleged is that the defendant impliedly warranted that he had authority to engage the plaintiff for three years, whereas he had no such authority. The plain answer to that is that the defendant had authority in the name of the Crown to engage the plaintiff for three years, subject to the inherent right of the Crown to dismiss the plaintiff before the expiration of the term. Hence the alleged warranty must be put as high as this, that the defendant promised the plaintiff that he would be kept in his employment for three years certain, whereas he had no authority to promise that. Charles, J., assuming that the defendant did so engage the plaintiff for three years certain, held that, as the defendant in engaging the plaintiff acted in his capacity of a public servant of the Crown, no action would lie against him, and therefore he could not be made liable upon an alleged implied stipulation in the contract that he had authority. There was no question of any express warranty of authority here. I am of opinion that that decision is right. It is in accordance with a series of decisions extending back over 100 years. The appeal, must, therefore, be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—There is one insuperable obstacle in the way of the plaintiff's claim—namely, that the defendant had in fact authority to make the contract which he made. But there is a wider ground of objection, that a public servant entering into a contract on behalf of the Crown is not personally liable upon such contract, though a liability would be imposed upon him if the contract were made by him in his private capacity. That rule is well established by a long series of authorities, and is applicable to this case, inasmuch as the contract with the plaintiff was made by the defendant in his character as a public servant of the Crown.

CHITTY, L.J.—It is well established that a public servant of the Crown is not liable upon a contract entered into by him on behalf of the Crown. If the contention of the plaintiff were correct, that exemption from liability would be at an end, inasmuch as a public servant could be made liable for breach of warranty of authority. It is said that there is an implied warranty of authority by the defendant. Now, it is clear that the defendant in entering into this contract with the plaintiff was acting as the agent of the Crown, and in no other character. It would be contrary to the truth to draw an inference from that circumstance alone that the defendant warranted in his private capacity that he had authority to make such a contract.

Appeal dismissed.

HOBSON v. GORRINGE. (a.)

Fixtures—Mortgagor and mortgagee—Gas-engine fixed to the soil—Intention of affixers, how far material—Right of owner, by contract with mortgagor, to remove engine—Mortgagee taking possession without notice of contract.

A gas-engine which, for the purpose of convenient working, is fixed to a concrete bed by means of screws and bolts, becomes by such attachment a fixture and part of the soil. A mortgagee of the land is therefore entitled, on taking possession of the land, to take possession also of the engine, notwithstanding that the latter is the property of a third person, and that by an agreement in writing between that third person and the mortgagor (of which the mortgagee had no notice) the engine is not to become the property of the mortgagor.

Wood v. Hewett, 8 Q. B. 913, and Lancaster v. Eve, 7 W. R. 260, 5 C. B. N. S. 717, discussed.

Appeal by the plaintiff from Kekewich, J., who had refused to restrain the defendant from selling and and disposing of, otherwise than to the plaintiff, a certain gas-engine erected upon land lately in the occupation of one King.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Curtis Price, for the appeal.—The engine was fixed to the soil only to enable it to be worked, and it continued a chattel. To make it a fixture, it must have been annexed to the soil with the intention that it should become a part thereof: Holland v. Hodgson, 20 W. R. 990, L. R. 7 C. P. 328; Lancaster v. Eve, 7 W. R. 260, 5 C. B. N. S. 717; Wood v. Hewett, 8 Q. B. 913; Wake v. Hall, 31 W. R. 585, 8 App. Cas. 195, 204. Here of course the burden is upon the plaintiff of showing that the engine was not intended to become part of the soil; but that he can show. The agreement between the plaintiff and King is merely a hiring agreement, and is governed by Helby v. Matthews, 43 W. R. 561, [1895] A. C. 471, not by Lee v. Butler, 42 W. R. 88, [1893] 2 Q. B. 318. It is common knowledge that gas-engines are very often let out on such hire-purchase agreements. The engine, if a fixture at all, is a trade fixture, and therefore may be removed: Sanders v. Davis, 33 W. R. 655, 15 Q. B. D. 218; Cumberland Union Banking Co. v. Maryport Hematite Iron and Steel Co.,

They also cited In re Peel, Ex parte Crossley Bros., [1894] 1 I. R. 235; in H. L., [1895] A. C. 457.

Warrington, Q.C., and Willoughby Williams, for the defendant, were directed to argue only the question whether the engine had become a fixture. —All the cases show that the intention to be regarded is to be inferred from the degree and the apparent object of the annexation to the soil. The cases relied on by the other side were cases of landlord and tenant, not cases between a mortgagee and the owner of something which had been affixed to the mortgaged land. Lee v. Butler, rather than Helby v. Matthews, covers this case.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., replied.

Dec. 19.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the judgment of the court as follows: This case, though small as to amount, raises a considerable question; which is, whether a mortgagee of land in fee, when he enters upon the mortgaged premises, can take possession of an engine which is attached to the soil thereof by means of bolts and screws, although the engine did not and never had belonged to the mortgagor, but to a third party. Upon the 7th of January, 1895, the plaintiff Hobson, by a contract in writing not under seal, let to a builder named King a gas-engine, upon what is known as the hire and purchase system, for the purpose of being fixed on King's land at Worthing, of which King was owner in fee. By the contract it was agreed that King was to pay Hobson for the engine £18 in cash before delivery, and the sum of £3 10s. per month after delivery for the period of ten months, at the expiration of which time the gas-engine was to become the absolute property of King upon the further payment of £3. It was also agreed that if, during the continuance of the hiring, King should fail to pay the hire or any part thereof, Hobson should be at liberty to repossess himself of and to remove the gas-engine, and that King should have no claim whatever against Hobson, either for money he had paid for the gas-engine or for any damage sustained by reason of the retaking thereof. It was further agreed that the contract should not be construed to operate in any way as a contract for the sale of the gas-engine, but only as an arrangement for the hire thereof, unless and until King should have paid the instalments before mentioned. It was known to Hobson that this gas-engine was required by King in order to drive a saw-mill which he had upon his land at Worthing, and that the way it was to be erected (and in fact was erected) for this purpose was as follows: In the first place a bed of concrete was prepared, in which were embedded two iron plates, out of each of the four outside corners of which an iron bolt projected upwards in a vertical position, having a screw at its uppermost end. The base plate of the gas-engine was fitted with four holes, one at each outside corner, so that when the engine was placed in position upon the concrete bed the four bolts projected through the four holes in the base of the engine, and nuts were then screwed down tightly upon the tops of the bolts, and thus the engine was kept in position and prevented from rocking or shifting, as it would have done if merely placed upon the concrete foundation, without the aid of the projecting bolts. An exhaust pipe and exhaust boxes and a pulsometer were also let on hire and purchase to King by the plaintiff, together with the gas-engine, which were more or less affixed to the building in which the engine stood, but we do not consider that these have any material bearing upon the case, for if the affixing of the gas-engine in the manner above described did not convert it into a fixture, and thus part of the freehold, we do not think that the other attachments, upon the conflicting evidence relating thereto, should be held to do so.

The above statement of fact shows what was the ostensible annexation of the gas-engine to the soil of King's land, as also the object for which it was so annexed. King made some of the monthly payments of £3 10s. to Hobson, and then fell into arrear, and he has never made the contracted payments so as to become the owner of the gas-engine as a chattel. Upon the 24th of July, 1895 (we omit a former mortgage of the 26th of March, 1894, for it is not relevant to the point under consideration), King, for valuable consideration, conveyed by way of mortgage to the Rev. Mr. Gorringe his land at Worthing (together with the saw-mill, engine-house, warehouses, and other buildings erected thereon, and the fixed machinery and fixtures) in fee simple, subject to the usual proviso for redemption. On the 17th of January, 1896, King was adjudicated a bankrupt, and in March of that year the mortgagee, Mr. Gorringe, lawfully entered and took possession of the mortgaged premises, together with the gas-engine, which he found in its place as before mentioned.

The question is whether Mr. Gorringe is entitled, under the above circumstances, to the gas-engine. It is not disputed that he is entitled to the land; but the plaintiff, Hobson, denies that he is entitled to the gas-engine, upon the ground that it had never become King's property, and had always remained a chattel belonging to him, Hobson. There can be no doubt, on a mortgage in fee of land, that as between the mortgagor and mortgagee the mortgagee is entitled to all fixtures which may be upon the land, whether placed there before or after the mortgage. If North, J., in the passage in his judgment which has been referred to in Cumberland Union Banking Co. v. Maryport Hematite Iron Co., 40 W. R. 280, [1892] 1 Ch. 415, at p. 425, meant to hold otherwise, in our opinion he was in error, but we doubt if he intended so to hold. The case of Gough v. Wood, decided in this court, in no way assists the plaintiff in this case, and has no application to the present case. That case was decided solely upon the ground that the mortgagee had acquiesced in the removal by the mortgagor during his tenancy of trade fixtures. For additional confirmation of the ratio decidendi of this case, what was said by Lindley, L.J., at p. 282, and by Kay, L.J., at p. 286 in the case of The Huddersfield Banking Co. v. Lister, 43 W. R. 567, [1895] 2 Ch. 273, may be referred to. Even if in the present case a licence had been granted by Gorringe to King to remove the gas-engine during the continuance of a term (neither of which in fact existed), Gorringe by entering and taking possession of the land and engine would have determined such licence.

We now come to the real point made on behalf of the plaintiff Hobson. It is this. It is said that this gas-engine never was a fixture, but always remained a chattel, and consequently never passed to Gorringe as mortgagee of the land. It obviously did not pass to him as a chattel under the mortgage of "fixed machinery," for if a chattel, it ever remained Hobson's, and never was the property of King, and unless Mr. Gorringe takes the engine as being part of the land mortgaged to him, he does not take it at all. Now, leaving out of consideration for the present the hire and purchase agreement of the 7th of January, 1895, there is a sequence of authorities which establish that the gas-engine, affixed as it was, and for the purpose for which it was, to King's freehold, ceased to be a chattel, and became part of the freehold. Take, first of all, the case, in 1853, of Wiltshear v. Cottrell, 1 El. & Bl. 674, 688. There the court of Queen's Bench, held that a threshing-machine fixed by bolts and screws to posts which were let into the ground, and which machine could not be got out without disturbing some of the soil, would clearly pass under a conveyance of land and all fixtures. In the case, three years afterwards (in 1856), of Mather v. Fraser, 4 W. R. 387, 2 K. & J. 536, which was a case between the assignees of a mortgagor and mortgagees, Page Wood, V.C., held that machinery fixed to the land, whether by screws, solder, or other permanent means, passed to the mortgagees. Again, in Walmsley v. Milne, 8 W. R. 138, 7 C. B. N. S. 115, which was a case beween a mortgagor and mortgagee in fee, the Court of Common Pleas held that a steam-engine and boiler and other implements secured by bolts and nuts to the walls, though they were all capable of being removed without injury either to the machinery or to the premises, were fixtures, and passed to the mortgagee as part of the freehold. In Climie v. Wood, L. R. 3 Ex. 257, 16 W. R. C. L. Dig. 72, which was a case between mortgagor and mortgagee in fee, the jury found that an engine and boiler which were used for sawing purposes (the engine being screwed down to planks upon the ground, and the boiler being fixed in the brickwork) were trade fixtures, and had been so fixed for their better use and not to improve the inheritance, and that they were removable without any appreciable damage to the freehold. The Court of Exchequer, nevertheless, held that the engine and boiler passed to the mortgagee, and this judgment was affirmed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber (reported L. R. 4 Ex. 328, 17 W. R. C. L. Dig. 88), Willes, J., who delivered the judgment of the court, stating that the reasons for a tenant with a limited interest being allowed to remove trade fixtures were not applicable to the owner of the fee. In Longbottom v. Berry, L. R. 5 Q. B. 123, 18 W. R. C. L. Dig. 43, which was a case between assignees of a mortgagor and mortgagees, it was also held that machinery annexed to the floor of a building in a "quasi permanent manner" by means of bolts and screws passed to the mortgagees, and in 1872 the Exchequer Chamber in Holland v. Hodgson, 20 W. R. 990, L. R. 7 C. P. 328, affirmed Mather v. Fraser and Longbottam v. Berry, and held that looms attached by means of nails driven through holes in the feet of the looms into the floors, which attachment was necessary to keep the looms steady when at work, and which nails could be drawn easily and without any serious damage to the flooring, formed part of the realty, and passed to the mortgagee in fee. If there had been in this case nothing but the existing visible degree of annexation of the gas-engine to King's freehold and the known object for which such annexation had taken place, the authorities conclusively establish that the gas-engine had ceased to be a chattel, and had become part of the freehold.

But it was argued that the terms of the hiring and purchase agreement caused this engine to remain a chattel, notwithstanding its annexation to the soil, for it was said that the intention of the parties who placed it where it was must be considered, and, if this consideration showed that the intention was that the chattel was not to be a fixture, though actually fixed to the freehold, it still remained a chattel. In support of this argument a passage in the judgment of Lord Blackburn (then Blackburn, J.), when delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Holland v. Hodgson was vouched. That learned judge, when dealing with what were or were not fixtures, says: "Perhaps the true rule is that articles not otherwise attached to the land than by their own weight are not to be considered as part of the land unless the circumstances are such as to show that they were intended to be part of the land, the onus of showing that they were so intended lying upon those who assert that they have ceased to be chattels; and that, on the contrary, an article which is affixed to the land, even slightly, is to be considered as part of the land, unless the circumstances are such as to show that it was intended all along to continue a chattel, the onus lying on those who contend that it is a chattel. The question in each case is whether the circumstances are sufficient to satisfy the onus." It is said on behalf of the plaintiff that the hire and purchase agreement shows an intention on Hobson's part, as also on King's part, that the gas-engine should remain a chattel until King had paid the contracted instalments, which he never did. Now, if the engine had been a trade fixture erected by King, as tenant with a limited interest, we apprehend that when affixed to the soil as it was it would have become a fixture—i.e., part of the soil, and would immediately have vested in the owner of the soil, subject to the right of King to remove it during his term. "Such," says Lord Chelmsford in Bain v. Brand, 1 App. Cas. 762, 772, 25 W. R. Dig. 246, "is the general law. But an exception has been long established in favour of a tenant erecting fixtures for the purposes of trade, allowing him the privilege of removing them during the continuance of the term. When he brings any chattel to be used in his trade and annexes it to the ground it becomes a part of the freehold, but with a power, as between himself and his landlord, of bringing it back to the state of a chattel again by severing it from the soil. As the personal character of the chattel ceases when it is fixed to the freehold, it can never be revived as long as it continues so annexed."

It seems to us that the true view of the hiring and purchase agreement, coupled with the annexation of the engine to the soil which took place in this case, is that the engine became a fixture—i.e., part of the soil—when it was annexed to the soil by screws and bolts, subject as between Hobson and King to this, that Hobson had the right by contract to unfix it and take possession of it if King failed to pay him the contracted monthly instalments. In our opinion the engine became a fixture—i.e., part of the soil—subject to this right of Hobson which was given him by contract. But the right was not an easement created by deed, nor was it conferred by a covenant running with the land. The right, therefore, to remove the fixture imposed no legal obligation on any grantee from King of the land. Neither could the right be enforced in equity against any purchaser of the land without notice of the right; and the defendant Gorringe is such a purchaser. The plaintiff's right to remove the chattel if not paid for cannot be enforced against the defendant, who is not bound, either at law or in equity, by King's contract. The plaintiff's remedy for the price, or for damages for the loss of the chattel, is by action against King, or, he being bankrupt, by proof against his estate.

This, in our judgment, is sufficient to determine this case in favour of the defendant. But as another point has been stoutly argued on behalf of the plaintiff we will deal with it. It is said that the intention that the gas-engine was not to become a fixture might be got out of the hire and purchase agreement, and that if so, it never became a fixture and part of the soil; and it was said that the case of Holland v. Hodgson had so decided. For this point it must be assumed that such intention is manifested by the hiring and purchase agreement, though, as before stated, we think it is not. Now, in Holland v. Hodgson Lord Blackburn, when dealing with the "circumstances to show intention," was contemplating and referring to circumstances which showed the degree of annexation and the object of such annexation, which were patent for all to see, and not to the circumstance of a chance agreement, which might or might not exist, between the owner of a chattel and a hirer thereof. This is made clear by the examples which Lord Blackburn alludes to to show his meaning. He takes as instances (a) blocks of stone placed in position as a dry stone wall or stacked in a builder's yard; (b) a ship anchor affixed to the soil, whether to hold a ship riding thereto or to hold a suspension bridge. In each of these instances it will be seen that the circumstance to show intention is the degree and object of the annexation, which is in itself apparent, and thus manifests the intention. Lord Blackburn in his proposed rule was not contemplating a hire and purchase agreement between the owner of a chattel and a hirer, or any other agreement unknown to either a vendee or mortgagee in fee of land, and the argument that such a consideration is to be entertained, in our judgment, is not well founded.

It was further argued on behalf of the plaintiff that the cases of Wood v. Hewett, and Lancaster v. Eve showed that the intention of the parties affixing a chattel to the soil must be ascertained when considering whether a chattel is or is not a fixture and part of the soil. In our opinion these cases do not show this; and indeed, if they did, as before stated, if the hire and purchase agreement is considered it does not show what the plaintiff says it does. In the first case, Wood v. Hewett, the plaintiff, a miller, had put up a movable hatch which worked up and down a groove in some immovable masonry and brickwork upon the defendant's land, and had so used it for years, the complaint against the defendant being that he had pulled up and taken away the hatch. The question was whether this movable hatch remained the plaintiff's or had become the property of the defendant. The jury found that the property remained the property of the plaintiff, and the court in banco held, as we read the case, that the jury were well warranted in finding that, as between the plaintiff and the defendant, the former had become entitled to have the hatch, which was his own property, standing in the soil of the defendant; in other words, that it might be inferred that the plaintiff had acquired an easement of having his hatch on the defendant's land, and could therefore sue for interference therewith. There was no question in that case between a mortgagee and a third party. In the second case, Lancaster v. Eve, the plaintiff, who was a wharfinger, many years before action brought, had driven a pile into the bed of the Thames, which was the property of the Crown, for the purpose of carrying on the necessary business of his wharf, and for years and years had used this pile without interruption by anyone, until the defendant's barge, by reason of the negligence of the defendant's servant, ran against it and carried it away. The point taken by the defendant was that the pile had been affixed to and formed part of the bed of the river, which was not the property of the plaintiff, and that, therefore, he could maintain no action for injury thereto; but the court held that as between the plaintiff and the Crown it ought to be inferred that although the pile had been affixed in the soil of the river, yet it was so affixed by agreement between the plaintiff and the Crown that the former should have an easement over the Crown's property so as to be able to use the pile necessary for carrying on the business of the plaintiff's wharf. This is the point decided, though there are, as has been pointed out, some isolated passages as to the intention of persons when affixing a chattel to the soil. That the plaintiff had a cause of action in some form or other against the defendant cannot be denied, but if the case decided, as it is argued it did, that the pile remained a chattel, we do not agree with it. That a person can agree to affix a chattel to the soil of another, so that it becomes part of that other's freehold, upon the terms that the one shall be at liberty in certain events to retake possession, we do not doubt. But how a de facto fixture becomes not a fixture, or is not a fixture as regards a purchaser of land for value without notice, by reason of some bargain between the affixers, we do not understand; nor has any authority to support this contention been adduced.

For the reasons above, in our judgment the gas-engine became affixed to and was part of King's freehold, and thus passed to Mr. Gorringe as mortgagee in fee of King's land. The point made upon the plate on the gas-engine when delivered comes to nothing, for it is no more than an indication of what the agreement was as between Hobson and King, and as there is no evidence whatever that Mr. Gorringe was ever made aware of it it cannot affect his right as mortgagee in fee of King's land. In our judgment Kekewich, J., was right when he gave judgment, as he did, for the defendant, and we think that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Q. B. Div. (Hawkins, Cave, Wills, Wright, and Kennedy, JJ.) — March 13.

HAWKE v. DUNN. (a.)

Gaming—Betting—"Other place"—Tattersall's Ring—User—Betting Houses Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), s. 3.

By the Betting Houses Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), s. 3, "Any person who, being the owner or occupier of any house, office, room, or other place, or a person using the same, shall open, keep, or use the same for the purposes" of betting with persons resorting thereto is liable to a penalty.

The respondent, a professional betting man, was present in an enclosure known as Tattersall's Ring at Hurst Park Racecourse on the occasion of a race-meeting and by calling out the odds on horses invited other persons to make bets with him, and did in fact make bets with other persons in the enclosure. The enclosure was about 40 yards long and 30 yards wide, and was bounded on three sides by iron railings and on the fourth by a building which formed part of the enclosure. The respondent moved about within the enclosure, and did not confine himself to any particular spot. Upon an information preferred under section 3 of the Betting Houses Act, 1853,

Held, that the enclosure was a "place" used by the respondent for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto, and that the respondent was liable to a penalty under that section.

Case stated by justices of Kingston-on-Thames.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Upon the hearing of an information preferred by the appellant against the respondent under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, s. 3, for that he, on the 4th day of July, 1896, unlawfully used a certain place—to wit, an enclosure known as the "One Pound Enclosure" or "Tattersall's Ring," for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto upon certain events and contingencies of, and relating to, horse-races—the justices dismissed the information.

A case was stated for the opinion of the court, the question being whether the enclosure was a "place" within the meaning of the Act, and whether the respondent used it for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment.

Section 3 of the Betting Houses Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), imposes a penalty on "any person who, being the owner or occupier of any house, office, room, or other place, or a person using the same, shall open, keep, or use the same for the purposes" of betting with persons resorting thereto, or for the purpose of any money being received as consideration for any promise to pay money upon a contingency of, and relating to, any horse-race.

Asquith, Q.C. (Reginald Brown with him), for the appellant.—The question is whether a person, not confining himself to any fixed spot in an enclosure, can be guilty of an offence under the Act. The word "place" in the Act has been construed in several cases as having a wider application than the doctrine of ejusdem generis would warrant. A distinction is drawn in the Act between "using" and "resorting to" a place. The man who "uses" a place is the man who goes there for the purpose of conducting the business of betting, while "resorting to" a place is the mere chance going there: Reg. v. Preedy, 17 Cox C. C. 433. That is a necessary expansion of the Act. It is therefore the business of betting, and not mere betting, that is prohibited. So that where you have a defined space to which anyone may resort, and a person using that space for the purpose of conducting the business of betting with those who resort to it, you have a state of things contemplated by the Act. All that is required to constitute a "place" is that there should be some kind of circumscription. The authorities all point to something defined. The umbrella, stool, or box are mere illustrations showing that there was evidence from which the magistrate might hold that the place was defined. In the present case there being an area fenced off, it was not necessary to show that the respondent confined himself to a particular spot. The owner of the enclosure could have been proceeded against for permitting it to be used for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto: Eastwood v. Miller, 22 W. R. 799, L. R. 9 Q. B. 440; Haigh v. Town Council of Sheffield, 23 W. R. 547, L. R. 10 Q. B. 102. It follows that the persons he permitted so to use the enclosure are also within the purview of the Act.

Bigham, Q.C. (Stutfield with him), for the respondent.—The Act is a penal Act. Therefore expansions are not justifiable. The user of which the Act speaks is exclusive user. The preamble shows that the Act was designed to put down betting houses, and things ejusdem generis with betting houses. This is also clear from the terms of section 12 which empowers the Commissioner of Police to break into betting houses and offices.

Asquith, Q.C., in reply.—The preamble cannot interfere with the words of the Act. Besides, the preamble really indicates that it is ready-money betting which is the mischief the Legislature had in view.

The judgment of the court was read by

HAWKINS, J.—An information preferred by John Hawke, the appellant, against Richard Dunn, the respondent, charging that the respondent on the 4th day of July, 1896, unlawfully used a certain place, to wit, an enclosure known as "the One Pound Enclosure" or "Tattersall's Ring," situated upon the Hurst Park Racecourse, for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto, upon certain contingencies relating to horse-races, contrary to the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, s. 3, came on for hearing by a bench of magistrates at Kingston-on-Thames on the 23rd of July last, when they dismissed it, but on the application of the appellant stated this case for the opinion of this court.

The material facts are as follows: The respondent is a bookmaker and professional betting man. The Hurst Park Club, a limited company, is the owner of many acres of land on Moulsey Hurst, Surrey, enclosed by a tall fence with gates at different points for ingress and egress. Within this enclosure the company has for some years past held a series of meetings for horse-races, and upon the ground comprised within it a racecourse with the usual accessories has been formed, and admittance to the interior of this, which I will call the main enclosure, is obtained on payment of 1s. for each person. Within this enclosure are three stands, each with a smaller enclosure attached to and communicating with it; the charges for entry to these stands respectively are £1, 10s., and half-a-crown. All the entrance moneys are received by the company. The £1 stand, generally known as Tattersall's ring, is roofed over and contains rows of seats rising from the ground in tiers; the enclosure attached to it is about 40 yards long and 30 yards wide, and is bounded on one side by the stand and on the remaining sides by an open iron fence about breast high. Adjoining thereto are the 10s. and the half-crown stands and enclosures similarly constructed and fenced. At a race meeting held on the day named in the information many thousand persons were admitted to the main enclosure. Of these about 1,000, including the respondent and fourteen other bookmakers, each accompanied by his clerk, were admitted within Tattersall's ring. Each of these bookmakers shouted out the odds against the different horses about to run and so invited all the other persons about them to bet with them. Many did so, each backing the horse he fancied; but before his bet was booked he was required to pay in advance to the bookmaker a deposit of the money for which he backed the horse, and the bookmaker in exchange handed to him a ticket or voucher bearing upon its face the names of both the bookmaker and the horse and the odds laid by the bookmaker against it. It was not suggested that the respondent had any control over or interest in the company other than that he held shares it. The respondent did not in Tattersall's ring confine himself to any one fixed spot or locality; he had no stool, box, umbrella, or anything of a similar character to denote the precise spot upon which from time to time he was carrying on his betting operations; but he moved about in the ring at his will, shouting out the odds and making his bets in various parts of it. As soon after each race as the winning jockey had weighed in and passed the scales "all right," the fact was publicly signalled by the hoisting of a flag, and then the bookmakers, upon production of the vouchers, paid to the backers the bets they had won.

The magistrates determined that the case before them was governed by the case of Snow v. Hill, (1885) 33 W. R. 475, 14 Q. B. D. 588, hereafter considered, which they treated as deciding that the respondent "could not be convicted unless he had a certain fixed place from which he never moved, such as a stool, umbrella, &c.," and they therefore thought that the enclosure could not be considered a fixed place, for, if so, every person who resorted to and used the enclosure and made a bet therein would be liable to conviction for using the enclosure for betting purposes. They accordingly dismissed the information. The question submitted to us is whether the magistrates came to a correct decision in point of law, and, if not, what should be done in the premisses.

Before the passing of the statute above mentioned (the Betting Houses Act, 1853) much betting and wagering on horse-races had been no doubt carried on without legislative interference. It is clear from the preamble of the Act now in question that in the year 1853 a new system of betting had then recently sprung up by the establishment of houses and offices for the carrying on in them of betting businesses of a kind which, in the opinion of the Legislature, tended to the injury and demoralization of improvident persons, and it is equally clear that one of the practices deemed to be objectionable and injurious was that which is known as ready-money betting—viz., that the person making the bet deposited with the bookmaker the money which he was disposed to adventure. It is true that the preamble has been repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 19), by which it is provided that such preamble may be omitted from any revised edition of the statutes; but the same Act provides (section 1) that the repeal shall not affect the operation or construction of the statute, and it is therefore legitimately to be referred to as affording information of the circumstances under which the Act came to be passed and, in so far as it directly throws light upon the question, of the object which the Legislature had in view. It expressly declares that one object at least proposed by the Legislature was the suppression of this kind of gaming. It was therefore, not merely to prevent its being carried on in houses or offices that the Act of 1853 for the suppression of betting houses (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119) was passed. Now to pass an Act simply to forbid such gaming in houses or offices would have been comparatively useless; it would have been to leave open a host of places not falling within the description of houses or offices and impossible to describe by anticipation, where, with equal facility and equally demoralizing effect such obnoxious betting might be carried on with impunity. (See Lush, J., in Haigh v. Town Council of Sheffield, (1874) L. R. 10 Q. B. p. 109.) If I have correctly interpreted the object and intention of the Legislature I must say, with all respect to the views of those who in some of the cases hereafter mentioned have intimated a different opinion, it seems to me it would be frittering away the provisions of the Act to hold that a well-defined enclosure known by a particular name and noted to be used as a betting ring could not be treated as a place within the meaning of the Act unless the person charged with using it for the particular forbidden purposes confined himself to a single spot indicated by some such thing as a stool or a box to stand on, or an umbrella stuck in the ground spread over his head; and that by changing his position from time to time by walking about and making his bets upon different spots in the same ring he could avoid the penalties because he was not using a "place." To me this view is unintelligible, and it becomes more so when we find, as we shall when I discuss the authorities, that for permitting several bookmakers to wander about in and use the whole enclosure generally for the forbidden kind of betting the owner or occupier might be convicted of permitting an illegal use of a place, yet that none of such bookmakers could be convicted of actually using it, because each of them used every or any part of the enclosure at his pleasure, and did not confine himself to one fixed spot in it.

The Act, by section 1, forbids the opening, keeping, or using any house, office, room, or other place for the purpose of the owner, occupier, or keeper thereof, or any person using the same or conducting the business thereof, betting with persons resorting thereto, or for the purpose of any money or valuable thing being received by or on behalf of such owner, occupier, keeper, or person as aforesaid as or for the consideration for any bet on any horse-race; and declares that every house, office, room, or other place opened, kept, or used for the purposes aforesaid, or any of them, shall be a common nuisance: and by section 2 shall be taken and deemed to be a common gaming-house. It will be observed that the two sections I have just referred to have no other effect than to taint with illegality for the time being, any house, &c., or other place opened, kept, or used for the purposes mentioned. The third section is that which deals with the persons who open, keep, or use houses, &c., for such illegal purposes. It enacts that any person who, being the owner or occupier of any house, office, room, or other place, or a person using the same, shall open, keep, or use, or permit the same to be opened, kept, or used, for the purposes mentioned in sections 1 and 2, or either of them, shall on summary conviction thereof be liable to a penalty not exceeding £100. It is under this section that the respondent was charged in the information. Undoubtedly this section is not quite so clearly framed as it might have been, and this defect has given rise to much discussion and confusion as to the proper interpretation to be put upon it.

For the respondent it is contended that the words "or other place" mean some other place ejusdem generis with a house, office, or room. I, of course, recognize the usual rule observed in the construction of Acts of Parliament—that general, following specific, words should be limited to things ejusdem generis with those before enumerated; but this rule of construction must be controlled by another equally general one, that Acts of Parliament ought like wills or other written documents to be construed so as to carry out the object sought to be accomplished by them, so far as it can be collected from the language employed. See Harrison v. Blackburn, 13 W. R. 135, 17 C. B. N. S. at p. 689, per Erle, C.J., and Byles, J.; Campbell v. Prescott, 15 Ves. at p. 503, per Sir W. Grant, M.R. In my opinion to limit the meaning of the words "other place" to some other place ejusdem generis with a house or office would have the effect of defeating, not of forwarding, the object of the Legislature; and I cannot imagine that, with the desire to suppress that kind of betting mentioned in the preamble, it was in contemplation to afford it a sort of sanctuary in a betting ring or in any other place not ejusdem generis with a house and office. The interpretation to be given to a similar expression used in the statute 42 Geo. 3, c. 118, making it penal for any person to keep any office or place to exercise any lottery, is expressly declared by 4 Geo. 4, c. 60, s. 60, to be any place in or out of an enclosed building, whether upon land or water, where illegal practices shall be carried on. This confirms me in the view I have taken. I am further confirmed in this view by the authorities, hereafter cited, of each of the courts of common law.

Upon a careful consideration of these authorities, I cannot say that all are equally satisfactory; but there is not one of the judgments which, as distinguished from the dicta not material to the judgment, is against the contention of the appellant in the present case.

The case of Doggett v. Catterns, (1864) 13 W. R. 160, 390, 17 C. B. N. S. 669, 34 L. J. C. P. 46, and (on appeal) in Ex. Ch., 19 C. B. N. S. 765, 34 L. J. C. P. 159, is that which has been most often cited in favour of the views of the respondent. The judgment itself, in that case, really decides nothing affecting the present question; but the dicta of the majority of the judges are in favour of the appellant's views. It was an action brought under section 5 of the statute of 1853 to recover back from the defendant money received by him from the plaintiff as a deposit on a bet contrary to section 4, which makes it a penal offence for any person, being the owner or occupier of any house, office, room, or place used for the purposes aforesaid, to receive such a deposit. The defendant, a bookmaker, was carrying on under a clump of trees in Hyde Park his betting operations with many persons who resorted thereto. The plaintiff was one of such persons, and he backed with the defendant for £5 10s. a horse about to run at the Lincoln races, and paid then and there a deposit of that sum. The defendant thereupon laid him odds against the horse. The horse did not win, and this action was then brought by the plaintiff against the defendant to recover back his deposit. The case was argued, first, in the Court of Common Pleas before Erle, C.J., and Keating, J., who gave judgment for the plaintiff. That judgment, however, was reversed in the Exchequer Chamber on the ground that the defendant was not the owner or occupier of the spot on which his betting took place within the meaning of section 4. This was quite right, for undoubtedly the defendant was neither owner or occupier of any part of Hyde Park. The question whether the spot under the trees was a place within the meaning of sections 1 and 3 was not judicially determined, nor was it, under the circumstances, essential to the judgment. In the Court of Common Pleas, however, in reference to its being a place, Erle, C.J., said: "The mischief is to my mind precisely the same, whether the party stands under the shelter of an oak tree or of a roof or covering of canvas." Later on, when speaking of the intention of the Legislature, the Chief Justice said: "It was intended to present every possible obstacle to the professed gamester using a place for exercising his vocation, and for that purpose to prohibit the keeping or using of any known place for the receipt of deposits, on the contingency of a particular horse running and winning at a horse-race." In the Exchequer Chamber the court, being composed of Pollock, C.B., Crompton, J., Blackburn, J., Bramwell, B., Channell, B., Mellor, J., and Pigott, B., all agreed that the judgment of the Common Pleas should be reversed upon the ground I have already mentioned. But Pollock, C.B., Crompton, J., Blackburn, J., and Channell, B., substantially agreed with Erle, C.J., and Keating, J., in thinking the spot was "a place" within the meaning of the Act, Bramwell, B., Mellor, J., and Pigott, B., holding an opposite view on the ground as stated by Bramwell, B., that it was "not a place capable of being used within the meaning of the Act," and Pollock, C.B., in his judgment, is reported to have said that the place had not the possibility of an owner or occupier. I cannot think that these reported expressions quite represent what the learned judges intended to convey. Bramwell, B., must have meant that it was not capable of being used within the meaning of section 4, because the man who used it was neither owner nor occupier, and Pollock, C.B., not that it was not possible for it to be owned or occupied by anybody, but that it could not be owned or occupied by the defendant. As a matter of fact it was used, and also as a matter of fact it was owned by the Crown and capable of occupation. Various spots in Hyde Park are used daily, and anybody visiting Hyde Park will find orators, preachers, singers, lecturers, reciters, agitators, and occasionally comic entertainers and orchestras, using various greater or smaller areas in it. Do none of these occupy places? Blackburn, J., to my mind put the decision in Doggett v. Catterns on its proper footing. These are his words: "I do not say that an open field is not a place which may come within the description of the term place in the statute, but it is necessary to show that the person against whom the action is brought under section 5 is either owner or occupier of the place, or acting on behalf of the owner." Thus it will be seen that of the nine judges before whom the case was argued, six expressed opinions that the spot under the trees was a place. Doggett v. Catterns, therefore, is in favour of and not against the appellant in this case. In Shaw v. Morley, (1868) 16 W. R. 763, L. R. 3 Ex. 137, the appellant, as clerk to a bookmaker, sat at a desk placed on, but not affixed to, the soil, in an uncovered enclosure close to the grand-stand at Doncaster, managing a deposit betting business there. Kelly, C.B., Martin, B., and Pigott, B., held it was both an office and a place, and that the business carried on was the very thing the Act intended to prevent. In Eastwood v. Miller, (1874) 22 W. R. 799, L. R. 9 Q. B. 440, the appellant was charged with permitting a certain place, "to wit, a field," to be used for the purpose of betting. The field referred to was an enclosure in extent nearly four acres, and known as the "Dewsbury Borough Park Ground." On the day named a pigeon-shooting match was was about to take place, a number of people were admitted to the ground, of which the appellant was in fact the sole occupier, and he received entrance money. Inside the enclosure, among the persons assembled, were two bookmakers with books shouting out the odds on the match, and betting with those disposed to bet, and receiving money by way of deposit from their customers. The appellant stood by and could see what was going on, but said and did nothing. The justices found that the ground was a place within the meaning of the Act, and that the appellant permitted it to be used for the purposes forbidden by sections 1 and 3, and convicted him. On appeal against this conviction, Lush, J., in his judgment, said: "First, was it a place? It could hardly be contended that grounds uncovered cannot be a place within the meaning of the Act. I see no reason whatever, from the framing of the Act, to hold that there cannot be a 'place' within the meaning of the Act, unless it is a structure of some kind, a building or a tent. An enclosed area, though uncovered, might as well be a 'place' within the Act, as a place either covered with canvass, as a tent, or a light structure, as a building. It is an enclosed place occupied exclusively by the appellant, and is therefore within the language and the intent of the Act. The fact that it is alarge enclosure cannot affect the question if it is a place occupied and enclosed within the meaning of the Act, to which persons were admitted by the sufferance of the occupier." The fact that the appellant was the sole occupier only showed more clearly that he had the fullest power to check the use of it, otherwise it was immaterial. As to whether the place was used for the purpose of betting within the meaning of the Act, the same learned judge said: "It is objected that it was only shewn that on one occasion this was done; and, moreover, it was objected, that the primary object of keeping the place was not for the purpose of betting but for the purpose of pigeon shooting. I cannot take this view of the evidence." Archibald, J., concurred. They agreed that Doggett v. Catterns, which was cited for the appellant, did not govern the case, and affirmed the conviction. In Haigh v. The Town Council of Sheffield (1874), the appellant was convicted of permitting the illegal use of an enclosure under very similar circumstances. On appeal, Blackburn, Mellor, and Lush, JJ., upheld the conviction. It would be inconvenient to set out the judgments at length, but each is well worthy of perusal. It is difficult to draw any satisfactory distinction between these two cases and the present one. Here the respondent used the enclosure himself; in those cases the appellants permitted the user by others: see also Regina v. Cook, (1884) 32 W. R. 796, 13 Q. B. D., at p. 385.

In Bows v. Fenwick, (1874) 24 W. R. 804, L. R. 9 C. P. 339, the appellant was convicted of using a place on the racecourse—the Roodee at Chester—for the purpose of betting. He stood on a stool in the Roodee over which was spread a large umbrella, open, and supported by a long stick or handle stuck in the ground by a spike. From this stool and under this umbrella the appellant called out the odds against the various horses, made bets, received deposits of money, and gave tickets. It was not disputed that this was a betting within the penal clauses of the Act. The only real question was whether it was an "other place" within the meaning of sections 1, 2, and 3. The court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Brett and Denman, JJ.) held that the spot used was such a place, saying that to constitute such a place it should be fixed and ascertained, and Lord Coleridge said there was, to use his own words, sufficient fixity of the structure by means of the spiked umbrella, and he distinguished that case from Doggett v. Catterns upon the ground that there was in the latter case no ascertained place within the ambit of the park in which the appellant, the defendant in that case, carried on his avocation. The conviction was affirmed. In the actual judgment I entirely agree, for the evidence to support it was overwhelming; but I am not prepared to adopt the dicta of the learned Chief Justice if he intended to suggest the necessity that to constitute a place the precise spot used by the appellant to carry on his betting should be indicated. Nor do I agree in the distinction he drew between Doggett's case and that which he was deciding. The "place" used by the appellant Bows v. Fenwick was the whole enclosure. He was entitled to use every part of it and to change his location within it as often as he thought fit; but however often he changed it he was still using the enclosure—a defined fixed locality—known by a name in which he could readily announce himself to all persons resorting thereto, and they could as readily find him. The fact that the appellant did actually indicate in the manner stated, the exact spot on which for the time being he was, merely added to the evidence of the user; but no case decides that it was essential. Supposing a well-known enclosure to be ten yards square, could it be said that that would not be a place unless the precise spot in it on which the person using it stood were indicated, and if the appellant in the case I am now describing had moved his stool twenty times to different spots within the enclosure, and at each spot had remounted his stool and resumed his betting, would he not still be using the one place he had paid for admission to, and not twenty different places?

The case of Gallaway v. Maries, (1881) 30 W. R. 151, 8 Q. B. D. 275, 51 L. J. M. C. 53, before Grove and Lopes, JJ., was very similar to that of Bows v. Fenwick. The respondent, Maries, was charged with using a place, the grand stand enclosure and the ring at Four Oaks Park for the purpose of betting, &c. The respondent and another man acting with him, paid for admission to the park and ring, and therein the respondent's companion stood on a wooden box in no way fixed to the ground and unsheltered by any umbrella, the respondent stood off the box on the ground by his side. They jointly carried on betting operations such as in the last case, one or the other off the box. The justices held that neither the enclosure nor the box nor the two combined constituted a place and dismissed the charge. The case is amusing. The respondent and the justices having evidently read the dicta of Lord Coleridge in Bows v. Fenwick thought that the stool and spiked umbrella fixed in the ground were essential to the constitution of a place, and accordingly both the bookmakers and the magistrates thought the statute could be successfully evaded by the bookmaker abandoning the stool and umbrella and by one of them using an unattached box to stand on and by his partner standing on the ground. The court defeated this ingenious attempt by reversing the decision of the justices. There, again, there was a superabundance of evidence to support a conviction, and the dicta were unnecessary for the judgment, which was clearly right. These two last cases establish nothing which goes beyond this—that if a fixed spot such as suggested be essential to be indicated, it was in fact indicated by the stool, umbrella, or box. But no case was cited in which a conviction had been quashed because of the absence of such indication. Such a case would have required more consideration.

The case of Snow v. Hill, (1885) which the magistrates read as governing the present case, does not, in my opinion, by any means do so. The appellant Snow was charged with using a place, to wit, a field at West Brompton, in Staffordshire, for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto. Dog races were held in an enclosed field about five acres in extent. The public were admitted on payment to a portion of the field, about 110 yards long by 7 yards deep, and roped off from that part of the field on which the races were run. Many hundreds of persons, including the appellant, were present. The appellant walked about and made bets, and received from, and paid money to, other persons who were there. He had no particular location on the reserved space, and carried no distinctive mark. It was not even proved that he was a bookmaker, or that he did anything to indicate that he was exercising such a calling. For aught that appeared he was only one of the persons resorting to the enclosure, and did no more than any one of them might innocently do, and there was no evidence that he received any money on deposit, or otherwise than in payment of bets he had won. The magistrates, however, erroneously thought the case governed by Eastwood v. Miller, and convicted him. An appeal against the conviction was heard by Lord Coleridge, C.J., and A. L. Smith, J., who reversed that decision. In so doing they were absolutely right. A. L. Smith, J., pointed out, in delivering the judgment of the court, that the mere fact of a person resorting to a place and betting with others he finds there is no offence under the Act. It is significant that the respondent did not even appear or make any attempt to support the conviction. Snow v. Hill, therefore, is no authority for the respondent in this case.

Two cases, Whitehurst v. Fincher, (1890) 17 Cox C. C. 70, 38 W. R. Dig. 82, and Hornsby v. Raggett, 40 W. R. 111, [1892] 1 Q. B. 20, 17 Cox C. C. 428, were cited to us, the former as an authority in favour of the respondent, the latter as an authority for the appellant. They require a little close attention and consideration, for on a mere cursory glance at the headnote of the first of them, as reported, they appear to be a little contradictory. They are, however, not at all so when really understood. The first of them,

Whitehurst v. Fincher, was argued before Fry, L.J., and Mathew, J. Fincher, the defendant, was charged with using the bar-room of a public-house for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto. The facts were as follow: Fincher on three successive days went to the bar-room of the Dartmouth Hotel at West Bromwich for the purpose of betting on horse-races, and did there in fact bet with persons who resorted thereto. He occupied no specific part of the room, which was a public one, and he had no other interest of any kind in the house. There was no evidence that he was a professional betting man. For aught that appeared the defendant only resorted to the bar as one of the public, and when there did in fact make bets with persons whom he met. The magistrate took this view of the evidence, and held that this was not such a user of the room as was contemplated by the 3rd section of the statute. In his judgment supporting the magistrate's decision Mathew, J., is reported to have said that it was not sufficient merely to show that the defendant went to the bar-room and made bets, and he thought that on the facts proved Snow v. Hill governed the case. I recognize the soundness of that decision on the facts found, for there is no more illegality in making a casual bet in a room not wholly or partially devoted to betting than there is in making it in a field with a person who is casually found there. Hornsby v. Raggett was a very different case. There Raggett, the respondent, was himself the occupier of "The Chimes" licensed beer-house at Poplar. The magistrate found as facts that on four different days a professional bookmaker and his clerk were in the bar and tap-room for the purpose of betting; that they did bet with persons resorting thereto on horse-races and received deposits on the bets made, and that the respondent knew of and permitted such user. As a matter of fact neither the bookmaker nor his clerk used any part of the house except the bar and tap-room, and these only in common with the ordinary customers of the house. The magistrate dismissed the summons on the authority of Whitehurst v. Fincher and Snow v. Hill. On appeal the court (Mathew and A. L. Smith, JJ.) held the magistrate to be wrong, Mathew, J., holding that it was not necessary to a conviction that the room or place should be used exclusively for betting; that to render the bookmaker liable it would be enough to show that he was in a room for the purpose of inviting people to come and bet with him; and that the respondent, the occupier, was liable for permitting such user. In explaining his judgment in Whitehurst v. Fincher, as supporting the case then before him, that learned judge said: "In the present case the betting was not casual, but the room was constantly and systematically used by a professional bookmaker for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto." In this A. L. Smith, J., concurred. It is clear that the distinction between the two cases—whatever particular expressions may have been used or may appear in the report of Whitehurst v. Fincher—is, that in that case the use of the room was not for betting as a business, but that all that was done was that the defendant had casually betted there with three or four people, whereas in Hornsby v. Raggett the betting for which the room was used was that carried on as a business by a professed or professional bookmaker. In considering the question of user I can see no difference between a betting-ring and a room used for the same purpose. McWilliam v. Dawson 56 J. P. 182, was a charge against a bookmaker for using a place under section 3. The bookmaker was seated in the bar of a public-house on several days for nearly an hour—not always in the same spot—betting on horse-racing with a number of persons who frequented the house. Some paid to and others received from him money on account of bets. It was found that he used the bar for the purpose of betting with them, but that he had no exclusive use or occupation of the bar or any part of it. The magistrate refused to convict. On appeal, Mathew and A. L. Smith, JJ., held that the case could not be distinguished from Hornsby v. Raggett, and that the bookmaker was liable to be convicted of using a place for the purpose of betting under section 3, and that the same reasons applied to the license-holder.

In Regina v. Worton, [1895] 1 Q. B. 227, 43 W. R. Dig. 69, it was held that evidence that on three successive days the defendant was in a bar of a beer-house, that a number of persons came in, took slips of paper hanging on the wall, wrote on them the names of the horses they wished to back, wrapped up in them the money they wished to stake, and handed the slips with the money enclosed to the defendant, furnished sufficient evidence to go to the jury upon an indictment under section 3, and the jury rightly found that the defendant had used the bar for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto: per Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., Pollock, B., and Hawkins, Lawrance, and Wright, JJ.

Liddell v. Lofthouse, 44 W. R. 349, [1896] 1 Q. B. 295, is the latest case to be found in the Law Reports on the Common Law Side bearing on the question as to what is an "other place." The respondent Lofthouse was charged at Stockton-on-Tees police-court with having used a place situated on the river side for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto. The place in question was called Hubbacks Quay, partly surrounded by a hoarding supported by wooden stays driven into the ground. On three consecutive days the respondent was found at the back of the hoarding between the same two stays calling out the odds on horses and betting with persons coming to him. The justices found that he went to the spot for the sole purpose of making a book on horse-races, and because he knew there would be a number of persons wanting to back horses there. The justices, however, doubting whether the spot was a place declined to convict. On appeal Lindley and Kay, L.JJ., sitting as a divisional court, held that it was a place, and that the justices were wrong in not convicting. That the decision on the facts stated was right, there can be no shadow of doubt; and it needed not the aid of the stays to support it.

I will not refer to my own judgment in Reg. v. Preedy (1888), in which I fully discussed the question now before us and to which I adhere. Nor do I think it would materially assist the solution of the question before us to cite any of those cases which have been decided upon charges under the Licensing Acts, for they stand on a different footing; nor those cases which are to be found forbidding any gaming in public streets, &c., for they depend on special enactments; nor the cases deciding what are public places under the Vagrant Act. I prefer to decide this case upon principle and upon authorities directly bearing upon it.

It is not possible to give so precise a definition of what is an "other place" as shall be applicable to every imaginable state of facts. Each case must of necessity depend and be decided upon its own particular circumstances; but after very careful consideration I have arrived at the conclusion that any area of enclosed ground—expressing no opinion as to unenclosed areas—covered or uncovered, which is known by a name or is capable of reasonably accurate description, to which persons from time to time or upon any particular occasions or occasion resort, and who may very properly be described as resorting thereto—used by a professional betting man for the purpose of exercising his calling and betting with such persons, or for the purpose of carrying on a ready-money betting business, may be a place within the meaning of the statute. Metes and bounds are not essential, and it matters not, in my opinion, whether for his own convenience the bookmaker chooses to remain during his hours of attendance upon one particular spot within that area or whether he prefers to move about within that area from one spot to another as he is minded. The Act speaks of other "place," not a spot in a place. If to make it a place the bookmaker must fix himself on and use only one spot, he would always have it in his power to evade the Act by wandering over the whole area.

Assuming the ring in question was a place within the meaning of the statute, there was, in my opinion, abundant evidence of such user of it by the respondent as was forbidden by section 3. It was, indeed, suggested that there could be no illegal user of any place unless such place could be fairly described as then already opened, kept, or used, that is, appropriated wholly or in part for the illegal purposes mentioned in section 3. Morley v. Greenhalgh, 11 W. R. 263, 3 B. & S. 374, 32 L. J. M. C. 93, 1, was cited in support of this suggestion. That case, however, as also did Clark v. Hague, 8 W. R. 363, 8 Cox C. C. 327, turned upon the peculiar language of 12 and 13 Vict. c. 92, forbidding cock-fighting in a place used for that purpose, and does not assist in the present discussion. In my opinion, a person using a place, though it be for the first time, for the forbidden purposes, is liable to be convicted under section 3 (see per Blackburn, J., in Haigh v. Town Council of Sheffield, L. R. 10, Q. B. 108).

At one time it was looked upon as a doubtful question whether the Legislature intended the enactments to prohibit, and whether in fact they prohibited, anything more than that class or kind of gaming which consisted of receiving deposits of money as the consideration for bets on future events described in the now repealed preamble of the Act. I am of opinion that such restricted interpretation of the enacting clauses would be doing violence to the very plain unmistakeable words used in them. Moreover, the question was judicially set at rest by Bond v. Plumb, 42 W. R. 222, 17 Cox C. C. 749, where it was held by Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Collins, J., that betting with persons resorting to a place, and receiving deposits on bets were distinct offences. (See also The Queen v. Brown, 43 W. R. 222, [1895] 1 Q. B. 119; and The Queen v. Worton, [1895] ibid 227). In the case before us there was, in my opinion, abundant evidence that the respondent used the Tattersall's ring at Hurst Park for both purposes.

In dealing with the evidence in each particular case the magistrates should always bear in mind that the law does not forbid betting itself, nor is the business or avocation of a bookmaker necessarily illegal: Thwaites v. Coulthwaite, 44 W. R. 295, [1896] 1 Ch. 496. But what the Legislature has forbidden, and what it has pronounced to be illegal, is the use by those who make a trade and business of betting, of any place for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto, or for the purpose of receiving, either themselves or by any other person, any money or valuable thing as the consideration for a bet or bets on any event of any horse-race, &c. We are not called upon to do more than declare our opinions upon the law as applicable to cases like the present. Whether an individual charged with infringing the law has in fact been guilty of such infringement it is the duty of the magistrates to determine, bringing their best intelligence honestly to bear upon each particular case having regard to the facts before them.

In the present case we are of opinion that the justices took an erroneous view of the law, and the case must, therefore, be remitted back to them, with costs to be paid by the respondent.

Ex parte THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL. (a.)

Vexatious Actions Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 51)—Vexatious proceedings instituted before the passing of the Act—"Reasonable ground."

An order under the Vexatious Actions Act, 1896, may be founded upon vexatious legal proceedings commenced before the passing of that Act. In dealing with an application for such an order the court will consider the number, general character, and results of the proceedings alleged to be vexatious, and may make the order although there may have been reasonable ground for the proceedings in each case considered by itself.

Application made by the Attorney-General under the Vexatious Actions Act, 1896.

Section 1 of that Act is as follows: "It shall be lawful for the Attorney-General to apply to the High Court for an order under this Act, and if he satisfies the High Court that any person has habitually and persistently instituted vexatious legal proceedings without any reasonable ground for instituting such proceedings, whether in the High Court or in any inferior court, and whether against the same person or against different persons, the court may, after hearing such person or giving him an opportunity of being heard, after assigning counsel in case such person is unable on account of poverty to retain counsel, order that no legal proceedings shall be instituted by that person in the High Court or any other court unless he obtains the leave of the High Court or some judge thereof, and satisfies the court or judge that such legal proceeding is not an abuse of the process of the court, and that there is primâ facie ground for such proceeding."

It appeared from the affidavits that the respondent had during the past five years brought forty-eight different actions, some in the High Court and some in inferior courts. The defendants included several judges of the High Court and of county courts, the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Archbishop of Canterbury and other trustees of the British Museum, officials of the Houses of Parliament, and other persons occupying official positions. In one of the actions the respondent had recovered a small sum of money for work and labour done. In the other cases the causes of action included conspiracy by judges and others to defeat the ends of justice, assault, refusal to accept the respondent's petitions to Parliament, and refusal to allow him to use the reading-rooms in the British Museum. Some of these actions had been stayed as vexatious, some had been dismissed, and some were still pending. All the actions except one had been commenced before the Sir R. E. Webster, A.G. (Henry Sutton with him), for the application.

Corrie Grant, for the respondent.—The Act is not retrospective. Of the forty-eight actions forty-seven were instituted before the Act was passed, and an application under the Act cannot be founded upon proceedings instituted before the Act. Its effect is to impose a restriction upon the exercise of a right possessed by the subject, and it does not deal with procedure merely. It is therefore applicable only to vexatious proceedings commenced after the Act was passed: Wright v. Hale, 9 W. R. 157, 6 H. & N. 227; Warner v. Murdoch, 25 W. R. 207, 4 Ch. D. 750; Kimbray v. Draper, 16 W. R. 539, L. R. 3 Q. B. 161. [WRIGHT, J., referred to Reg. v. Vine, 23 W. R. 649, L. R. 10 Q. B. 195.] That case depended upon the consideration of the safety of the public. Further, the claims in these actions were well founded, and the respondent by bringing them has not habitually and persistently instituted vexatious legal proceedings without reasonable ground.

WRIGHT, J.—In this case two objections have been taken on behalf of the respondent. First, it is said that this Act is not retrospective; that is, that an application under it cannot be founded on proceedings instituted before it was passed. No such distinction is indicated in the Act itself; there is nothing in it to limit action taken under it by the Attorney-General to conduct occurring since the Act was passed. I think this case is even clearer than Reg. v. Vine, in which case it was held that the provision of the Wine and Beer Amendment Act, 1870, disqualifying persons convicted of felony from selling spirits applied to a person who actually held a licence when the Act came into operation. In making this order we are not in any true sense giving a retrospective operation to this Act; in so far as we do so we are following the plain language of the Act.

As to the second point argued before us, I think that the consideration of whether a person has habitually and persistently instituted vexatious legal proceedings without any reasonable ground does not depend on a minute examination of whether in each particular action there was or was not a reasonable ground; we must consider the number of actions brought, their general character and their results. In this case I think that there has been a mass of litigation of a vexatious character, and that we ought to make the order.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. We are not asked to say that this Act is retrospective. It is suggested that we should disregard all circumstances which happened before the Act was passed; but I think that this is not so. We must look at all the proceedings as a whole, and I cannot entertain a doubt that vexatious proceedings have been habitually and persistently instituted within the meaning of the Act.

BRAMBLE v. LOWE. (a.)

Vaccination — Proceedings against parent to enforce vaccination—Vaccination officer—Authority—Minute of appointment—Vaccination Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 84), s. 31 — Local Government Board General Order, 31*st of October*, 1874, articles 16, 17.

A vaccination officer appointed by a minute of the guardians has authority to institute proceedings under section 31 of the Vaccination Act, 1867, against a parent for non-compliance with a notice requiring him to procure the vaccination of his child, without a special authority from the guardians.

Special case stated by a justice of the peace for the borough of Ipswich.

An information was laid under section 31 of the Vaccination Act, 1867, by the respondent, who was a duly appointed vaccination officer, against the appellant for non-compliance with a notice requiring him to have his child vaccinated. At the hearing the clerk to the guardians produced a minute of the appointment of the respondent as vaccination officer, and the consent of the Local Government Board to the appointment, which was dated the 15th of February, 1892. This was the only evidence of authority to prosecute produced by the respondent; but it was admitted that the guardians had passed a resolution giving the respondent general instructions to prosecute except in cases in which an order had previously been obtained against the person in default.

The magistrate made an order against the appellant for the vaccination of the child, subject to this case, the question for the opinion of the court being whether the respondent had the requisite authority to institute these proceedings.

Local Government Board General Order.—Regulations under Vaccination Act (dated the 31st of October, 1874):

Article 16.—The guardians shall in all cases in which the provisions of the Vaccination Acts for enforcing vaccination have been neglected, cause proceedings to be taken against the persons in default, and for this purpose shall give directions authorizing the vaccination officer to institute and conduct such proceedings; but no directions shall authorize the vaccination officer to take further proceedings under section 31 of the Vaccination Act, 1867, in any case in which an order has already been obtained and summary proceedings taken under that section until he shall have brought the circumstances of the case under the notice of the guardians and received their special directions thereon.

Article 17.—The vaccination officers shall take such proceedings as may be necessary under the Vaccination Acts in any case in which the Local Government Board may direct him to do so.

Schultess Young, for the appellant.—The Vaccination Act, 1867, s. 27, required the vaccination officer to obtain the authority of the guardians in each particular case before instituting proceedings under section 31; but section 27 was repealed by the Act of 1871, and in 1874 it was decided in Knight v. Halliwell, 22 W. R. 689, L. R. 9 Q. B. 412, that proceedings could be instituted under section 31 of the Act of 1867 without any special authority. The article 16 of the General Order of the Local Government Board, October 31, 1874, was introduced, and under that article it is necessary for the officer obtain authority in each case before instituting proceedings under section 31 of the Act of 1867. In Robinson v. Lowe, 13 Times L. R. 19, there is an observation of Wright, J., to the effect that it is most improper to give general instructions to vaccination officers to prosecute.

Guy Stephenson, for the respondent, was not called upon.

WRIGHT, J.—I am afraid that this case has come here owing to a misapprehension of what I said in Robinson v. Lowe. I did say in that case that a question might arise under article 16 as to the propriety of the guardians giving general instructions, but I had no intention of deciding the question.

Under the Act of 1867 authority had to be obtained in each case from the guardians before proceedings were instituted. The law was altered by the Act of 1871, which repealed section 27 of the Act of 1867, and now a vaccination officer is entitled to proceed without any special authority from the guardians. Moreover, under article 17 of the order of 1874 the officer must take proceedings if the Local Government Board direct him to do so, even without the approval of the guardians.

It is contended for the appellant that the effect of article 16 is to restore the law as it was prior to the Act of 1871. I do not agree with that argument. Article 16 is not very clearly expressed, but its meaning is, in my opinion, that before any default under the Acts has occurred, the guardians may give general instructions, under the authority of which proceedings can be instituted when the occasion arises. As I have already said, I do not think any general instructions are required, because, in my opinion, the officer can proceed of his own motion under section 31. It may be said then that article 16 is superfluous. I am inclined to think it is.

BRUCE, J.—I agree.

VALLANCEY v. FLETCHER. (a.)

Criminal law—Brawling in churchyard—"Any person"—Clergyman—23 & 24 Vict. c. 32, s. 2.

The preamble to 23 & 24 Vict. c. 32 recites that, "Whereas it is expedient to abolish the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts of England and Ireland over persons not in holy orders in suits for brawling." Section 2 enacts that "any person who shall be guilty of riotous, violent, or indecent behaviour . . . in any churchyard" shall be liable to a penalty.

Held, that section 2 applies to persons in holy orders as well as to laymen.

Special case stated by justices of Derbyshire in petty sessions at Swadlincote.

The appellant was charged under 23 & 24 Vict. c. 32, s. 2, for that he on the 13th of June, 1896, was guilty of indecent and violent behaviour in the churchyard of the parish church of Rosliston.

The facts were as follows. The appellant was perpetual curate of Rosliston, and the respondent was churchwarden. Prior to the appellant's appointment a woman had died and been buried in the churchyard. Above her grave was a grass mound, but no tombstone. The appellant gave orders to the sexton to level the mound above the grave.

On the 13th of June, 1896, the sexton was engaged in doing so, the appellant being present. Several relatives of the deceased woman entered the churchyard, and expressed great resentment at finding that her grave was being interfered with. The appellant directed the sexton to proceed with the work of levelling, adding that he would protect him. One of the deceased's relatives advanced towards the appellant raising a stick in a threatening manner, whereupon the appellant pointed a revolver at the man, saying, "I'll shoot you." A scuffle ensued, and subsequently the police interfered.

It was contended before the justices first, that the statute 23 & 24 Vict. c. 32, s. 2, did not apply to persons in holy orders; secondly, that the appellant as perpetual curate had discretionary powers as to the keeping and management of the churchyard, and that he was acting in the exercise of his legal rights in levelling the mound, that the relatives of the deceased woman were guilty of a trespass, and that the facts showed a bonâ fide claim of right on the part of the appellant, whereby the jurisdiction of the justices was ousted.

The justices found as a fact that the appellant had been guilty of violent and indecent behaviour, and convicted the appellant.

The questions for the opinion of the court were (1) Does 23 & 24 Vict. c. 32, s. 2, apply to persons in holy orders; (2) had the justices jurisdiction to hear and determine the case, and to convict the appellant.

23 & 24 Vict. c. 32, s. 2, provides that "any person who shall be guilty of riotous, violent, and indecent behaviour . . . in any churchyard" shall be liable to a penalty.

Simpson, for the appellant, on the first point referred to the preamble of the statute, which is in the following terms: "Whereas it is expedient to abolish the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts of England and Ireland over persons not in holy orders in suits for brawling." He contended that the proper course in the case of a person in holy orders being guilty of brawling in his own churchyard was to proceed against him in the Ecclesiastical Court. On the second point he cited Bryan v. Whistler, 8 B. & C. 288.

Appleton and Borough, for the respondent, were not called upon.

WRIGHT, J.—The magistrates have found as a fact that the appellant was guilty of violent and indecent behaviour in his churchyard. There was abundant evidence to support that finding irrespective of any question as to whether the appellant had or had not a right to level this grave. I am very far from saying that he had such a right, but whatever his rights may be he must exercise them in a decent manner. The only real question of law in the case is whether section 2 of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 32 applies to the incumbent or curate of the place where the offence is committed. It does, no doubt, appear from the preamble that the primary intention of the Act was to apply a different remedy in the case of persons not in holy orders from that which previously existed. The language of section 2 is, however, quite general, and I do not see any reason why its meaning is to be cut down and limited in the manner contended for by the appellant. I think this appeal must be dismissed.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I entertain

Ship—Wages—Set-off—Advances of wages made by master for the purchase of slops by seamen deserters—Gratuities—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 167, 221, 232.

A shipowner defending an action of master's wages is not entitled to set off against the plaintiff's claim the amount of wages advanced by the master during the voyage for the purchase of slops, although it appears that the seamen to whom the advances were made have deserted, and thereby forfeited their wages, and the owners lay claim to the amount forfeited to reimburse the expenses caused by the desertion.

The owners of a ship cannot set off against the claim of the master of the ship for wages the amount of gratuities presented to the master by the consignees of cargo.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of the Admiralty side of the County Court of Cumberland, holden at Whitehaven.

By the decree appealed from his Honour Judge Steavenson had given judgment for the plaintiff, confirming the report of the registrar of the county court in an action of master's wages instituted on behalf of J. Collins, master of the English barque Parkdale against The Parkdale in rem, in which action the plaintiff had claimed the sum of £145, made up of £18 7s. 5d., the balance of wages found due to him on settlement of Parkdale accounts for the voyage ending November, 1894, and retained by the defendants, the owners of The Parkdale, and of £126 13s. 4d., the balance of wages due to the plaintiff from the 1st of December, 1894, to the 25th of May, 1896, at £14 per month, after giving credit to the defendants for £123 cash advanced to the plaintiff's wife.

In the county court the defendants had set up against the plaintiff's claim a set-off, alleging that on an account being taken of all sums of money due to the plaintiff as master of The Parkdale for wages and all disbursements and payments made by the plaintiff on account or in respect of the said barque, and of all sums received by the plaintiff from or on behalf of the defendants, the claim of the plaintiff ought to be reduced by the total amount of £161 14s. 5d., made up of (1) the sum of £116 14s. 5d. debited in account by the plaintiff against the defendants in respect of wages earned by certain seamen of The Parkdale who had deserted before the end of the second voyage of The Parkdale, but after the plaintiff had supplied to such deserters slops charged against them at the total cost of £116 14s. 5d.; and (2) the several sums of £10, £15, and £20, alleged to have been received by the plaintiff from consignees of cargo as and for "gratuities," and retained by him for his own benefit.

The judge of the county court, by consent of the plaintiff and defendants, referred the accounts to the registrar assisted by one assessor, and on the 31st of August, 1896, the registrar reported that he found that there was due to the plaintiff as master of the barque Parkdale for wages the sum of £371 15s. 8d.; that the plaintiff had made disbursements and payments on account of or in respect of the said barque to the amount of £2,000 15s. 6d., and that the plaintiff had received from or on behalf of the defendants sums of money amounting to £2,177 2s. 3d.; thus, after charging against the defendants the above-mentioned sum of £116 14s. 5d., making the amount of wages due to the plaintiff to be the sum of £195 11s. 11d. In order to arrive at this report the registrar therefore came to the conclusion that the master had acted legally in retaining as payment for the slops supplied to the deserters the above sum of £116 14s. 5d. earned by them as wages, and also the amount of the gratuities presented to him by the consignees of cargo as above stated.

The county court judge confirmed the report of the registrar, and no objection having been raised as to his jurisdiction to pronounce for the amount of £195 11s. 11d. as the amount due to the plaintiff as wages and recoverable in the action, gave judgment for the plaintiff for that sum.

The defendants appealed.

The appeal was now heard before a Divisional Court of the Admiralty Division (the President and Barnes, J.).

Batten, for the appellants.—By section 232 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1892, wages forfeited for desertion must be applied towards reimbursing the expenses caused by the desertion to the master or owner of the ship, and, subject to that reimbursement, must be paid over to the consolidated fund. No expenses were caused to the master by the desertion in this case within the meaning of this provision, and the amount of £116 14s. 5d. cannot therefore be claimed by the master as against the defendants, such amount being clearly forfeited wages within the Act. As to the gratuities, these are analogous to a secret commission paid to the plaintiff when acting as the defendants' agent, and must be accounted for by him to them. They are therefore right in charging them in account against him.

Aspinall, Q.C., and Mansfield, for the respondents were not called on to argue.

JEUNE, P.—The first point raised on this appeal is as to the so-called deduction with regard to the slops. It appears that certain sailors deserted. Thereupon their wages became forfeited, and the captain claims that what he gave to these seamen in the way of slops should be set against the amount of the wages forfeited; or, in other words, that he should be able to take payment out of the sum which otherwise would be due to the seamen if they had not deserted, and which would be forfeited if they did. The case appears to me to be of the simplest possible kind. The master is entitled to pay wages; nay, more, he is personally bound to the seamen for their wages. He is entitled, beyond all question, within the limits of the Merchant Shipping Act, to make advances. If he is entitled to make advances I can see no difference in his giving them slops to the value of such advances as he might have made, and all the more because when he comes ashore the master is obliged to produce accounts and an opportunity is given to the sailor of checking them in the presence of the proper officer. Consequently he can make advances in this way to the seamen, and that is what in this case he has done.

(a.) Reported by C. F. JEMMETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

can see no reason why he should not. If it could be pointed out that the Act forbade anything of the kind it would have made all the difference; but so far from doing that, it seems to me that the Act distinctly recognizes transactions of the kind. Section 132 of the Act provides for the form to be used, and the form in the schedule to the Act actually speaks of wages advanced and of stores supplied, it being common knowledge that the stores are supplied in this way by the captain. Therefore it appears to me impossible to say that the Act prevents transactions of this kind; and as the owners knew all about it, they cannot properly make any objection.

Then arises the question whether, if the deduction could be made in the ordinary course when a seaman claims the balance of his wages, the forfeiture makes any difference. I do not think it does. Section 232 of the Act provides as to this forfeiture. All that that section provides is that the wages are to be forfeited. But what are the wages? They are, I think, the sum due after all proper deductions have been made. I do not mean deductions in the sense of penalties, but in the ordinary sense of the word. It appears to me to be perfectly legitimate to make deductions which the law allows for wages advanced or for stores supplied, which, to my mind, would have exactly the same effect. Therefore I have no doubt but that the master in this case only did what was usual, and what the owners knew of and the law allows.

The other point is as to certain gratuities given to the captain by the consignees of the cargo; and I find it difficult to see how any argument can possibly be raised in favour of the shipowners on that point. We have the evidence of the captain as to what the exact nature of these gratuities was, and he drew what I think was a proper distinction. As regards a sum which appears to have been returned to him by the stevedore, that he gave credit for to his owners, properly enough, because that really amounted to a rebate, and anything connected with payments made for the owners should naturally be carried to their credit. But I regard the gratuities I have referred to as simply presents given by the merchant to the master for doing his duty both to the merchant and to his owners, and for doing it extra well. I see a broad distinction between that and anything in the nature of secret commission; and I therefore think the owners are not entitled to have these gratuities taken into account.

BARNES, J.—There are only two points for decision in this case—namely, whether or not the master, who is the plaintiff, is to have the amount of the value of the slops which were advanced to sailors on account of their wages set off against his wages; and, secondly, whether the master is entitled, in account with his owners, to some small sums, in the shape of certain gratuities, which appear to have been paid to him.

The first point arises in this way. The master, as everybody knows, and as every witness seems to have known in this case, has, in the course of the voyage, to provide the sailors with clothing, boots, and so forth (otherwise called slops), because it is common experience that these men go to sea so improvidently that they have not adequate things to wear to work the ship, especially in cold latitudes. The master, in starting, becomes responsible by the articles to the crew for their wages. He provides certain clothing and articles of use to them in the course of the voyage, and forms are provided by the Board of Trade for him to insert, on return to port, the exact amount of money given to the men on account of wages, and the amount of slops or stores he has provided them with, and which they have taken as payment in lieu of wages. When the master comes back and pays off the crew in the presence of the Mercantile Marine superintendent, even when he does so with the assistance of a clerk or other person from the office of the shipbroker or shipowner, he deducts from the amount payable as wages the amount properly advanced in respect of these matters.

That being the ordinary course of business, it is now argued that because some men deserted after they had earned wages, and have therefore legally forfeited what is their due, that the master, who, as the evidence shows, was acting with the full knowledge of his owners, is not to charge the owners in his accounts against the owners with the amount of wages which is equivalent to the value of the slops supplied to the men who deserted.

It seems to me quite beyond all question, when the Act of Parliament, the articles, and the forms are all looked at—especially when the course of business is considered—that the point taken on behalf of the owners is quite untenable.

The other point is that the master has improperly retained some small gratuities, and it is argued that these gratuities are in the nature of secret commissions. Of course no master or other agent is allowed to take any secret commission, the reason being that in so doing he is acting antagonistically to the interest of his employers, and taking a benefit which, if allowed, would be against their interests. But in this case the master has done no more than receive a little present, not in any sense antagonistic to his owners, but simply because the consignees thought he had discharged the cargo so well that he was entitled to a small sum.

This is one of the commonest forms of gratuity which exist, and which, when given under such circumstances, the master is entitled to accept and retain.

GOODLOCK v. COUSINS. (a.)

County court—Execution—Claim to goods seized—Sale by bailiff—Title of purchaser—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 156.

Where goods are seized in execution under a judgment of a county court, and a claim is made to them, but the claimant fails to comply with any of the three conditions laid down by section 156 of the County Courts Act, 1888, a sale by the bailiff under that section confers on the purchaser a good title to the goods, although the claimant may afterwards prove that they belonged to him at the time of the seizure.

Judgment of Wills and Wright, JJ., ante, p. 303, affirmed.

Appeal from a judgment of a Divisional Court on an appeal from a county court (ante, p. 303).

This was an action for wrongful conversion. A judgment had been obtained in the county court against the plaintiff's son, in whose house the plaintiff was living, and execution was levied. Among the goods seized were certain articles belonging to the plaintiff. The plaintiff made a claim to his goods in writing, as required by ord. 27, r. 1, of the County Court Rules, and the high bailiff sent notice of such claim to the execution creditor, and also sent notice to the plaintiff requiring him to make deposit or give security in accordance with section 156 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

The execution creditor did not by return of post admit the plaintiff's title to the goods, neither did the plaintiff comply with the notice which had been sent to him. The bailiff thereupon put the goods up for sale by auction, and they were bought by the defendant for £6, which sum the bailiff paid into court. After the sale the execution creditor admitted the plaintiff's title to the goods which he claimed.

The plaintiff brought this action against the defendant to recover damages for the wrongful conversion of his goods.

The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for £20 15s.

The Divisional Court (Wills and Wright, JJ.) reversed the judgment of the county court judge, and ordered judgment to be entered for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

Cranstoun, for the plaintiff.—This was not a sale under an order of the court; it was merely a sale under a warrant of execution; and therefore it could not give the purchaser a better title than the execution debtor had. Section 156 of the County Courts Act, 1888, says that, where a claimant to goods taken in execution fails to make deposit or give security in pursuance of the bailiff's notice, "the bailiff shall sell such goods as if no such claim had been made." This does not take away from the claimant his right of following his goods, which are worth a great deal more than the £6 which they fetched on a forced sale, and suing a bonâ fide purchaser.

Stroud, for the defendant.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—All that we have to do in this case is to construe section 156 of the County Courts Act, 1888, as applicable to the facts before us. Have not the circumstances mentioned in the section, as requisite to justify a sale by the bailiff, happened? In my opinion they have. The section begins thus: "Where any claim shall be made to or in respect of any goods taken in execution under the process of the court." The first circumstance is that goods are taken in execution, and the next is that a claim is made to some of them; here goods were taken in execution, and the plaintiff claimed some of those goods. The section proceeds: "The claimant may deposit with the bailiff either the amount of the value of the goods claimed . . . to be by such bailiff paid into court to abide the decision of the judge upon such claim, or the sum which the bailiff shall be allowed to charge as costs for keeping possession of such goods until such decision can be obtained, or may give to the bailiff in the prescribed manner security for the value of the goods claimed, and, in default of the claimant so doing, the bailiff shall sell such goods"—the words are imperative, he shall sell the goods—"as if no such claim had been made, and shall pay into court the proceeds of such sale to abide the decision of the judge." Here the plaintiff claimed the goods, but he did not deposit any sum of money with the bailiff or give security. Therefore the last part of the section applies. It is a statutory order to the bailiff to sell the goods. To whom is he to sell them? It must mean to any person who is willing to be the purchaser. And it seems to me to follow by necessary implication that the purchaser is to be entitled to the things bought without further dispute. I therefore think that the decision of the Divisional Court is right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—The question is whether, if the requirements of the section are complied with, a sale by the bailiff confers a good title on the purchaser. It is to be noticed that the claimant has an opportunity of preventing a sale by paying a deposit or giving security; and if a sale takes place, the proceeds are paid into court to abide the decision of the judge. I am of opinion that the intention of the Legislature is that a sale shall confer on the purchaser an absolute and indefeasible title to the goods.

CHITTY, L.J.—The contention of the plaintiff is that all that the bailiff sells is the interest of the execution debtor in the goods. But the Act says that the bailiff shall sell "such goods," not the interest of the execution debtor in them. I think the Act means what it says, and, considering that the purchaser pays the purchase-money, which is thereupon deposited in court, it would be a strange thing if he did not get a title.

Appeal dismissed.

APPLEYARD v. LAMBETH VESTRY. (a.)

Metropolis management — Sewer — Drain — Combined drain laid with sanction of Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers—Metropolis Management Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 112.

The "Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers" mentioned in section 112 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862, are the commissioners who were created under that title in 1848 by the statute 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, and do not include any previously existing commissioners. Therefore no drain laid before 1848 can come within the definition of "drain" given in that section.

Judgment of Hawkins, J., ante, p. 173, affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of Hawkins, J., at the trial of the action without a jury, ante, p. 173.

The action was brought for a mandamus commanding the defendants, pursuant to sections 69 and 72 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and other Acts, to repair, maintain, and cleanse certain pipes which carried the drainage of four houses belonging to the plaintiff in York-road, Lambeth, and also for a declaration that such pipes were "sewers" within the meaning of the said Acts and vested in the defendants.

The four houses were built in the year 1839 or 1840. These houses and two others were drained by pipes laid for draining all six houses by a combined operation, and the system of combined drainage so constructed remained in existence from the time when the houses were built till the commencement of the action.

At the time when this system of drainage was constructed the sewer authorities for the district were the Commissioners of Sewers for Surrey and Kent, and no objection was raised by them to the system adopted.

The question was whether the pipes were "drains" or "sewers" within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Acts. By section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, "the word 'drain' shall mean and include any drain of and used for the drainage of one building only, or premises within the same curtilage, and made merely for the purpose of communicating with a cesspool or other like receptacle for drainage, or with a sewer into which the drainage of two or more buildings or premises occupied by different persons is conveyed, and shall also include any drain for draining any group or block of houses by a combined operation under the order of any vestry or district board; and the word 'sewer' shall mean and include sewers and drains of every description except drains to which the word 'drain,' interpreted as aforesaid, applies."

By section 112 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862, the meaning of the word "drain" is extended so as to include "any drain for draining a group or block of houses by a combined operation laid or constructed before the 1st of January, 1856, pursuant to the order or direction, or with the sanction or approval of the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers." The Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers were created in 1848 by the statute 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112.

Hawkins, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff on the ground that the pipes were not drains, but were sewers, and were therefore repairable by the vestry.

The defendants appealed.

Macmorran, Q.C. (Muir Mackenzie with him), for the defendants.—These pipes are "drains" within the meaning of section 112 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862. They must be taken to have been laid with the sanction and approval of the Commissioners of Sewers for Surrey and Kent, for by the Act then in force in the district all drains were required to be laid with the sanction of that body. Those commissioners were at that time, so far as this district was concerned, the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers, though that name was afterwards specifically given to the body which was created in 1848 to supersede the old commissioners.

McCall, Q.C., and Morton Smith, for the plaintiff, were not called upon to argue.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is a perfectly clear case. The Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers mentioned in section 112 of the Act of 1862 must be the commissioners who were brought into existence under that title by the Act of 1848, and cannot include any other commissioners. The pipes in question, therefore, do not come within the terms of the Act of 1862, and by the definition given in the Act of 1855 they are sewers because they drain more than one house. The appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES and CHITTY, L.JJ., concurred.

HILL v. HILL. (a.)

Trust—Precatory—Gift—Words of request.

Upon the marriage of a lady with the heir-presumptive to a peerage certain family jewels were given to her "for her life with the request that at her death they might be left as heirlooms."

Held, that these words did not create a precatory trust, and that the wife took the jewels absolutely.

Appeal from the judgment of Collins, J., in favour of the defendant at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was by Viscount Hill, who was the fourth viscount and was born in 1863, to recover possession of certain family jewels—namely, a diamond necklace, pendant, and earrings—from the Dowager Viscountess Hill, the stepmother of the plaintiff, and widow of the third viscount.

It appeared that the Dowager Ann Viscountess Hill, whose maiden name was Anne Clegg, and who was the widow of the second Viscount Hill, was married in 1831, when she was sixteen, to Rowland Hill, who was the heir-presumptive to the title of Viscount Hill, and these jewels were given to her on her marriage by Mrs. Hill, her mother-in-law.

In 1890 the Dowager Ann sent a document to her solicitor, in which she stated: "When I married she (Mrs. Hill) gave them (the jewels) to me for my life, with the request that at my death they might be left as heirlooms."

In 1891 the Dowager Ann died, and by her will, made in that year, she left the jewels in question to her son, the plaintiff's father, the third viscount (who died in 1895) for life, and after his death "to each and every of the persons who shall in turn succeed to the title and dignity of Viscount Hill severally and successively as they shall in turn succeed to such title and dignity."

The action was tried at Warwick before Collins, J., without a jury, when the learned judge held that the document of 1890 showed that the jewels were settled by Mrs. Hill by parol by way of trust in 1831, and that the Dowager Ann had only a life interest and could not dispose of them by will; and further, that by virtue of the rule against perpetuities the third viscount took the jewels absolutely and that he gave them to his wife, the present defendant, and that, therefore, she was entitled to them. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 19.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—I have read the judgments about to be delivered by the Lords Justices, and I entirely agree with them. I propose to say very little upon the question, but I desire to express the strongest conviction that when the court is called upon to place a construction upon words spoken or written, for the purpose of adjudicating upon them, the same rule must be applied in courts of equity as in courts of law, and that rule is that where words, spoken or written, are used they must have their ordinary signification, unless there is something which obliges the court to give them a meaning other than their ordinary meaning. Is there anything here to show that the words were used in a meaning other than their ordinary meaning? The class of words used are words of request. Words of request in their ordinary meaning convey a mere request, and do not, either at law or in equity, convey a legal obligation of any kind. But in any particular case there may be something which shows that the words have a meaning beyond their ordinary meaning. Upon the construction of wills there have been very many cases before equity judges, and in many of those cases the judges decided that words of request were to be construed as bearing a meaning beyond their ordinary meaning of request, and as imposing an obligatory trust. I do not mean to criticize any of those cases, and to say that they were wrongly decided on the facts of each case. But, having read all the cases in equity from the beginning until now, I cannot find any rule laid down in any case which obliges the judge to give to the words a meaning other than their ordinary meaning. In the present case I cannot find any fact or circumstance which entitles the court to carry the meaning of the words of request beyond their ordinary meaning. Where there are prior words giving legal or equitable rights, followed by words of request, it requires the strongest possible circumstances to say that those words of request are to cut down the prior words giving the legal and equitable rights, and to say that the words of request impose an obligation. The words in the present case are said to have been used in a conversation many years ago, and we have before us a mere memorandum of that conversation made many years after the conversation, and anything more dangerous than to act upon those words as bearing a sense other than their ordinary sense cannot be imagined. We have not the whole conversation before us. There is nothing to show that the words were not used in their ordinary meaning, and it would be in the highest degree dangerous to impute an intention which was not actually expressed in the words used. I am therefore unable to agree with the judgment of Collins, J.

LOPES, L.J., read the following judgment: This case depends upon the construction of a letter or memorandum, which is admissible in evidence as being a declaration against the interest of the person making it. This document was sent by the Dowager Ann Viscountess Hill to her solicitor in 1890, and appears to be a statement by her as to what was said to her by her mother-in-law, Mrs. Hill, on the occasion of her marriage with Rowland, the second viscount, in 1831. The Dowager Ann died in 1891, leaving a will which was made a short time before her death, and by which she bequeathed the diamonds to her son, Rowland Clegg Hill, the third viscount, until his death, and after his death to each and every person who should succeed to the dignity severally and successively as they should in turn succeed to it, her intention being that the diamonds should descend as heirlooms as far as the rules of law and equity would permit. Her son, the third viscount, survived her, and died in 1895. He was succeeded by his son, the fourth viscount, who was born in 1863 (in the lifetime of the testatrix) and is the plaintiff in this action. The defendant is the second wife of the third Viscount Hill, who claims these diamonds as a gift from him, he having, as she contends, power to dispose of them as he thought fit.

The learned judge in the court below says: "I have reluctantly arrived at the conclusion that there has been a gift not absolute to Ann Clegg, but a gift for life only with a trust, a precatory trust, that she shall by her will, as far as possible, absolutely constitute these things as heirlooms to go with the title." I cannot agree with the learned judge. The two questions to be considered seem to me to be—first, had the Dowager Ann any power to dispose of these diamonds, or were they subject to a precatory trust; and secondly, if she had an absolute power to dispose of them, and they were not subject to a precatory trust, is there anything in the disposition she has made of them by her will which transgresses the rule against perpetuities. It must be conceded that, if there is no precatory trust, the property in these diamonds vested absolutely in the Dowager Ann, and that she had power to deal with them as she has done, provided the rules against perpetuities are not violated. Is there a precatory trust created by the document in question? Whether a precatory trust can be created by word of mouth or by anything less than a will, it is unnecessary to consider, because I do not think that the words used here, even if occurring in a will, would create such a trust. The doctrine of precatory trusts is a creature of equity by whose aid the intentions of testators, in my judgment, have too frequently been defeated. I agree with James, L.J., in Lamb v. Eames, 19 W. R. 659, L. R. 6 Ch. 597, when he says: "In hearing case after case cited I could not help feeling that the officious kindness of the Court of Chancery in interposing trusts where in many cases the father of the family never meant to create trusts, must have been a very cruel kindness indeed." It is inconceivable to me that a testator, who really meant his hope, recommendation, confidence, or request to be imperative, should not express his intention in a mandatory form. I agree with Mr. Farwell in his book on "Powers," when he says, at p. 480: "It would not be a very strained inference to regard all such expressions as stating the motive that induced the absolute gift rather than a fetter imposed upon it." As the authorities now stand, if the gift to the Countess Ann had been absolute it would have been impossible to hold that the subsequent words created a precatory trust.

The difficulty here, if there is any, is the words "for my life" and "at my death they might be left." It is in every case a question of intention, and the whole document with the surrounding circumstances must be considered. Cotton, L.J., in In re Adams and Kensington Vestry, 32 W. R. 883, 27 Ch. D. 394, at p. 410, says: "Having regard to the later decisions, we must not extend the old cases in any way or rely upon the mere use of any particular words, but, considering all the words which are used, we have to see what is their true effect and what was the intention of the testator as expressed in his will." Adopting that view, I come to the conclusion that it was never intended to fetter the disposition of the diamonds by the Countess Ann, and that they were given absolutely to her, but that a wish was expressed that after using them for her life she should by will dispose of them so that they should follow the title, not intending to govern the discretion of the person whom she was addressing, but indicating only what would be, in her opinion, a reasonable exercise of that discretion. The reference to the will of the Countess Ann by which she is asked to dispose of the diamonds after her death indicates a discretion reposed in her. Another objection might be taken to the precatory trust—viz., that the object of it, signified only by the word "heirlooms," is too uncertain to make such a trust maintainable. If I am right in my view of the precatory trust, then the Countess Ann had power to dispose of the diamonds by her will, and in the events which have happened the rule against perpetuities is not transgressed, because the plaintiff was born in the lifetime of the Countess Ann.

This conclusion, it is satisfactory to think, gives effect to what was obviously the intention—viz., that these diamonds should accompany the title.

The appeal must be allowed.

CHITTY, L.J.—The plaintiff claims the diamond necklace, pendants, and earrings in question under the will of the Dowager Ann Viscountess Hill, whose maiden name was Ann Clegg. She died in 1891, having made her will in the same year a short time before her death. By this will she bequeathed the diamonds to her son Rowland Clegg Hill, the third viscount, until his death, and after his death to each and every person who should succeed to the dignity severally and successively as they should in turn succeed to it, her intention being that the diamonds should descend as heirlooms as far as the rules of law and equity would permit. Her son, the third viscount, survived her and died in 1895. He was succeeded in the dignity by his son, the plaintiff, who was born in the lifetime of the testatrix. There is, therefore, no question of perpetuity arising on this will, considered apart from the document on which the question principally turns. Subject to the rule against perpetuities chattels may be settled to follow the devolution of a dignity: see In re Rivett-Carnac, 33 W. R. 837, 30 Ch. D. 136.

Now, the plaintiff's claim is established: (1) If the diamonds were the property of the Dowager Ann; (2) if she had a general and unrestricted power to dispose of them by will; and (3) if she had power by will to make such a disposition of them as she has in fact made. No objection was raised to the plaintiff's claim on the ground that it was merely equitable, or that the property at law in the chattels passed to the executrix of the testatrix. The only objection raised was that by reason of a prior settlement, alleged to have been made in 1831, the dowager had no power to bequeath the diamonds to the plaintiff. We are not called upon, therefore, to consider a question which has been suggested in a learned text-book as to the effect of the Judicature Act, 1873, upon a gift of chattels by will made since that Act (see Williams' Personal Property, 11th ed., 308-310). The defendant's case rests on the letter or memorandum sent by the Dowager Ann to her solicitor in 1890. The circumstances under which, or the purpose for which, it was written are not disclosed by the evidence. It purports to be a narrative of what Mrs. Hill said when she delivered the diamonds to the dowager on the occasion of her marriage with Rowland Hill, who was Mrs. Hill's son. The marriage took place in 1831, when the dowager was sixteen years old. As the law then stood she had capacity to make a will of personal property. The memorandum is set up by the defendant as an admission by the Dowager Ann against her interest. So far as material it runs thus: "January, 1890. Relating to diamonds. The original family diamonds consisted of a necklace, earrings, and two clasps, to which were added a few more diamonds and made into a large pendant or brooch to be attached to the necklace or not at pleasure. My mother-in-law, Mrs. Hill, told me that Sir Richard Hill gave them to her without any restriction. When I married she gave them to me for my life with the request that at my death they might be left as heirlooms." The diamonds are here spoken of as family diamonds. The Sir Richard Hill referred to was the father of Mrs. Hill's husband, John Hill, who had died in 1814. Sir Richard had given these family diamonds to Mrs. Hill without any restriction. Regard being had to the argument for the defendant, it is convenient here to refer to the state of the Hill family. In 1831, General Hill, the first viscount, was living. He did not die until 1842. The dignity was limited to him and his issue male in the usual way; in default of such issue it passed to collaterals, so that on the death of the first viscount without issue male it descended to his nephew Rowland, husband of the Dowager Ann. It would seem that in 1831 there was no issue male of the first viscount living, and consequently that Rowland Hill was, at the time of his marriage, heir-presumptive to the dignity. The son of the marriage of Rowland Hill with Ann Clegg was Rowland Clegg Hill, born in 1833. On the death of his father in 1875 he became the third viscount. He is the viscount named in the will of the Dowager Ann as the person to whom the diamonds were thereby bequeathed until his death.

The defendant's counsel have buried this apparently simple document under a mass of technical learning, and by reference to the subtle equitable doctrines of precatory trusts, a special power of appointment, and implied trust in default of exercise of the power, have endeavoured to convert it into a strict settlement of some kind, the trusts whereof, as will presently appear, they are unable to state in clear or satisfactory terms. They contend that by virtue of these trusts the property in the diamonds vested absolutely in the third viscount. Mrs. Hill herself, if alive, would, I think, be much surprised at the interpretation which the defendant's counsel have put upon the words she is stated to have used. The Dowager Ann did not so understand them; in disposing of the diamonds by her will she described them as "my diamonds." Still, we must take it that the words stated were actually used by Mrs. Hill, and our task is to put a reasonable and intelligible meaning upon them.

At the outset I am struck by two things. First, this was a marriage present of jewels; it is not usual to settle such a marriage gift. Secondly, it is difficult to understand why Mrs. Hill, if she really intended to make a binding settlement, did not put it into the form of a deed, or at all events reduce it into writing, instead of leaving it to depend on the slippery testimony of human memory. But taking Mrs. Hill's words as stated, and merely changing the oblique form of narrative into the direct, they stand thus: "I give these diamonds to you for your life, with the request that at your death they may be left as heirlooms." The request was therefore made to the Dowager Ann; the word "left" imports a will, and the will was to be her will. About this there was no contest at the bar. Nor was it in contest that the effect of the gift was to pass to the Dowager Ann the absolute property at law in the chattels. There was no reservation of any kind in favour of Mrs. Hill herself; she entirely parted with the property. As the common law does not recognize such a thing as an estate in a chattel, a gift of a chattel for life accompanied by delivery passes the property at law. Starting from this point, the argument for the defendant was that in equity the Dowager Ann took a life interest in the diamonds, and that after her death there arose a precatory trust, as it is termed. The term is an awkward one, but its meaning is clear. Courts of equity have held that words, primâ facie expressive of request, entreaty, wish, hope, and the like, may be read as words of command creating a trust. It is merely a question of the construction of the particular instrument, or as here, the set of words used, taken in connection with any surrounding circumstances that may be legitimately brought into consideration. I entirely concur in the statement of the principle on which the courts now act contained in the judgment of Lindley, L.J., in In re Hamilton, 43 W. R. 577, [1895] 2 Ch. 370. He was dealing with the case of a will; it is on wills only, so far as I am aware, that these questions of precatory trust have been raised. He says that "you must take the will which you have to construe, and see what it means, and if you come to the conclusion that no trust was intended, you say so, although previous judges have said the contrary on some wills more or less similar to the one which you have to construe." In this case the term "trust" does not occur. A trust undoubtedly may be created by any apt words; but the circumstance that the well-understood and obvious term "trust" is not used seems to me to be worthy of some consideration when the question is whether a trust is or is not intended to be created.

Now, it is incumbent on those who claim that there is a trust, whether created by precatory words or otherwise, to point out with reasonable certainty who are the objects of the trust; these objects must be ascertained from the words used construed reasonably. The defendant's counsel relied on the word "request" as showing the trust, and the word "heirlooms" as defining the objects. It was said at first in a general way that the trust was for the Dowager Ann for her life, and that she had a special and restricted equitable power of appointing the chattels by will in favour of a particular person with an implied trust for the same person in default of appointment. I pressed Mr. Warmington, who is a learned conveyancer, to set out at large the terms of the supposed settlement. His answer, as I understood it, was that the dowager had a testamentary power of appointing the diamonds to her son, the third viscount, and in default of such an appointment the diamonds passed to him absolutely if at her death he was alive and entitled to the dignity in possession. With all respect to him, this was an arbitrary, narrow, and absurd settlement, and one which cannot be extracted from the words. I will deal presently with the words "as heirlooms." According to this construction the Dowager Ann had in effect no power at all; she had no voice in the disposition of the jewels; no choice or power of selection at all; it was immaterial whether she made a will or not, the third viscount, her son, was to take in either event. Of course he could not have taken under her will if he had died in her lifetime, an event which might well have happened. Dissatisfied with the settlement stated by Mr. Warmington, Mr. Powell tried his hand at drawing the settlement in extenso. He said, as I understood him, that the second viscount (who was not viscount in 1831) took for his life, and after his death the diamonds passed to his son, the third viscount; he endeavoured to connect the diamonds in some unexplained way with the descent of the dignity; but he shrank from this, for he deliberately cut out the first viscount and his issue male. He could make nothing of the supposed testamentary power, nor give any satisfactory reason for excluding the first viscount, who was living in 1831, and might have left issue male to succeed to the dignity. It was not from want of skill that the defendant's counsel failed to draw out any satisfactory or reasonable settlement by way of trust.

As reliance was placed on the words "as heirlooms," it is necessary to say a few words on the meaning and effect of the term "heirlooms." The meaning of the word standing alone, without any explanatory context in reference to chattels in gross (I am not speaking of fixtures), is the same in law as in equity. Its primary meaning is, chattels which, on the death of the ancestor, pass to the heir. These are of two classes. The first is where they pass by special custom, such as the best bed and the like. The second is where the chattels (to use the old phrase) savour of the inheritance—that is, are directly connected with it. This class includes title deeds and the chest or box where they are usually kept, the patent creating a dignity, the garter and collar of a knight, an ancient horn where the tenure is by cornage, as in the case of the Pusey horn, and the ancient jewels of the Crown. As the special custom has to be proved strictly, little or nothing is heard at the present day of the first class. For this statement of the law it is unnecessary to cite authorities. I refer, however, to Co. Litt. 18*b*, and 1 Williams on Executors, 9th ed., p. 633 et seq., in which latter work the subject is fully treated. But there is a secondary sense in which the term heirlooms is used, that is, where chattels are settled by deed or will or otherwise vesting them in trustees upon trusts declared, whereby they are limited to go along with corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments so far as the rules of law or equity will permit. This secondary sense is, speaking generally, the sense in which the term heirlooms is employed popularly and also by lawyers as a brief description. As an instance of the latter I refer to section 37 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, where the marginal note (which forms no part of the enactment) is "Heirlooms." The word itself does not occur in the text, which speaks of personal chattels settled on trust so as to devolve with land. But the chattels there settled are both at law and in equity still chattels; and as neither law nor equity knows of such a thing as an estate in a chattel or a remainder in the proper sense of those artificial terms, it follows that the chattels so settled, retaining their character of chattels, are, like any other personal property, subject to the general rule against perpetuities. Accordingly, in compliance with this rule, the property in the chattels must vest absolutely within lives in being and 21 years afterwards. Consequently, in well-drawn settlements, regard being had to another rule of law that words which create an estate tail in realty confer absolute property in personalty, a provision is usually inserted that the chattels shall not vest in an unborn person who takes an estate tail in the realty by purchase, unless he attains the age of 21 years. All these propositions are well established. I am led into stating them by the argument for the defendant. There is another proposition of law, that a man cannot change the general law, and impart to a chattel a descendible quality except in some such manner as already stated. He cannot turn a chattel into freehold land. Accordingly, if A. gives a chattel to B. and merely says that B. is to have it as an heirloom, no force (in the absence of any context or special circumstances) can be attributed to the word heirloom. Such was the opinion of Lord Hatherley in Shelley v. Shelley, 16 W. R. 1036, L. R. 6 Eq. 540, and such was the decision in In re Johnston, 32 W. R. 634, 26 Ch. D. 538.

Now, the words used by Mrs. Hill did not expressly annex the diamonds to the dignity, nor can any such intention be reasonably imputed to her in the circumstances of the case. She certainly did not mean that the Dowager Ann should bequeath them to the first viscount or his issue male. Nothing could be further from her intention in making the gift to the young girl who was or was about to become the wife of her son. To my mind it is absurd to say that she intended that the jewels should pass in any definite order or course of limitation. No such order or course can be reasonably extracted from the words used or the circumstances under which the gift was made.

The learned judge, who was called upon to decide the case on circuit, came to a conclusion in favour of the defendant. His view was that the Dowager Ann took a life interest in the diamonds with a trust to create them heirlooms as far as she could. If this be the correct view (which I think it is not) then inasmuch as the plaintiff was living at her death the gift in her will down to and including the plaintiff was not in contravention of the rule against perpetuities, and was a valid appointment in favour of the plaintiff. Where there is a power of appointment in favour of objects of whom some are within and some are without the limits allowed by the rule against perpetuities, an appointment to objects within the limits is valid.

The sum of the case appears to me to be this: The property at law vested in Ann Clegg by virtue of the gift, and I think in equity also. She was to have the use and enjoyment of them during her life, and she had the right to dispose of them by will. She was bound in honour to Mrs. Hill not to sell them or give them away by will to strangers, but to leave them as heirlooms by keeping them in the family with which she became connected by her marriage. The word "request" may in certain cases by reason of a context be sufficient to create a trust, but it would be contrary to the true meaning of Mrs. Hill to hold that any trust or other binding obligation was here created. In the circumstances of the case it would be unreasonable to suppose that Mrs. Hill by her loose and inartificial words intended to impose any trust on Ann Clegg; the request must be taken in its ordinary and natural sense and not in its extraordinary and unnatural sense of a command. No special sense can be attributed to the words "as heirlooms." What was meant in a general way was just what was said; you are to leave them as heirlooms. If those words had any force as a condition (I think they have not) then the Dowager Ann has by her will complied with the condition; she has done exactly what was intended; she has left them as heirlooms.

For these reasons I hold that the plaintiff's claim is established.

DEAN AND CHAPTER OF ST. ASAPH (Appellants) v. OVERSEERS OF THE PARISH OF LLANRHAIADR-YN-MOCHNANT AND ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF LLANFYLLIN UNION. (a.)

Poor law—Rating—Tithe rent-charge—Assessment—Deductions—Liability to repair chancel—Tenant's profits.

In assessing the rateable value of tithe rent-charge issuing from a rectory the tithe-owner is not entitled to a deduction for money expended in repairs to the chancel of the parish church.

On an appeal against an assessment of tithe rent-charge a court of quarter sessions is not justified in allowing a deduction in respect of tenant's profits unless it finds as a fact that the allowance made for expenses of collection is insufficient to cover tenant's profits.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Wills and Wright, JJ.), ante, p. 223, affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Wills and Wright, JJ.) on a special case stated by quarter sessions, ante, p. 223.

At the quarter sessions for the county of Montgomery held on the 2nd of January, 1896, an appeal by the Dean and Chapter of St. Asaph against a certain poor rate was heard, the respondents being the overseers of the parish of Llanrhaiadr-yn-Mochnant and the assessment committee of Llanfyllin Union.

The assessment committee had, in the year 1895, assessed the appellants in respect of certain tithe rent-charge at the gross estimated rental of £280 2s. 2d., and the rateable value of £233 5s., and the overseers made a rate in accordance with such assessment. The gross amount payable to the appellants in respect of the tithe rent-charge for the year 1895 was £280 2s. 2d., and the questions in the appeal related solely to the deductions which ought to be made therefrom in order to arrive at the net rateable value. The deductions made by the assessment committee were as follows: Poor rate, £30 13s. 2d.; 4 per cent. for collection, &c., £11 4s.; repairs to cathedral, £5. The court of quarter sessions allowed the deduction of £30 13s. 2d. in respect of poor rate. The court also found that a deduction should be made for: (1) Remuneration of collector; (2) legal costs and out-of-pocket expenses; (3) bad debts and irregularity in payments: (4) tenants' taxes; and with respect to these the court ordered that the amount of the deduction should be 4 per cent. off the gross estimated rental. The court also held that a further deduction should be made for tenants' profits, and that the amount of this deduction should be 1 per cent. off the gross estimated rental. The court further held that a deduction should be made in respect of the liability of the Dean and Chapter, as owners of the rectorial tithe rent-charge of the parish of Llanrhaiadr-yn-Mochnant, to repair the chancel of the parish church, and that the amount of that deduction should be 1 per cent. off the gross estimated rental. A practice to this effect was proved by evidence called before the court. The court disallowed the claim of the appellants to a deduction on account of repairs to the cathedral.

The questions for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division were whether the court of quarter sessions was right: (1) In making an allowance for tenants' profits in addition to the allowances for remuneration of collector, &c.; (2) in making an allowance in respect of any liability of the appellants to repair the chancel of the parish church. No question was raised on the special case with regard to a deduction on account of repairs to the cathedral.

The Divisional Court held that no deduction could properly be allowed, either in respect of tenants' profits, or in respect of the liability of the appellants to repair the chancel of the parish church.

The Dean and Chapter appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Macmorran, Q.C. (Stevenson S. Moore with him), for the appellants.—Tithe rent-charge is to be rated like other property, at what a tenant from year to year would give for it. The court of quarter sessions, in assessing what the hypothetical tenant would give for this tithe rent-charge, have made an allowance for expenses of collection, and they have made a further allowance for tenants' profits. The case of Goodchild v. Trustees of the Poor of St. John's Hackney, 6 W. R. 367 (reported in E. B. & E. 1 under the name of Hackney and Lamberhurst Tithe Commutation Rent-Charges), shows that the question whether such further allowance should be made is to be treated in each case as a question of fact: See also Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Overseers of Liverpool, 22 W. R. 184, L. R. 9 Q. B. 84. The quarter sessions having decided this question of fact in our favour, the burden is on the other side to show that their decision is wrong. As to the other point, in assessing tithe rent-charge the deductions ought to include sums paid for ecclesiastical dues. The repair of the chancel of the parish church is a charge on the profits of the benefice, and this liability is on the same footing as ecclesiastical dues.

Marshall, Q.C., and Ellis J. Griffith, for the respondents.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—Our decision in this case leaves untouched both the case of Goodchild v. Trustees of the Poor of St. John's, Hackney, and the case of Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Overseers of Liverpool. We must look at the facts before us to see what the hypothetical tenant of this tithe rent-charge would get. The court of quarter sessions rightly made certain deductions from the gross amount. They then proceeded to make further deductions. It seems to me that in allowing a deduction for tenants' profits they made a mistake in law. The special case does not contain any facts to justify them in allowing such a deduction. In my opinion, therefore, there is nothing to support the making of this deduction, and it must be disallowed. So also as to the deduction on account of the repairs to the chancel of the parish church. The hypothetical tenant could have nothing to do with such repairs; he could never be charged with them or have to pay for them. There is, therefore, no ground in fact for making this deduction either. The judgment of the Divisional Court is right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—We are dealing here with tithe rent-charge, which is no doubt to be rated in the same manner as other property. In my opinion a deduction might properly be made in some cases in respect of tenants' profits, but only where the court of quarter sessions found that the amount allowed for expenses of collection was not sufficient. An allowance of 4 per cent. had already been deducted in respect of the expenses of collection, which as I think must have included something for tenants' profits. The quarter sessions then went on to deduct another 1 per cent. for tenants' profits, but they have not found that the amount allowed for collection was insufficient. I think they mistook the meaning of the authorities as laying it down that after an allowance has been made for expenses of collection, even though that included tenants' profits, a further deduction may then be made under the heading of tenants' profits. The deduction asked for on this account must therefore be disallowed. With regard to the deduction on account of repairs to the chancel of the parish church, the tithe rent-charge and the chancel are distinct and separate hereditaments. The hypothetical tenant of the tithe rent-charge is not hypothetical tenant of the chancel. No deduction therefore ought properly to be made on either ground, and the judgment of the Divisional Court must be affirmed.

CHITTY, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

HUMPHREYS v. GADSDEN. (a.)

Will—Construction—Hotchpot clause.

Where a testator declares that a sum of money settled by him on a child's marriage shall be taken in or towards satisfaction of the share in the testator's residuary estate bequeathed to such child, and shall be brought into hotchpot and accounted for accordingly, any reversionary interest which the testator may have reserved to himself under the trusts of the settlement in such sum of money, will by the conjoint effect of the gift of residue and the hotchpot clause, pass to the child.

C., on the marriage of his son R. in 1885, covenanted with the trustees of R.'s marriage settlement to pay to them within six months of his death £10,000, upon trust to invest and pay the income to R. for his life, remainder to the wife of R. for her life if she should survive him, remainder for the issue of the marriage, and in default of issue the ultimate trust was for C. absolutely. C. died in 1886, having by his will given his residuary estate equally between his son R. and his daughter L. C. directed that any sum of money which he had already covenanted or agreed to give to any child of his on his or her marriage should be taken in or towards satisfaction of the share of such child, and should be brought into hotchpot and accounted for accordingly. After C.'s death his executors paid to the trustees of R.'s settlement a sum of £10,000, and divided the residue of the estate equally between R. and L., counting in such division the £10,000 as part of R.'s share. R. died in 1894, leaving a widow and no issue. By reason of the failure of issue, L. claimed to be entitled to one moiety of the £10,000 (subject to the life interest of R.'s widow) as part of C.'s estate.

Held, reversing the decision of Chitty, J., that the executors of R. were entitled to the whole of the £10,000.

Appeal of the plaintiffs from a decision of Chitty, J., on the true construction of a hotchpot clause in common form.

The testator, Robert Arnold Cosier, on the marriage of his son Robert Watson Cosier in 1885, covenanted with the trustees of his son's settlement to pay to them within six months of his death a sum of £10,000, to be held upon trust for the son for his life, and after his death for his wife for her life, if she should survive him, with remainder for the children of the marriage, and in default of issue the ultimate trust was for the testator absolutely. By his will dated the 10th of November, 1886, the testator gave his residuary estate equally between his son, the said Robert Watson Cosier, and his daughter Lucy Elizabeth Wheeler, the daughter's share being settled. The will contained the following proviso: "Provided also, and I declare that any and all sums of money, annuities, or annual sums, and property which I have already covenanted or agreed to give, or which I may hereafter covenant or agree to give to or with any child of mine on his or her marriage shall in default of any direction to the contrary in writing under my hand be taken in or towards satisfaction of the respective share of such child . . . and shall be brought into hotchpot and accounted for accordingly." The testator died on the 10th of December, 1886, and his will was duly proved by the executors therein named. After his death the executors of the testator paid a sum of £10,000 to the trustees of the son's settlement, and divided the residue of the estate equally between the son and daughter, counting in such division the said sum of £10,000 as part of the son's share in the division.

Robert Watson Cosier died on the 23rd of June, 1894, leaving a widow and no issue, and having appointed the plaintiffs in the action executors of his will. By reason of the failure of issue of Robert Watson Cosier, the defendants the daughter Mrs. Wheeler and her children, claimed to be entitled (subject to the life interest of Mrs. Cosier) to one moiety of the said sum of £10,000 as part of the original testator's estate. The plaintiffs claimed to be entitled to the whole of the sum (subject to the son's widow's life interest) as executors of the will of Robert Watson Cosier.

Chitty, J., held that the daughter was entitled to half the fund, subject to the life interest of the son's widow.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Levett, Q.C., and Edward Ford, for the appellants.

Farwell, Q.C., and J. G. Wood, for the respondents.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 16.—LINDLEY, L.J.—Chitty, J., has decided in favour of the daughter's contention. The learned judge says that the result is unexpected, but he has held it to be the result of the true construction of the hotchpot clause. I confess I cannot agree with him. The hotchpot clause is in the usual form; and, whether it be looked at broadly, without minutely criticizing the words in which it is expressed, or narrowly, with a minute criticism of them, the result appears to me to be the same, and to be quite different from that arrived at by the learned judge. The object of every hotchpot clause is simply to prevent a person to whom a testator has left a share of his estate, and who has been advanced in the testator's lifetime, from obtaining by the combined effect of the bequest and the advance, more of the testator's property than the testator intended the legatee should have. But the effect of the order appealed from goes far beyond this: its effect is to deprive the son of £5,000, part of the one-half of what the father clearly intended the son to have, and to give that £5,000 to the daughter, in addition to the sum which puts her on an equality with her brother. A construction of a hotchpot clause which brings about such a result as that, is to say the least of it, very startling, and renders a close examination of the words in which it is expressed necessary, before being driven to accept so very strange a result.

I turn to the words, and I agree with the counsel for the respondents that they have to be applied to the £10,000 which the testator covenated to pay to the trustees of the son's marriage settlement upon the trusts thereby declared. The ultimate trust in default of children of the marriage was for the testator himself. The testator had a contingent reversionary interest in this sum, which he could dispose of by his will and leave to his son if he chose. Having given one-half of his residuary estate, including this reversion, to his son, the testator says this sum of £10,000 is to be taken in or towards satisfaction of the share of the son under the will, and shall be brought into hotchpot and accounted for accordingly. I pause to inquire, Who is to take this sum? Who is to bring it into hotchpot, and who is to account for it? The answer can only be—the son. It cannot be the trustees, for they are creditors—they take nothing under the will, and are not in a position to take the £10,000 in satisfaction of anything under the will, nor to bring that sum into hotchpot and account for it accordingly. But if a testator having an interest in a sum of money directs a legatee of a share of residue to take that sum on account of such share, and the legatee does so, as the son did here, the whole sum is taken out of the testator's estate, and, so far as the testator is concerned, that sum ceases to be part of his estate and becomes part of what is given to the son. The sum so given is no longer the testator's, and can only come back to him by gift or purchase from the son. It was contended that this is to render a hotchpot clause operative as a gift, which is not its function. But this is only a half-truth, and is very misleading. A hotchpot clause in a will has always to be construed with some other clause which is a clause of gift, and the question always is, What is the true effect of the clause of gift and of the hotchpot clause which has to be construed with it. The combined effect of the two clauses is always, so far as I know, to pass to the legatee of what is given, the testator's interest, if any, in what is to be brought into hotchpot. Take the very common case put by my brother Rigby in the course of the argument. Suppose a father lends his son £1,000, and then bequeaths to him a share of his residuary estate and directs the £1,000 to be brought into hotchpot. What is this but a gift to the son of the £1,000 as part of the share given to the son?

It was also urged that the hotchpot clause is only a direction to bring into account, a direction as to how the accounts are to be made up by the executors or trustees of the will. But accounts are of no use except so far as they represent realities; and the reality to be represented is that the whole £10,000 is given by the testator to the son as part of his share of the residuary estate. What is so given includes all that the testator could give—i.e., the whole of his contingent reversionary interest in the sum in question. If the trustees of the will had not deducted the whole £10,000 from the son's share when they divided the residue they would have paid him too much and there would be a mistake to rectify. But like business men they very properly did deduct the whole sum from his share when they divided the residue, and as between the testator's estate and the son the whole of the £10,000 then became the son's property and he had nothing more to account for and the ultimate trust in the settlement ceased to be a trust for the testator and became by virtue of his will a trust for the son, his executors, administrators, or assigns. In my opinion the order appealed from is wrong and must be discharged, and it must be declared that the plaintiffs, as executors of the son, are entitled to the £10,000 subject to the life interest of the son's widow therein. The costs of the summons and of the appeal ought to be paid by the respondents, the Wheelers.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I have had an opportunity of reading the judgment of Lindley, L.J., and I agree with it.

RIGBY, L.J.—In this case I am unable to agree with the conclusion arrived at by the learned judge in the court below. Arguments have been pressed upon us on the supposition that the primary meaning of the clause referred to as the hotchpot clause is opposed to the appellants' contention. As, however, in my judgment the appellants' case is based upon and justified by the primary meaning of the clause it seems to me quite unnecessary to refer to those arguments. The respondents' case seems to me to rest entirely upon the assertion, the mere assertion, for I heard no reason and confessedly there is no authority to justify it, that the important words "shall be taken in or towards satisfaction" cannot be words of gift but must be construed as meaning, "shall for the purpose of calculation only and not by way of bounty or gift be taken in or towards satisfaction." I see no sort of justification for modifying the phrase under consideration in so vital a manner. If the respondents' counsel had confined themselves to the statement that there may be and often are cases in which similar words in hotchpot clauses can have no greater operation than that to which they claim to confine them in the present case, that statement would, I think, have been correct, but it would not have assisted them in the least. The limited operation of the words in such cases arises not from any change in the meaning of the words, but from the want of disposing power in the testator over the subject-matter. It is not only with reference to hotchpot clauses that such cases arise. The plainest words of gift wherever they occur can operate directly only to the extent of the testator's power to give, though they may have an important indirect operation as in raising a case of election. When a testator gives a direction that a particular thing shall be taken by any one in or towards satisfaction of his share, and the thing spoken of exists and belongs to the testator, I cannot doubt that according to the plain and obvious meaning he gives that thing and this plain meaning is not controlled, or varied, but rather corroborated by adding such words as "and shall be brought into hotchpot and accounted for accordingly." If and so far as the testator cannot give, the words of gift must be inoperative in their primary meaning, though they may have a secondary meaning. Suppose a testator to have given money by way of bounty, say, for the education of a child. The money is spent and gone, the child is in no way liable to repay it, and it is impossible to make it the subject of a gift. Suppose, however, that the testator has lent a child money, say £10,000, instead of giving it, and has, to make the transaction clear, taken a bond for repayment. Or suppose again that he has lent the money to a stranger on mortgage. If the testator say, I declare that the money spent by me on my son's education shall be taken in or towards satisfaction of his share, it is plain that as to that particular subject there can be no gift. In each of the other cases the £10,000 is an existing asset, available for payment of creditors, but, subject to the claims of creditors, entirely at the testator's disposal. If then he say, I declare that the £10,000 owing to me on bond by my son, or the £10,000 lent by me on mortgage to A., shall be taken in or toward satisfaction of my son's share, in my judgment it would be repugnant to common-sense to say that the son was not released from the debt in the first case, and made the owner of the mortgage debt in the second. This is the same thing as saying that the words operate as words of gift. These are the extreme cases, but there are, of course, intermediate cases, of which the present is one—where the testator can dispose of part, but part only, of the subject-matter. The true rule must be, that so far as the words can operate as words of gift—that is, according to their primary meaning—they must do so. In this particular case, if it had been necessary in order to avoid inequality where equality was presumably intended, I should have been disposed to accept Mr. Levett's argument—that by the words "sums of money which I have covenanted to give" the testator must have meant sums of money which I have covenanted to give effectually—that is, so as to take them out of my estate. Certainly I could not treat the word "give" in such a context as being satisfied by payment to trustees who are to take no beneficial interest for themselves. I prefer, however, to take what seems to me the literal meaning of the first part of the hotchpot clause, and to follow the learned judge in treating the words as including the whole sum of £10,000 mentioned in the marriage settlement. The operative words will then run thus: "I declare that the £10,000 referred to in my son's settlement shall be taken in or towards satisfaction of his share." The words cannot operate so as to take away the wife's life interest, nor, if there had been issue, could they have modified their interest. But, to the extent of the testator's own interest, whatever it might turn out to be, they will operate according to what, in my judgment, I repeat is their primary meaning. The appeal therefore ought to succeed.

Appeal allowed.

BELL v. BALLS. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Contract for sale of land—Sale by auction—Authority of auctioneer or his clerk to sign memorandum on behalf of purchaser—Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3), s. 4.

Upon a sale by auction the clerk to the auctioneer has no implied authority to sign on behalf of a purchaser a memorandum of the contract within the Statute of Frauds.

The implied authority of an auctioneer to sign such a memorandum on behalf of a purchaser does not extend to authorize the auctioneer to sign such a memorandum seven days after the sale by auction.

Semble, the auctioneer's authority merely enables him to sign at the sale.

This was an action for the specific performance of a contract to buy certain freehold land, and raised questions as to the authority of an auctioneer or of the clerk to an auctioneer to sign a memorandum of a contract for sale as agent for the purchaser.

The following statement of the facts is taken from the judgment of Stirling, J.:

The action was by the plaintiffs as vendors of certain freehold property known as "The Riddings," No. 72, Tulse-hill, for specific performance of an alleged agreement by the defendant to purchase the same. The plaintiffs caused the property in question to be put up for sale by auction by Messrs. Herring, Son, & Daw, a firm of auctioneers, at the Mart, Tokenhouse-yard, on the 25th of November, 1895, upon the terms expressed in printed particulars and conditions of sale, at the end of which was a memorandum of agreement in blank. The defendant, in company with a friend, named Wyatt, attended the sale. Upon Mr. Daw, a member of the above-named firm of auctioneers, entering the room a short conversation took place with reference to "The Riddings" between him and the defendant, who was known to him personally, and just before he entered the rostrum he asked the defendant to "give him a bid." The sale was then begun of five different properties, among which "The Riddings" came third. The reserve price was £1,600. The defendant bid £1,550, and after communications had passed between Mr. Daw and the vendors, the property was knocked down to the defendant at that price. The sale of the two remaining properties was then proceeded with, and at the close the defendant left the room. Upon the auctioneer's clerk calling Mr. Daw's attention to the circumstance that the defendant had not signed the memorandum of agreement, a messenger was sent after him, and he returned. He was then asked by Mr. Daw to sign the memorandum, but refused, on the ground that he made the bid for Mr. Daw in compliance with his request, and not for himself. The auctioneer's clerk had, in the meantime, filled up the memorandum of agreement on a copy of the printed particulars and conditions of sale in the appropriate manner. The memorandum, as filled up, ran as follows:—

"I, George Balls, of Brixton-hill, S.W., do hereby acknowledge that I have this day purchased the property described in the within particulars of sale for the sum of one thousand five hundred and fifty pounds, and having paid into the hands of Messrs. Herring, Son, & Daw, the auctioneers, the sum of one hundred and fifty-five pounds as a deposit and in part payment of the purchase-money, I hereby agree and bind myself, my heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, to pay the balance of the said purchase-money and complete the said purchase in all respects according to the within conditions of sale. As witness my hand this 25th day of November, 1895."

Then followed a recapitulation in figures of the amount of the purchase-money, the deposit and balance owing, and the document concluded with these words: "As agents for the vendors, Peter Bell and William Dickson, we hereby ratify this sale, and as auctioneers acknowledge to have received the deposit. Abstract to be sent to ——." This memorandum was not signed either by the auctioneer or his clerk. A week later, however, on the 2nd of December, 1895, Mr. Daw, at the instance of the vendors, filled up and signed, in the name of his firm and as agent for the defendant, another copy of the memorandum, striking out, however, all reference to the deposit, which, of course, had not been paid. The defendant persisted in his refusal to complete the purchase, and the action was brought to compel him to do so, the plaintiffs relying upon both the above-mentioned documents as memoranda of the sale sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the Statute of Frauds.

Grosvenor Woods, Q.C., and Ingpen, for the plaintiff.—The purchaser is bound by the statement of the auctioneer's clerk made in his presence, and there is a sufficient signature on behalf of the purchaser to satisfy the Statute of Frauds if the clerk writes down the name of the purchaser in his presence: Sims v. Landray, 42 W. R. 621, [1894] 2 Ch. 318; Fry on Specific Performance, 3rd ed., s. 531. We submit that the inference from the cases is that the purchaser authorizes whoever appears at the auction to act on behalf of the auctioneer for the purpose of taking down the names of the parties, and that it is not a personal authority given to the auctioneer: De Bussche v. Alt, 8 Ch. D. 286, at p. 310, 26 W. R. Dig. 192. In sales by auction the auctioneer's clerk who is employed in taking down the names of the purchasers is just as much the agent of the purchaser as the auctioneer himself. They also referred on this point to Henderson v. Barnewall, 1 Y. & Jer. 387; Bird v. Boulter, 4 B. & Ad. 443; Peirce v. Corf, 22 W. R. 299, L. R. 9 Q. B. 210; McMullen v. Helberg, 4 L. R. Ir. 94, at pp. 105, 121, 29 W. R. Dig. 86; Dyas v. Stafford, 7 L. R. Ir. 590; Sugden on Vendors and Purchasers, p. 147. As to the question whether the later memorandum signed by the auctioneer is binding, we admit that after the sale the auctioneer could perform no new act so as to bind the purchaser to any other bargain than that concluded; but why should the purchaser be able to revoke the bargain made? The auctioneer is not bound to sign on the day of the sale. If the auctioneer is unable to sign on the day of the sale, is the vendor to be at the mercy of the purchaser. They referred on this point to Day v. Wells, 9 W. R. 857, 30 Beav. 220; Dart on Vendors and Purchasers, 6th ed., p. 209; and contended on the authority of Tamplin v. James, 29 W. R. 311, 15 Ch. D. 215, that even if the defendant bid under a mistake he could not resist specific performance.

Hastings, Q.C., and Stallard, for the defendant.—The defendant made the bidding under a mistake of fact: and in any event we contend that the contract is not binding on him. An auctioneer's clerk, as such, has no authority to sign a memorandum so as to bind a purchaser: Peirce v. Corf; he must have express authority in that behalf: Bird v. Boulter; Coles v. Trecothick, 9 Ves. 234; and the defendant gave him no such authority. As to the second memorandum it was not signed until long after the auction was over, and after the auctioneer's authority had ceased, it is therefore invalid: Mews v. Carr, 1 H. & N. 484, 5 W. R. C. L. Dig. 180; Buckmaster v. Harrop, 13 Ves. 456. The defendant had, in fact, at that time revoked whatever authority the auctioneer had ever had.

Grosvenor Woods, Q.C., replied.

STIRLING, J., stated the facts, and continued:—The first question is one of fact—namely, whether the defendant really bid for the property, as he alleges, in the belief that he was bidding for Mr. Daw, or, in other words, acting as a puffer at the sale. His story is a strange one, but having seen the defendant and his friend in the box and heard their evidence, I am bound to say that I believe that the defendant did act under the belief that he alleges. On the other hand I am of opinion that the defendant had no reasonable ground for so acting, and that what passed between him and Mr. Daw as told by himself ought not to have misled him into the belief which he entertained. Under these circumstances what is the legal result. It seems to me that, assuming a memorandum to exist which satisfies the requirements of the Statute of Frauds, there was a valid contract between the plaintiff and defendant, and the mistake at most constitutes a defence only so far as the action seeks specific performance, and, as was laid down by the Court of Appeal in Tamplin v. James, the court is now bound in such a case to consider the question of damages.

The validity of the second line of defence must therefore be considered. First, with reference to the memorandum filled up by the auctioneer's clerk. It has been decided that, upon a sale by auction, the auctioneer is the agent of the purchaser as well as the seller, and has authority to sign a memorandum of the sale so as to bind both parties, and if the memorandum or a copy of the particulars had been filled up by the auctioneer with his own hand in the same way as the memorandum now in question was filled up by the clerk it would have been sufficient. An agent, however, cannot delegate his authority. The law as to that in the case of an auctioneer and his clerk is laid down in Peirce v. Corf, where Blackburn, J., said: "I take it as quite clear that the auctioneer's clerk has no authority to sign by the general custom, although, as Bird v. Boulter decided, there may be special circumstances to show that the auctioneer's clerk had authority to sign. Where the bidder—that is, the person to be charged—by word or sign, authorizes the auctioneer's clerk to sign on his behalf, he makes him his agent to sign, although by the general custom the auctioneer's clerk would not be the bidder's agent." In the present case the defendant did not by word or sign or otherwise authorize the auctioneer's clerk to sign on his behalf, and the case of Bird v. Boulter has no application.

It was, however, urged the exigencies of the case require that on sales by auction at the present day the auctioneer's clerk sitting publicly beside him should be held to be authorized to sign memoranda on behalf of purchasers.

The ordinary practice at the present time with reference to sales of real estate was stated by Mr. Daw, the plaintiff's own witness, to be that an auctioneer, after he has knocked down a particular lot proceeds with the sale of the following lots and leaves it to the clerk to find out the name of the purchaser and to prepare a record of the contract, which he does by filling up the memoranda appended to two copies of the particulars of sale, one for signature by the purchaser, the other for signature by the auctioneer on behalf the vendor. Some convenience no doubt attends such a practice, and I do not desire to question its validity, but the mere statement of it appears to me to show that there is no ground for the contention that the exigencies of the case require that the auctioneer should be held entitled to delegate his authority to his clerk.

The practice contemplates that one part of the memorandum should be signed by the auctioneer, and if this is consistent with the requirements of business why should not the signature of the other by him be also consistent with such requirements. I say this quite irrespective of what was urged in argument, that there was no difficulty in the auctioneer writing down at the time the name of the purchaser on a copy of the particulars and conditions of sale, which was held to be sufficient in White v. Proctor, 4 Taunt. 209; and Kemeys v. Proctor, 3 V. & B. 57, 1 J. & W. 350.

I therefore come to the conclusion that the memorandum filled in by the clerk did not satisfy the requirements of the Statute of Frauds.

Secondly, as to the memorandum signed by the auctioneer on the 2nd of December, 1895. It was contended that at the time when the auctioneer signed it he had no authority so to do—first, because the authority conferred by the purchaser on the auctioneer at the time of the sale had expired long before the 2nd of December, 1895, or at all events at that date; and secondly, because the purchaser had actually revoked whatever authority could be exercised at that date. This renders it necessary for me to consider on what principles the auctioneer is held to be authorized by a purchaser to sign a memorandum of the contract. This was first established in Emmerson v. Heelis, 2 Taunt. 38. There Lord Mansfield says (p. 48): "By what authority does he (the auctioneer) write down the purchaser's name? By the authority of the purchaser. These persons bid and announce their biddings loudly and particularly enough to be heard by the auctioneer. For what purpose do they do this? That he may write down their names opposite to the lots. Therefore he writes the name by the authority of the purchaser, and he is an agent for the purchaser; and it does seem therefore that this is a contract signed by an agent for the purchaser, and consequently is binding." In Earl of Glengal v. Barnard, 1 Keen 769, Lord Langdale thus explains that decision (p. 788): "The nature of the proceeding by auction, the bidding for the purpose of making the purchase, the necessity of making a statement of the bidding, the direction to the auctioneer to write down the bidding, which is perhaps involved in the very process of bidding, and some other circumstances afford intelligible ground for the decision in Emmerson v. Heelis and the approbation which has since been bestowed upon it." These cases appear to show that the authority which the purchaser confers upon the auctioneer is an authority to write down the bidding—that is to say, to make a minute or record of it at the time and as part of the transaction, and such a record is held to be a memorandum sufficient to satisfy the statute. I do not consider that the nature of the proceedings justifies the implication of an authority to make a memorandum except at a time when the writing down can fairly be held to be a part of the transaction. If the auctioneer were allowed to record the biddings at a later time, evils might arise similar to those which the Statute of Frauds was intended to prevent.

In Mews v. Carr it is pointed out that the parties cannot set up a custom of trade to repeal the Statute of Frauds, and in Buckmaster v. Harrop, 13 Ves. 456, this very point was raised, and at p. 473 the Lord Chancellor says: "The only evidence that I can receive is the written memorandum itself, unless it is lost; and it must be a contemporary memorandum." The Lord Chancellor, therefore, says that the memorandum must be contemporaneous, and by that I understand one made at the time and as part of the transaction. If the auctioneer in the present case had proceeded to sign a memorandum immediately on the conclusion of the auction, I should have been slow to hold that to have been beyond his power; but I think that the memorandum of the 2nd of December, 1895, was signed at a time when the auctioneer's authority had ceased. It is, therefore, unnecessary for me to consider the question whether the purchaser could revoke the authority conferred by him on the auctioneer. I content myself by saying, with Lord Romilly in Day v. Wells, 9 W. R. 857, 30 Beav., at p. 224, that "I do not affirm any such proposition as this, that a person, having given an unlimited authority to an auctioneer, may, when dissatisfied with the price at which the property is sold, revoke his authority. That is not my opinion at all." The result, therefore, is that this action fails, and must be dismissed, with costs.

DERBISHIRE v. MONTAGU. (a.)

Settled land—Jurisdiction—London leaseholds—Infant—Pulling down and rebuilding houses—Mortgage of settled land.

Where land is settled in favour of infants the court has no jurisdiction to sanction the raising of money by mortgage of the settled land for the purpose of pulling down and rebuilding houses thereon, although the value of the settled land would greatly be increased thereby.

Summons.

This was a summons taken out by Eliza Derbishire and Charles Edward Cree, trustees of an indenture of resettlement made the 14th of December, 1872, for the determination of the following questions:

(a.) Reported by C. C. HENSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1. Whether, in the opinion of the court, it would be for the benefit of the infant defendants, and any unborn children of the defendant Philip Montagu, that the messuages known as Nos. 82, 83, and 82A, Grosvenor-street, and No. 130, New Bond-street, in the parish of St. George's, Hanover-square, in the county of Middlesex (being part of the property held upon the trusts of the above-mentioned indenture), should be taken down and rebuilt in accordance with a proposed scheme at a cost of not more than £8,500 to be raised by a mortgage of the property held upon the trusts of the indenture, or upon some part of such property.

2. Whether the plaintiffs were at liberty to raise the sum (not exceeding £8,500) required for the purpose of such taking down and rebuilding by a mortgage of the whole or a part of the property comprised in the indenture.

It was proposed to pull down the whole of the premises, which occupied a commanding corner site and were old and out of date, and to build first-class shops fitted up in accordance with modern requirements, and experts estimated that by so doing the value of the property would, by the expenditure of £8,000, be increased from £19,000 to at least £32,000. The defendants were Philip Montagu, the tenant for life, and Evelyn Maud Montagu, his wife, and their two children, Vera Evelyn Mary Montagu and Mary Catherine Jean Montagu, both of whom were infants and interested in remainder.

By the indenture of the 14th of December, 1872, it was declared that the trustees or trustee thereof should stand and be seized and possessed of the property in question in trust, in the events which happened, to pay the rents and profits to Philip Montagu or his assigns during his life, and from and after his decease in trust for his children as he should by deed or will appoint, and in default of such appointment in trust for his children in equal shares as tenants in common. It was also provided that Philip Montagu might by deed or will appoint an annuity of £200 to his widow. The indenture contained a power for the trustees to sell, and a power to demise until sale, the premises in manner therein mentioned. And it was declared that the trustees should from time to time, and when occasion required, obtain a renewed lease of the premises (which were held of the Corporation of London) and should for that purpose be at liberty to raise by sale or mortgage of the premises for the time being, subject to the trusts of the indenture, such sums as should be required to meet the fine or other expense of or incident to such renewal or incurred in relation thereto, including all such costs of repairing, rebuilding, or reinstating the premises as might be required for the purpose of obtaining such renewal.

The appellants were the present trustees of the indenture of the 14th of December, 1872.

Philip Montagu appointed an annuity of £200 to his wife, to take effect upon his decease.

By an indenture made the 27th of September, 1894, the premises in question were surrendered by the plaintiffs, and were redemised to them by the Corporation of London for a term of eighty years from the 25th of March, 1894.

Warrington Q.C., and B. B. Rogers, for the summons.—The question is whether the court has jurisdiction to sanction the scheme for pulling down and re-building the houses and the raising of the money for the purpose by a mortgage of the trust estate. [KEKEWICH, J.—I will assume that what is proposed is for the benefit of the estate.] There is nothing in the trust deed to prevent the trustees from acting as a prudent owner would act. The court can therefore, as they have so acted here, allow them to be repaid for what they have done, and by anticipation can allow the work to be done. In none of the cases in point has there been a trust, but where there is a trust the court can consider what the trustees may do; it is a matter of discretion. [KEKEWICH, J.—In Vyse v. Foster, 21 W. R. 207, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 309, the court insisted on an inquiry as to whether what had been done was right.] In Glover v. Barlow (reported in a note to In re Jackson, Jackson v. Talbot, 21 Ch. D. 786) the court exercised the jurisdiction because it was beneficial to the infants. Frith v. Cameron, 19 W. R. 886, L. R. 12 Eq. 169; Conway v. Fenton, 37 W. R. 156, 40 Ch. D. 512. In In re De Teissier's Settled Estates, 41 W. R. 184, 186, [1893] 1 Ch. 153, Chitty, J., points out that the decision in Conway v. Fenton depends upon the existence of jurisdiction. In re Hotchkys, 34 W. R. 569, 32 Ch. D. 408. In the case of a trust the court has jurisdiction to sanction trustees doing what a prudent owner would do.

H. E. Wright, for the tenant for life an d his wife.

T. A. Nash, for the infants.—With the exception of Glover v. Barlow, all these are cases of salvage or of re-building a mansion house in which the infant would live. Here the lease has nearly eighty years to run, and the work might easily be done under a building lease. In Glover v. Barlow the infants were absolutely entitled in possession. In In re Lord de Tabley, Leighton v. Leighton, 75 L. T. N. S. 328, Conway v. Fenton is commented on. In Hurst v. Hurst, 29 L. R. (Ir.) 219, 40 W. R. Dig. 231, the court held that it had no jurisdiction to authorize the construction of new buildings. Here the property is not even out of repair; it is only out of date. The court has no jurisdiction under the Settled Land Acts.

KEKEWICH, J., on the 16th of March delivered the following written judgment:

It is proposed to raise a large sum, say £8,500, by mortgage of the only property comprised in the settlement of the 14th of December, 1872, and to expend the money in pulling down the buildings now standing thereon and in erecting others in their place. It is admitted that this is not authorized by any provision in the settlement, and further, that it does not fall within any class of improvements sanctioned by the Settled Land Acts. In a case recently before me it was argued that the original jurisdiction of the court, whatever might be its extent and limit touching the expenditure of money on land, is ousted by the Settled Land Acts which must be deemed to have established a code beyond which the court has no power to go. That seemed to me then, and it still seems to me to be an indefensible proposition, though I recognise and respectfully concur in the opinion of Chitty, J., that those Acts must be regarded as affording a guide to the court, and as of assistance in arriving at a proper conclusion. The question, therefore, is whether, apart from those Acts there is jurisdiction to make the order asked. The trustees have properly only adduced such evidence as is necessary to prove that their proposal is reasonable, leaving all details as to the amount and manner of expenditure to be determined if and when that proposal has been sanctioned.

It may be safely concluded on the evidence that it will be to the advantage of all parties to pull down the existing buildings, and to erect in their place others of a more modern character and more appropriate to the neighbourhood, or in other words, that by the expenditure of about £8,500 the value of the property will be largely increased, both for letting and selling. It was suggested that the practical result desired—that is, the erection of new and better buildings, might be effected through the medium of a building lease, but the ordinary terms of such a lease would yield only a moderate rent for many years to come, and postpone the full enjoyment of the property for some generations. A prudent owner, having money available for the purpose of rebuilding, would, I think, so expend it, and not resort to a building lease. There is no money available, and if rebuilding is sanctioned the costs must be defrayed by means of a mortgage of the property. Similar cases having been recently before me, and especially the one above mentioned. I did not require counsel to discuss at length the many authorities touching the jurisdiction of the court respecting infant's property, and Mr. Warrington, in substance, admitted that they would not support his application. He endeavoured to support it on the ground that the court is here executing the trusts of a settlement, and that in such a case it has a larger discretion and a more general jurisdiction. Confessedly there is no case going quite as far as what is now proposed, but it was urged that there may be extracted from the authorities a principle which may be safely applied to the present circumstances, so as to justify the order asked. It becomes necessary, therefore, to examine these authorities. Somewhat reluctantly I am compelled to commence with my own case of Conway v. Fenton. In Lord de Tabley's case North, J., said he was tired of hearing that case cited, and I sympathize with him. I have more than once made the same remark. It seems to me that whether treated as an example of salvage or an adaption of the doctrine of Vyse v. Foster, that case was rightly decided. The necessity and immediate advantage of repairs were alike urgent, and the money spent was taken from a fund settled upon the same trusts as the houses repaired. I do not think that as a decision, whatever may be said of the language of the judgment, it can usefully be cited as professing to lay down any rule of law. It was commented on by Chitty, J., from this point of view in De Teissier's Settled Estates, quoted for a different purpose above. He apparently thought that such expenditure as he was asked to sanction might be sanctioned if a case of salvage were established, but holding that the circumstances did not make it a case of salvage he followed Hibbert v. Cooke, 1 Sim. & S. 552, and declined to charge the settled property with the cost of structural alterations and repairs of the mansion house. It is to be observed that there was in that case personal estate settled upon trusts corresponding with the limitations of the real estate, so that no question about raising money by mortgage of the real estate was discussed. This happened also in In re Lord de Tabley's Estates, already mentioned, where likewise it was proposed to expend part of the personal estate in permanent repairs of the mansion house. North J., declined to make the order, but followed In re De Teissier's Settled Estates, and regarded Conway v. Fenton as only sustainable, if at all, as a case of salvage. In re Hurst, before the Master of the Rolls, in Ireland, was cited as more in the applicants' favour. The judgment is instructive, and I think that all the cases cited before me were there referred to by the learned judge or by counsel. There no money was available, and it was proposed to raise the needed amount by mortgage, and this was sanctioned so far as it was absolutely necessary to put the house into tenantable repair, the precise amount required being left for consideration in chambers, according to what the learned judge styled a very moderate standard indeed. But he declined to authorize money to be raised for the construction of new buildings in the place of the old dwelling-house, which was proved to be in a dilapidated condition, on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to make any such order. Conway v. Fenton was referred to and commented on, but mainly as an authority for the proposition that what might be done in an administration action might also be done on originating summons, as I have no doubt it might. So far I have no authority in support of the present application, and, as already pointed out, In re Hurst is an authority against it. Frith v. Cameron is a case of a different character. If I could regard that case as decided on a principle, it would justify what is asked to be done here. It was proposed to pull down the mansion house and expend £5,000 in building a new one, and to raise that £5,000 by mortgage of the settled property. There was some evidence that the value of the estate charged with the £5,000, but with a residential house upon it, would be as great as or greater than the estate without a house, and apparently the then existing house was worthless. The question of jurisdiction was raised and to some extent argued, and Hibbert v. Cooke was cited, but I doubt whether the opposition was serious, and the Vice-Chancellor, in making the order under the general jurisdiction of the court, justified it as being for the benefit of all parties under the peculiar circumstances of the case. There is no exposition of principle, no examination of authorities, and I think that it would be unsafe and unwise to treat the case as an authority for the jurisdiction purported to be exercised unless it can be seen to be consistent with, if not supported by, other authorities. Glover v. Barlow is another case where the court authorized in an administration suit the mortgage of settled property and sanctioned expenditure of money thus obtained, on repairs. It appears that among other things rebuilding was proposed, and the inquiry directed by the decree was what rebuilding and repairs were necessary and proper to be done. The master's report says nothing about rebuilding, and it appears that out of the money proposed to be raised by mortgage, only £500, or about one-seventh of the whole, was ultimately directed to be expended in repairs. So far as the final order in Glover v. Barlow sanctioned expenditure on repairs, it must, I think, be taken to be a case of salvage, and so far as it did not sanction expenditure on rebuilding, it is, of course, of no value to the applicants. The only other case which I might mention is Re Hotchkys. Much learning is to be found in the judgments and particularly in that of Cotton, L.J., respecting the duty of trustees to keep property in repair, and to provide for the incidence of the burden in proper proportions upon the tenant for life and remainderman, but I have been unable to find anything directly bearing on the question what ought to be done when rebuilding and not repair is under consideration.

My conclusion from all these authorities is, that, whatever the court may have from time to time done in cases of salvage, or whatever may have been done without full consideration of the question of jurisdiction, the court has never asserted a jurisdiction to spend settled money in pulling down and rebuilding houses. Indeed the cases cited and some others, including Drake v. Trefusis, which there is no occasion to mention, all in my judgment tend to show that the jurisdiction does not exist, and that I believe is the sound view. It is part of my duty to expound the jurisdiction of the court, and this I have endeavoured to do. It is no part of my duty to expand it. I must therefore decline to make any order on the present application.

DUNCAN v. DOWDING AND OTHERS. (a.)

Licensing law — Constable demanding admission to licensed premises—Private room—Refusal by keeper of licensed premises—Licensing Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 16.

Section 16 of the Licensing Act, 1874, does not give a police-constable power to demand admission to a private room upon licensed premises, unless some reason is shown for supposing that violations of the Act are being, or are about to be, committed.

Case stated by the Recorder of Bristol.

The appellant was convicted under section 16 of the Licensing Act, 1874, for refusing to admit the respondent Dowding, a police-constable, demanding to enter on certain licensed premises.

The appellant was the keeper of certain fully-licensed premises in Bond-street, Bristol, known as the "Brandy Cask." One of the rooms in the premises was let, under an agreement, on every Thursday evening from 8 p.m. till closing time, at a rent of 13s. a quarter, to the Clarence and Colston Lodge of the Royal Antidiluvian Order of Buffaloes. The Order of Buffaloes is a secret society, and none but members are admitted to their meetings. The Clarence and Colston Lodge were accustomed to hold their meetings in the room hired by them in the "Brandy Cask." Liquor was served to the members during the meetings. The appellant was a member of the lodge.

On the 23rd of April the lodge were holding their usual meeting when the respondent Dowding, hearing the sound of music and singing proceeding from the room, entered the house and demanded to enter the room. He was refused admission, and the appellant made no effort to procure admission for him. The respondent, Dowding, had no reason to suppose that anyone in the room was drunk. Before the recorder he said that his object in demanding admission was to prevent and detect violations of the Licensing Acts, which it was his duty to enforce.

Section 16 provides: "Any constable may for the purposes of preventing or detecting the violation of any of the provisions of the principal Act or this Act, which it is his duty to enforce, at all times enter on any licensed premises, or any premises in respect of which an occasional licence is in force. Every person who, by himself, or by any person in his employ, or acting by his direction or with his consent, refuses or fails to admit any constable in the execution of his duty demanding to enter in pursuance of this section, shall be liable to" the penalties therein prescribed.

Candy, Q.C., and Lionel Maddison, for the appellant.—Section 16 of the Act of 1874 was in substitution of section 35 of the Act of 1872. Section 35 gave the constable very wide powers which the later Act was intended to curtail. The police-constable did not demand admission for the purpose of preventing and detecting violations of the law. Therefore the appellant's refusal to admit him was not an offence against the Act. The room was a private one, and for that reason the appellant could not be convicted of refusing admission to it.

Vachell, for the respondents.—The power to enter the licensed premises includes power to enter any room in the premises. The letting of the room to the lodge did not take it out of the section.

CAVE, J.—It is said that the constable had power to demand admission to all parts of the licensed premises at any time and in all circumstances. I am prepared to hold that he has power to demand admission for certain purposes, but there must be some evidence that what was alleged to exist did, or was about to exist. If, for instance, on previous occasions members of the club had been known to leave the premises intoxicated, there would have been some ground for supposing that an undue consumption of liquor took place. As to the question whether when a private room is in the occupation of a guest you can convict the licence holder because the guest refuses admission, I should like to hear further arguments before deciding it. It is sufficient to say here that there is no evidence of any kind that there was reason to suppose that violations of the law were taking place or were about to take place. All the constable went on was that he heard the sound of music and singing. That was a thing that often happened in a private room of licensed premises. To say that, because a party of persons were enjoying themselves and beguiling the monotony of staying at an inn with a song, a police-constable could demand admission to the room and, I suppose, to stay there, would be monstrous. Again, it would be a strong thing to say that a licence-holder can be convicted for refusing to admit a police-constable into a private room when it is no longer under his control.

But it is not necessary to go into these questions, because the recorder held that if the police constable demanded admission for the purpose of detecting or preventing violation of the Acts, that was enough. I am of opinion that it is not enough. There must be reasonable grounds for interfering on the licensed premises. There was nothing to prevent access to the public parts of the house, but the case of the private rooms was different. It was not likely that it was intended to entrust a delicate mission like that to a police-constable unless there was some ground for him to go upon. No such ground was before the recorder. All he says is, not that there was reasonable cause for entering, but that the respondent wished to enter for preventing and detecting violations of the law.

This decision is not intended to give colour to the proposition that persons may indulge without interference in excessive drinking in a private room of a public-house. If there is ground for supposing that such drinking is going on, there is power for a police-constable to go beyond the public parts.

Exchange Act, 1882, notwithstanding that the account of the customer was overdrawn at the time when the cheque was paid in.

Appeal from the decision of His Honour Judge Emden.

The plaintiff was the owner of a crossed cheque for £43 6s. payable to his order.

One, Fisher, forged the endorsement, and paid the cheque into his account at the defendant bank, where the amount was at once placed to his credit. Fisher's account was at that time overdrawn to the amount of £13 9s., and the cheque was partly applied to the payment of the overdraft. Before the cheque was cleared Fisher's draft for £5 8s. was honoured.

The plaintiff brought an action in the county court to recover from the defendant bank the proceeds of the cheque.

The action was dismissed upon the ground that the bank were protected by section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, and that they had not been guilty of negligence.

Section 82 provides: "Where a banker, in good faith and without negligence, receives payment for a customer of a cheque crossed generally or specially to himself, and the customer has no title thereto, the banker shall not incur any liability to the true owner of the cheque by reason only of having received such payment."

Morton Smith, for the appellant.—The banker is not protected by the section where the account for which the payment is received is not in funds: Mathiessen v. London and County Bank, 27 W. R. 838, 5 C. P. D., at p. 17.

Cock, Q.C. (Guy Lushington with him), for the respondents.—The cheque was paid in by a customer, and was received bonâ fide. The bank were entitled to be protected.

CAVE, J.—The fact that the cheque was applied in the payment of an overdraft could make no difference to the true owner. There is no liability attached to receiving payment of a cheque for a customer, and it is nothing to do with the case that the proceeds were used in paying the overdraft. If the receipt of payment for the customer is not to make the banker liable when the customer's account is in funds, why should it be different when it is not in funds? I do not see anything in this case which creates a liability to the true owner.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, J.) March 9, 10.

In re MONTAGU.

Ex parte WARD v. LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN BANK. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Banker—Banking account opened by debtor in name of wife—Payments out by bank to wife after receiving order—Intervention of trustee—Res judicata—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 44.

The bankrupt had opened a banking account in his wife's name before receiving order, all her cheques to be initialled by him. After receiving order the bank continued to honour the wife's cheques until the trustee moved for a declaration that the account was in fact the bankrupt's. The trustee having obtained such declaration, moved again for the repayment by the bank of moneys paid out since receiving order.

Held, that the bank was bound to honour the wife's cheques until the trustee intervened; and that had the trustee been entitled to have the amount of such cheques repaid to him he ought to have asked for it upon his first motion.

Motion by the trustee in the bankruptcy for a declaration that at the date of the receiving order the respondent bank had in their hands the sum of £486, forming part of the property of the bankrupt divisible among his creditors, and for an order for the payment by the bank to the trustee of £216, the remaining £270 having been paid under a former order of the court.

In June, 1895, shortly before the debtor absconded and became bankrupt, he opened an account at the Clapham branch of the bank in the name of his wife. The debtor and his wife interviewed the the manager together, informing him that the wife wished to open an account of her own, but that all cheques drawn by her were to be initialled by the husband, because she was inclined to be too generous with the money, and he wished to have some check upon her.

The receiving order against the husband was made on the 9th of October, 1895. At that date the balance to the credit of this account was £486. Between that date and the end of the year the wife drew out £216, after which there were no dealings with the account.

Upon the 7th of May, 1896, the trustee moved for a declaration that the account was the bankrupt's, and for an account of all dealings therewith since the date of the receiving order.

Upon the 27th of July, 1896, the trustee obtained a declaration that the account was the bankrupt's, and an order for the payment of £270, the balance then to the credit of the account. He also obtained the pass-book relating to the account, and having discovered the dealings subsequent to the receiving order, made the present application.

Muir Mackenzie (Mackintosh with him), for the trustee, stated the facts and cited In re Trehearne, Ex parte Local Board of Ealing, 7 Morrell 261.

Herbert Jacobs, for the bank.—Firstly, I submit that on the facts the bank were bound to honour Mrs. Montagu's cheques, and she could have sued them if they had failed to do so. The initialling by the husband was not notice to the bank that he had any interest in the account: In re Barney, 40 W. R. 637, [1892] 2 Ch. 265. Secondly, I contend that this matter is res judicata; the whole question was litigated in the former motion, and if the trustee had been entitled to the order he now asks he could have obtained it upon that motion.

Muir Mackenzie, in reply, cited Concha v. Concha, 35 W. R. 477, 11 App. Cas. 541, and Ex parte Rabbidge, Re Pooley, 26 W. R. 646, L. R. 8 Ch. D. 367.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I do not think that I ought to make any order in this case, although the matter is not without difficulty. I will deal first with the point of res judicata.

The former application of the trustee was for a declaration of his rights as to this banking account and it seems to me that he took an order, firstly declaring this to be the bankrupt's account; secondly a consequential order for the payment over to him

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(the trustee) of the balance standing to the credit of the account. It is now said that this order entitled the trustee to the whole amount standing to the credit of the account as from the date of the receiving order. I have not to decide now what that order meant, but to decide whether the whole of this question was litigated before me in the previous motion in such a way that if the trustee had been entitled to the whole amount he could have got it upon that motion. To my mind it was a motion in which he could have got an order for all the money lying to the credit of the account from the date of the receiving order, and therefore I hold that this matter is res judicata.

Now, as to the other point. When the matter was before me on the previous motion, whether there was a mistake or what there was, I cannot say, but there was then no dispute as to the amount payable. It is true that the trustee had not then seen the passbook, but he saw it and discovered the amount standing to the credit of the account at the date of the receiving order, before the order upon the motion had been drawn up, and did not include it in that order.

Upon the evidence before me upon this motion I find as a fact that, as between the bank and Mr. and Mrs. Montagu, this account was opened as the wife's account, and that while funds stood to the credit of this account an action for dishonour would have lain by the wife, or, in the event of the failure of the bank, a proof could have been presented by her. I also think that the direction as to initialling was the wife's, and that she could at any time have ordered the bank to honour her cheques without their being initialled by her husband.

This being so, I found as a fact upon the previous motion that this account was the husband's account. Does that give the trustee a right to claim moneys paid in pursuance of a contract between the wife and the bank before he moved for a declaration as to the true ownership of the account? It seems to me that the result would be very unfortunate if, in a case where the contract were one purporting to be made by someone other than the bankrupt, and believed by the other contracting party to be so, the trustee, before taking steps to obtain a declaration, could call upon persons who had paid money in pursuance of that contract to pay that money over again to him. I know of no case which so decides, and I think that this case is more like those cases of contracts after bankruptcy where all payments made before the trustee interferes are held good.

Gaming—Money paid in respect of wagering contract—Loan—Gaming Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 9), s. 1.

The plaintiff, at the defendant's request, agreed to lend him £500 upon the terms that the money was to be repaid if the defendant won the match, but not otherwise. The plaintiff accordingly paid the £500 to the stakeholder for the defendant. The defendant won the match and received the stakes. In an action to recover the £500 as money lent,

Held, that the £500 was paid by the plaintiff in respect of a wagering contract within the meaning of the Gaming Act, 1892, and could not be recovered.

Appeal from the judgment of Day, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The defendant and another person had agreed to fight a boxing match for £500 a side, the money to be deposited with a stakeholder. The defendant, being unable to deposit £500, asked the plaintiff, who was his second, to lend him the money, and the plaintiff agreed to do so upon the terms that he was to be repaid if the defendant won the match, but not otherwise. The plaintiff accordingly paid the £500 to the stakeholder. The defendant won the match and received the stakes and a purse of added money, and the plaintiff thereupon sued him to recover the £500 as money lent. The defendant pleaded the Gaming Acts. The learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant appealed.

By the Gaming Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 9), s. 1, "any promise, express or implied, to pay any person any sum of money paid by him under or in respect of any contract or agreement rendered null and void by the Act of the eighth and ninth Victoria, chapter one hundred and nine . . . shall be null and void, and no action shall be brought or maintained to recover any such sum of money."

Hugo Young and McCardie, for the defendant.—The agreement between the combatants to fight the boxing match was a wagering contract rendered null and void by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109: Diggle v. Higgs, 25 W. R. 777, 2 Ex. D. 422. The money, therefore, paid by the plaintiff to the stakeholder was money paid in respect of that wagering agreement: Tatam v. Reeve, 41 W. R. 174, [1893] 1 Q. B. 44. Though it may be called a loan to the defendant, it was only to be repaid if the defendant won the match. The action was, therefore, not maintainable by virtue of section 1 of the Gaming Act, 1892.

A. Lyttelton (Dorsett with him), for the plaintiff.—This was a simple contract of loan between the plaintiff and the defendant. The liability to repay arose at once before any question arose as to the destination of the money. De Mattos v. Benjamin, 42 W. R. 284, 63 L. J. Q. B. 248; O'Sullivan v. Thomas, 43 W. R. 269, [1895] 1 Q. B. 698, were referred to.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In my opinion this appeal must be allowed. A boxing match was arranged to come off between the defendant and another man, and each side had to deposit £500 with a stakeholder. The defendant asked the plaintiff to lend him £500, and the plaintiff agreed to do so upon the terms that the money was to be repaid if the defendant won the match, but not otherwise. The defendant, having won the match and received the stakes, refused to repay the £500. It seems to me clear that this was a loan. But it was money lent or paid in respect of a wagering contract, because the transaction depended so far as repayment was concerned, upon the result of the wager. By the Gaming Act, 1892, the plaintiff cannot recover this sum. Judgment must therefore be entered for the defendant, but without costs either here or in the court below.

LOPES, L.J.—The defendant and another man were about to engage in a boxing match, and each side was to deposit £500 with a stakeholder, the money to be handed over to the winner. The defendant was unable to deposit £500, and the plaintiff lent him the money and it was deposited with the stakeholder. The match came off and the defendant won. Thereupon the defendant, who had received the £1,000 and some added money, refused to repay the £500. There can be no doubt that the agreement between the two combatants to fight the boxing match was a wagering contract, and that that contract was null and void under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. The question we have to determine is whether the Gaming Act, 1892, applies. It seems to me impossible to say that this £500 was not paid by the plaintiff in respect of the contract which was entered into between the two combatants, and which was null and void under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. The case comes within the mischief aimed at by the Act. The appeal must therefore be allowed, but without costs here or below.

Chitty, L.J.—I also agree that the appeal should be allowed. It was argued that this was a simple contract of loan. The terms upon which the plaintiff lent the £500 were that the money should be repaid by the defendant if he won the match, and in that event only. It was not therefore a simple contract of loan. The money was paid by the plaintiff to the stakeholder, at the defendant's request, upon the terms that the defendant would repay it if and when he received it from the stakeholder. The contract between the plaintiff and the defendant was not a wagering contract, though the contract between the two combatants was. The payment made by the plaintiff to the stakeholder at the defendant's request was, in my opinion, unquestionably paid in respect of a contract that was avoided by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. In these circumstances the plaintiff is not entitled to recover.

Appeal allowed.

Railway—Compensation—Lands taken or injuriously affected—Order for trial of question in High Court—Jurisdiction of master—Ord. 54, r. 12—Regulation of Railways Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 119), s. 41.

A master has jurisdiction to entertain an application for an order under section 41 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868, for the trial in the High Court of a question of compensation for lands taken or injuriously affected.

Where the master refuses to make an order under section 41, and between the date of the master's order and an appeal to the judge the railway company issues a warrant to the sheriff to summon a jury to assess the compensation, the judge has still jurisdiction to make the order notwithstanding the issue of the warrant, as his order must be taken as relating back to the time when the application was before the master.

Appeal from Day, J., at chambers.

(a.) Reported by W. F. Barry, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 20th of February, 1897, the claimant served notice on the railway company under section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, claiming compensation in respect of certain lands injuriously affected by the execution of the works, and in case the company disputed the amount of the claim that the compensation should be settled by a jury.

On the 1st of March the company took out an originating summons under section 41 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868,* for an order that the question of compensation be tried by a judge of the High Court and a special jury.

On the 12th of March the summons came before a master, and he refused to make the order. Subsequently, on the same day the company issued their warrant to the sheriff to summon a jury for settling the compensation, the twenty-one days after the receipt of the notice limited for so doing by section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, expiring on the next day.

On the 15th of March, Day, J., on appeal reversed the decision of the master and made the order asked for.

The claimant appealed.

Toller, for the claimant.—The master had no jurisdiction to entertain the application under section 41 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868. Before the Judicature Act, 1873, a judge of one of the superior courts alone could have exercised the jurisdiction. Though that jurisdiction has now been transferred to the judges of the High Court, yet they do not exercise it under the Judicature Acts, but by section 12 of the Judicature Act, 1873, it is a special jurisdiction to be exercised as if the Judicature Act had not been passed, and as if the judge had been appointed the successor of the judges of the superior courts before the passing of the Act. It is a special jurisdiction conferred upon the judge, not by virtue of his general jurisdiction as a judge of the High Court, but by virtue of the peculiar jurisdiction to be exercised under the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868: per Lord Esher, M.R., in In re East London Railway Co., 38 W. R. 312, 24 Q. B. D. 507. Therefore the judge, acting under section 41 of the Act of 1868, does not exercise the jurisdiction under the Judicature Acts. Accordingly, ord. 54, r. 12, which gives a master power to exercise all such jurisdiction, with certain exceptions, as under the Acts—that is, by order 71, the Judicature Acts—may be exercised by a judge at chambers, does not apply to this case. Further, one of the exceptions in ord. 54, r. 12, is the settlement of issues, and section 41 of the Act of 1868 enacts that the question shall be stated in an issue. That shows that the judge alone has jurisdiction under section 41. That being so, the application to the judge was an original application, and as the warrant to the sheriff to summon a jury had then been issued, by the express terms of section 41 the application was too late. Moreover, even assuming that the master had jurisdiction, as the order was not made by the judge until after the warrant to the sheriff had been issued, the order is out of time and bad. The sheriff is bound to obey the warrant. By section 41 the issue of the warrant deprives the judge of jurisdiction to make an order under that section.

* Section 41 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 119: "Whenever . . . any question of compensation in respect of lands injuriously affected by the execution of the works of any public railway is under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to be settled by the verdict of a jury empannelled and summoned as in that Act mentioned, the company or the party entitled to the compensation may, at any time before the issuing by the company to the sheriff of by that Act directed, apply to a judge of any one of the superior courts of common law at Westminster who shall, if he think fit, make an order for the trial of the question in one of the superior courts, upon such terms and in such manner as to him shall seem fit; and the question between the parties shall be stated in an issue to be settled in case of difference by the judge. . . ."

J. Eldon Bankes, for the railway company, was only called upon to argue the question whether the master had jurisdiction. Section 16 of the Judicature Act, 1873, transfers to the High Court the jurisdiction which was vested in or capable of being exercised by any of the judges of the superior courts, sitting in court or chambers, when acting as judges in pursuance of any statute, law, or custom, and all powers given to any such judges or judge by any statute. Under that section the jurisdiction under section 41 of the Act of 1868 was transferred to a judge of the High Court, and he acts under the Judicature Acts. Ord. 54, r. 12, applies, and the master has jurisdiction. Section 12 only applies to an authority or power not incident to the administration of justice in any court. The jurisdiction under section 41 is incident to the administration of justice. As to the settlement of an issue, that question has not arisen, and if it does a judge will have to deal with it.

Toller replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 25.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question we have to determine is whether Day, J., had jurisdiction to make an order for the trial of the claim for compensation in the High Court before a judge and jury. It is clear that the learned judge would have had jurisdiction if the application was in time. It was argued that he had no jurisdiction because at the time he made the order the warrant to the sheriff to summon a jury to assess the compensation had been issued, and that, therefore, there was no power to make the order under section 41 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868.

Now, the summons came first before a master, who refused to make the order, and at that time the warrant to the sheriff had not been issued. Therefore, if the master had jurisdiction to make an order under section 41, the application to him would have been in time. It was objected that the master had no jurisdiction, and therefore the judge's order must be taken to have been made upon an original application to him, and as the warrant to the sheriff had then been issued it was too late to make an order. On the other side it was contended that the master had jurisdiction, and that when the summons came before the judge he made the order which he thought the master ought to have made, that his order merely replaced the master's order, and that the case must be treated as if the order was made at the time when the master should have made it, that is, before the issue of the warrant. That contention depends upon the construction of certain sections of the Judicature Act, 1873, and ord. 54, r. 12.

By section 41 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868, the application has to be made to a judge of one of the superior courts of common law. In my opinion up to the passing of the Judicature Act, 1873, a judge alone had jurisdiction to make an order under that section. Then came the Judicature Act. In my opinion section 12 does not affect this case. Section 16 is the material section. By that section there was transferred to the High Court of Justice not only the jurisdiction exercised by the superior courts, but also "the jurisdiction which, at the commencement of this Act, was vested in, or capable of being exercised by, all or any one or more of the judges of the said courts respectively, sitting in court or chambers, or elsewhere, when acting as judges or a judge, in pursuance of any statute, law, or custom, and all powers given to any such court, or to any such judge or judges, by any statute." Those words seem to me clearly to include the jurisdiction exercised by a judge of one of the superior courts under section 41 of the Act of 1868. That jurisdiction therefore now exists in a judge of the High Court, and is to be exercised by him as a judge of the High Court. Turning then to ord. 54, r. 12, we find that a master may, with certain exceptions, transact all such business, and exercise all such authority and jurisdiction in respect of the same as under the Acts—that is, by order 71, the Judicature Acts—or the rules may be transacted or exercised by a judge at chambers. Therefore, inasmuch as the judge at chambers now exercises the jurisdiction conferred upon him by section 41 of the Act of 1868 under the Judicature Acts, the master can exercise the jurisdiction. Here the master refused to make the order asked for, but the judge, upon the summons being brought before him, differed from the master (I do not call it an appeal, because I do not think it is an appeal in the ordinary sense), and made the order which he thought the master should have made. That being so, the order must be taken as made at the time when the master ought to have made it, which was before the warrant was issued to the sheriff. The learned judge therefore had jurisdiction to make the order, and the appeal must be dismissed. It follows that the warrant to the sheriff must be treated as of no effect.

LOPES, L.J.—In this case an application was made under section 41 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868, and a judge at chambers made the order asked for, but it is said that the order was made too late, and therefore without jurisdiction, because the warrant to the sheriff to summon a jury had been issued. The application to the master was clearly in time if the master had jurisdiction to entertain the summons. If the master had jurisdiction, in my opinion the judge had jurisdiction to make the order when the summons came before him, because upon appeal (and I think it is correct to call it an appeal) he was merely making the order which the master ought to have made. Therefore the question comes to this, Had the master jurisdiction? Before the Judicature Act, 1873, a master would have had no jurisdiction. We must look at the Judicature Act, 1873, to see what jurisdiction is transferred to the High Court. Section 16 deals with that question. In my opinion the effect of that section is to transfer the statutory jurisdiction given by section 41 of the Act of 1868 to the High Court, to be exercised by a judge of the High Court sitting in chambers. We must now look at ord. 54, r. 12, to see if the master has jurisdiction. It seems to me that the case stands thus: under section 16 of the Judicature Act, 1873, this jurisdiction can be exercised by a judge of the High Court, and by ord. 54, r. 12, the master is to have all the jurisdiction which under the Judicature Acts may be exercised by a judge at chambers, with certain exceptions. It is said that the exception as to the settlement of issues shows that the master cannot have jurisdiction under section 41 of the Act of 1868, because by that section the question of compensation is to be stated in an issue to be settled. In my opinion that contention is not a good one. The question of settling an issue has not arisen. If it does arise, then I take it that the judge must deal with it if the parties cannot agree. The master, therefore, had jurisdiction, and it follows, as I have said, that the judge's order must be taken to have been made when the master ought to have made the order, which was before the warrant to the sheriff was issued. The warrant to the sheriff, therefore, becomes of no effect.

CHITTY, L.J.—The substantial question is whether the master had jurisdiction to entertain the summons. In my opinion he had. Section 16 of the Judicature Act, 1873, transferred to the High Court the jurisdiction vested in the old superior courts, including any jurisdiction exercised by the judges or a judge, sitting in court or chambers, in pursuance of any statute, law, or custom. Therefore the jurisdiction conferred by section 41 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868, is now transferred to a judge of the High Court sitting in chambers. Turning then to ord. 54, r. 12, I find that the master can exercise all such jurisdiction as under the Judicature Acts may be exercised by a judge at chambers, with certain exceptions. The result is that the master had jurisdiction to entertain the summons. It is argued that section 12 of the Judicature Act, 1873, applies. I do not think so. That section makes provision for the extraordinary duties of the judges of the old superior courts, and is limited to a duty, authority, or power "not incident to the administration of justice in any court." Therefore that section is not applicable to this case. The only other point is that, as a master has no jurisdiction to settle an issue except by consent, and as section 41 of the Act of 1868 says that the question of compensation shall be stated in an issue, the master has no jurisdiction to entertain an application under section 41. If it were necessary under section 41 that there should be only one order, and that the settlement of the issue should be included in the order for a trial before a judge and jury in the High Court, that might be so. But section 41 clearly contemplates that there may be two orders. The master, therefore, had jurisdiction to make the order, and if it is found necessary to apply to have an issue settled, that application must go before a judge.

Appeal dismissed.

THE GUARDIANS OF THE WEST DERBY UNION v. THE METROPOLITAN LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY. SAME v. PRIESTMAN. (a.)

Poor law—Loan to guardians—Contract—Loan for fixed period payable by instalments—Act of Parliament — Construction — Effect of proviso — Implied alteration of contract—Poor Law Loans Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 11), s. 2.

The plaintiffs in 1875 borrowed from the defendants money which it was agreed should be repaid with interest at 4¼ per cent. by sixty equal specified half-yearly instalments in respect of principal and interest. In 1895 the plaintiffs applied for and obtained from the Local Government Board an order enabling them to redeem the balance of the said loan and to borrow at 3 per cent. interest so much money as might be necessary for that purpose. The defendants were not served with any notice of the plaintiffs' intention to apply for such order, and did not appear to oppose it.

Held, that the plaintiffs were not entitled, under section 2 of the Poor Law Loans Act, 1871, to compel the defendants to receive repayment of the balance of the said loan at any time prior to the expiration of the period fixed by the contract for the loan.

Decision of North, J., ante, p. 90, reversed.

Appeals by the defendants from the decision of North, J., reported ante, p. 90, upon two special cases.

The question raised was whether by virtue of section 2 of the Poor Law Loans Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 11), guardians who had borrowed money since the passing of that Act upon the terms that the same should be repaid in thirty years by equal fixed instalments representing principal and interest were entitled to pay off such first-mentioned loan at any time, and for that purpose to borrow money at a lower rate of interest.

The plaintiffs in 1875 borrowed £30,000 from the defendants at 4¼ per cent. interest, and gave to the defendants a security therefor following the form provided by section 6 of the Union Loans Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 45), and thereby charged the common fund of their union with the repayment to the defendants of the said sum by sixty equal half-yearly instalments in respect of the principal and interest of the sum so borrowed, as stated in the schedule thereto, to be paid as therein mentioned. The said security contained a proviso (following the form given by the Act) that nothing herein contained should prevent the defendants from receiving the repayment of the whole or part of the aforesaid sum at any time before the day of payment of the last instalment, if willing to do so.

Section 2 of the Poor Law Loans Act, 1871, upon the construction of which the question turned, enacts —"If any guardians or managers, having borrowed or hereafter borrowing money under the authority of the Acts referred to, shall be able at any time to obtain a loan at a lower rate of interest than that secured by the charge previously made by them, they may apply to the Poor Law Board for an order to enable them to redeem the balance of the loan, and to borrow so much money as may be necessary for that purpose; and if the said board shall issue their order in that behalf, the said guardians or managers may borrow the requisite amount to redeem such balance, and charge the fund to which the original loan was charged with the repayment of this additional loan in so many instalments as shall be outstanding at the time when the loan is redeemed, but not more. Provided that in the event of any loan outstanding at the time of the passing of this Act, no such redemption shall take place without the consent of the person or persons to whom the loan shall be owing." Section 3—"Loans may be repaid by half-yearly instalments, and where they may have been contracted to be repaid by annual instalments they may, with the consent of the lenders, be repaid by half-yearly instalments of the principal and interest." The Local Government Board has since been substituted for the Poor Law Board.

In September, 1895, the plaintiffs, without any previous notice to the defendants, obtained from the Local Government Board authority to repay the unpaid balance of the said loan and to borrow money for that purpose at 3 per cent. interest. Having obtained this authority, the plaintiffs served upon the defendants a six months' notice of their intention to pay off the balance of the loan.

The defendants disputed the plaintiffs' right so to pay them off, and the question was, by consent, raised upon two special cases.

North, J., held that the plaintiffs were entitled to redeem without the defendants' consent (see ante, p. 90).

The defendants appealed.

Sir R. T. Reid, Q.C., and Danckwerts, for the appellants.—The effect of the Act of 1871 was to enable guardians to borrow money for various specific purposes and charge the repayment of such money on the rates, but did not enable them to borrow for the purpose of paying off previous loans, for that would have enabled the guardians to evade the restriction under which loans were to be paid off in thirty years. There is nothing in any of the Acts prior to 1871 to prevent guardians from redeeming a loan with the consent of the lender before the end of the thirty years if the guardians had money derived from other sources in their hands. There was nothing to prevent the guardians from stipulating for the right to redeem us in their contract with us. Further, the lenders have no right to appear and be heard when the application is made to the Local Government Board for leave to borrow. The proviso was inserted in order to relieve lenders from the liability to inquire whether the guardians had money in their hands properly applicable for redeeming. The proviso cannot give additional effect to the enacting words, it can only qualify them.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and R. J. Parker, for the respondents.—The lenders advanced their money with full notice of the effect of the Act. The only question is, What does the statute mean? [LINDLEY, L.J.—The point against you is that on your construction of the Act, it enlarges the powers of the borrowers, but does not affect the liabilities of the borrowers.] The first part of the section is perfectly general, and gives in every case the right to redeem. [RIGBY, L.J.—It merely gives a power.] If so the proviso is useless.

Sir R. T. Reid, Q.C., replied.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question raised by these appeals is whether Poor Law guardians, who, since 1871, have borrowed money on the security of poor rates, upon the terms of paying off the principal, with interest at an agreed rate by equal annual instalments extending over thirty years, can compel the lenders to accept payment of the unpaid principal sum whenever the guardians can borrow the amount necessary for the purpose at a lower rate of interest than that which they agreed to pay. North, J., has decided that they can do so under the powers conferred upon them by the Poor Law Loans Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 11), s. 2. From this decision the lenders have appealed. It is conceded that the guardians have no such power apart from the statute in question, but it is said that the practical effect of that statute is to introduce into every mortgage of poor rates, made after the passing of the statute, a provision enabling the guardians to pay off the mortgage at any time if they can borrow money at a lower rate of interest than that mentioned in the mortgage. It is contended that this is no hardship on the lenders, because they must be taken to know the law and to have made their bargains with reference to it. No one pretends that the lenders can call in the money if it is to their interest to do so. The bargain, therefore, if it really is as the guardians contend, is a very one-sided one, and one which lenders would not make without raising the terms on which they would otherwise be willing to lend. However, I agree that, if the Legislature has imposed upon the lenders the obligation of accepting their money upon terms not expressed in their security, they must accept it upon those terms, whether they consider them harsh or unfair or not. They should have thought of that before they lent their money. But, unless the Legislature has clearly imposed such an obligation upon them, they may well complain of the hardship and unfairness of such a departure from the plain language in which their contract and security are expressed.

Before examining the Act to which I have referred, I pause to ask, what must be found in it to confer upon the guardians the right to pay off a mortgage on terms other than those expressed in it? A power to borrow in order to pay off is by no means enough, for such a power imposes no obligations, either on persons to lend or on lenders to be redeemed. Such a power assumes that persons can be found willing to lend, and also that lenders are willing, or have agreed, to be redeemed as desired. What has to be found in order to support the contention of the guardians is some enactment imposing upon the lenders an obligation to take the principal due to them upon other terms than those mentioned in their express contract. Unless this obligation is clearly imposed upon them by the Legislature, it cannot be imposed at all. To impose such an obligation by an inference from language which does not clearly impose it, appears to me to be wrong in principle, unless the inference is what is called a necessary inference—i.e., unless the language relied upon can have no other meaning.

[His lordship read section 2.] Now, apart from any inference drawn from this proviso, there is nothing whatever to impose any obligation on lenders of money to guardians to accept repayment otherwise than upon the terms mentioned in their securities. The section simply extends the powers of guardians to borrow. Such a power was wanted, for, even if the lenders agreed that they would accept or were willing to accept payment otherwise than by instalments, the guardians had no power to borrow money in order to pay them off. It is to be observed that the application to the Poor Law Board for powers to redeem and borrow for the purpose, is made without notice to the lenders, who are not consulted or heard by the Board. The Act does not protect them in any way, not even by requiring six months' or other reasonable notice so as to give them time to find another investment. Further, if an order is obtained from the Board, all that the Act says is that the guardians may borrow the money necessary to redeem and charge it on the fund charged by the original loan. All this extends their powers; but no right to pay off the lenders against their consent, and on terms not expressed in their contracts, is conferred on the guardians. No obligation whatever is imposed on the lenders by the enacting part of the section. I pass to the proviso. It is in terms confined to loans made before the Act passed, and is clearly inserted to protect the persons to whom such loans may be owing from being paid off without their consent by means of money borrowed under the powers of the Act. This is what the proviso says, and this is all it says. It says nothing about loans made since the Act. It is contended that the necessary inference is that such loans can be paid off without the consent of the persons to whom they are owing, and although there is nothing in their securities to compel them to take their money otherwise than by instalments. I am quite unable to see the necessity for drawing any such inference. The proviso is consistent with other views, from which no such inference can be drawn. In the first place, it may have been inserted, not because it was plain that the enacting part of the section did apply to loans made before the Act, but because persons who were regarding the interests of the owners of such loans were afraid that such a construction might be adopted, and thought it prudent to remove all doubt upon the point by introducing language the meaning of which could not be mistaken. Another explanation was suggested by counsel for the appellants—viz., that the proviso was inserted in order to prevent the powers of the Act from being used to pay off lenders who had agreed before 1871 to accept payment out of any moneys which the borrowers might happen to have applicable to the purpose of paying off loans, but which moneys could not before 1871 have been obtained by borrowing for that purpose. This explanation of the clause may be correct. The form of security given in the Union Loans Act, 1869, to which I shall again refer presently, shows that redemption otherwise than by yearly instalments was contemplated, and I suppose that such redemptions did in fact occasionally take place, but, of course, only with the consent of the lenders. I do not know whether before the Act of 1871 loans were in practice expressly made redeemable otherwise than by instalments; but, whether they were or not, they might have been, and I cannot therefore reject this explanation of the proviso as wholly unworthy of consideration. It would have the effect suggested in the cases supposed, if any such there were. The anxiety of the Legislature not to affect the rights of the owners of loans made before 1871 is apparent, not only from the proviso in section 2, but from sections 1 and 3 also. But section 3 also shows that the Legislature left the borrowers and lenders to make their own bargains after the Act passed, and did not intend to interfere with those bargains without the consent of the lenders. This section enables loans to be repaid by half-yearly instalments, instead of by annual instalments as under the previous Poor Law loans enactments. But this section 3, which applies to loans made after 1871 as well as to loans made before, expressly says that such half-yearly repayments are only to be made with the consent of the lenders.

Now it seems to me incredible that such a small alteration as this in the express terms of a written contract can only be made with consent, and yet that the lenders shall be liable to be paid off at any moment without notice, although no bargain to that effect is to be found in the security given to them. Again, it is to be observed that the form of security given by the Union Loans Act of 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 45), s. 6, is left as it was, and the proviso in that form would hardly have been continued without alteration if the Act of 1871 had (as contended) made it part of every bargain that the guardians should be at liberty to pay off the loan at any time if they could obtain money for the purpose. The proviso in the form is that nothing contained in the charge given to the lenders shall prevent them from receiving repayment of the loan before the day of payment of the last instalment, if willing so to do. With such a clause still in that form, the court is asked to hold that it is also part of the bargain that the lenders must accept payment before the time stipulated, although, in fact, they never in terms agreed to do so. The Legislature in 1871 evidently desired to extend the powers of guardians in the interests of the ratepayers, and this has been very effectually done, however the Act of 1871 is construed. But I can see nothing in the Act to prevent guardians after the Act from borrowing on such terms as they, in the interest of the ratepayers, think proper to agree to. The effect of the construction of the statute contended for by the guardians is to place upon them a fetter which must seriously affect their powers of borrowing. If that construction is right—if the statute incorporates as part of every contract of loan to guardians such a condition as they contend it does—it will follow that they can only borrow upon condition that they shall be at liberty to pay off the principal sum borrowed whenever they can advantageously borrow money elsewhere to enable them to do so. Such a fetter would go far to prevent the guardians from effecting loans on the most advantageous terms they could otherwise obtain at the time when they wanted money. I can find nothing in the Act to fetter the guardians in this way. Looking at the matter from the lenders' point of view, I can find nothing in the Act which expressly or by necessary inference requires the court to hold that, if guardians think proper to borrow money on the express terms of paying a fixed rate of interest, and of paying off the loan by instalments, they can nevertheless require the lenders to take back the unpaid principal at any moment, and without previous notice. If the Legislature really meant that all loans to guardians made after 1871 should be subject to such a condition, all I can say is that they have not said so, and I cannot myself infer from the language used a direction that, for the future, the borrowing powers conferred by the Act can only be exercised for the purpose of making such very one-sided bargains. In my opinion, the decision of North, J., is erroneous, and the appeal ought to be allowed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I have the great misfortune of not being able to agree with my brothers Lindley and Rigby upon the construction of section 2 of the Act of 1871. [After stating the facts and referring to the provisions of the Act of 1871 and prior Acts, his lordship continued:] Now, pausing here (i.e., before the proviso to section 2 of the Act of 1871), for whose benefit is this power to redeem—with its necessary accompanying power to borrow money, if other money can, at any time during the continuance of the loan, be borrowed at a lower rate of interest than that secured by the charge—given? It seems to me obvious that it is in aid of the ratepayers, and of them alone. That the Legislature in 1871 knew of these loans for thirty years contracted prior to 1871, and of like loans about to be contracted subsequent to that date is beyond dispute, and this section was passed to give relief to ratepayers in the event of the current rate of interest at any time falling below the contracted rate during the thirty years the loan was running, if the guardians were able to borrow money to redeem the balance of the loan then unpaid, together with the contracted interest, at a lower rate of interest than that contracted for. It is only in these two events that relief is given by the section. If this section had stopped here, which it does not, I should have been by no means satisfied that its true construction was that argued for on behalf of the appellants—viz., that a board of guardians could only take advantage of the provisions enabling them to redeem if they had a clause in their contract to that effect, or if, having no such clause, they could obtain the lenders' consent to redemption. What real benefit would it be to ratepayers to give them power to redeem and borrow money for that purpose, if they could not redeem without the consent of the lenders, for what lenders would consent to be redeemed, unless they were compelled to do so by contract or otherwise? Why should they, unless compelled, abandon a first-class continuing security, bearing a high rate of interest not obtainable elsewhere? This Act would be, if construed as the appellants suggest, of little, if any, value to the ratepayers. It is said that it gives the guardians power to borrow in order to redeem, but nothing more, and that redemption is only to take place in the event of the guardians having contracts compelling redemption or of the lenders being willing to be redeemed. I can find no trace of the existence or contemplation of any such contracts when the Act was passed, nor of their being in existence or contemplation now, and as to lenders voluntarily consenting to redemption I have already dealt with that point. But it appears to me that any ambiguity as to the meaning of this section is removed and its true construction made apparent when its last few lines are read. [His lordship read the proviso.] The Legislature thus clearly states what is to take place as regards loans made prior to the Act. These loans are not to be redeemed without the consent of the lenders, the reason for this being that existing contracts are not to be interfered with by subsequent legislation. But, as regards loans contracted after the passing of the Act and with full knowledge of the Act, no such reason exists, and we therefore find in the Act no requirement as to consent having to be obtained to their redemption.

It is said on behalf of the appellants that if loans made after the passing of the Act may be compulsorily redeemed without any contract or consent in that behalf, what a scandalous breach of contract is authorised by the Legislature, and that this could not have been its intention, and is, therefore, not the true construction of the section. This, however, begs the question, which is, what is the contract as regards loans to boards of guardians on the security of the rates, entered into after and with full knowledge of the Act of 1871? It must not be forgotten that the authority of guardians to enter into contracts and charge the rates thereby is the creation of statute. Everyone who contracts with boards of guardians knows this to be so, and, in my judgment, there is nothing unreasonable in the Legislature enacting that, as regards contracts for loans made after the coming into operation of the Act upon the security of the rates, guardians should be enabled to redeem the loans, if it so happens they can, during the continuance of the loan, borrow money at such a cheap rate as to enable them with advantage to do so, and, in my opinion, all contracts for loans made after the passing of the Act, though for a period of thirty years, are subject to what the Act of Parliament prescribes —viz., that they may in one event (i.e., if money can at any time during the contracted period be obtained at a sufficiently low rate of interest) be redeemed with the sanction of the Poor Law Board. Take this case. Suppose guardians after the passing of the Act of 1871 by express contract were to fix their ratepayers for thirty years to pay 5 cent. upon the borrowed money, no matter whether it could afterwards during that period be obtained, say, at 2½ per cent., would that be a valid contract? I think not, for the simple reason that after the Act of 1871 the guardians had no authority by statute so to contract and bind their ratepayers. Now, the Legislature in this second section, as in the first, has been careful not to interfere with contracts made prior to the passing of the Act, except both parties to the contract agree, and it has accordingly expressly so stated, but this exception is pointedly omitted from the section as regards contracts made after the passing of the Act. To get rid of this undoubted fact the suggestion is made that the proviso in section 2 was inserted ex abundanti cautela, to prevent its being said that the section was applicable to contracts made prior to the passing of the Act. But, if the meaning of section 2 be as argued for the appellants, that, whether the contract of loan be made before or after the passing of the Act, redemption can only take place with the contracted or voluntary consent of the lender, I do not see the sense of inserting the proviso at all, for upon this hypothesis whenever the contract be made no redemption is to take place without the consent of the lender. Then, why insert a meaningless exception as to contracts made prior to the Act being passed? To my mind no intelligible answer has been given to this.

Sir Robert Reid, for the appellants, sought to get over the difficulties in his way by the suggestion that the proviso was inserted to meet the case of a contract made prior to the passing of the Act, in which was contained an option of redemption, upon a six or some other months' notice, and that, as before the Act (1871) it was most improbable that the guardians, although they had this option of redemption by contract, would ever exercise it, having ordinarily no means wherewith to do so, when the Legislature gave the power to borrow money, as it did in the Act of 1871, it did away with this improbability, and that it thereby altered the position of the lender for the worse, and so the proviso was inserted that contracts entered into prior to 1871 were not to be redeemed without the consent of the lender. To this I must answer that I am not aware that there ever were such contracts in cases of guardians borrowing upon the security of rates. The statutory forms of charge do not suggest them, and in the special case herein there is no such finding, and, what is more, the Act of 1871 does not purport to be dealing with any such supposed contracts, but, as will be seen by its recital, was dealing with contracts of loan which were to be repaid over a period of thirty years. But this suggestion of Sir Robert Reid only covered contracts made prior to the passing of the Act, and I asked him what about those made subsequently thereto. He said that these contracts were not mentioned in the section because they were entered into by lenders who knew that, by the Act of 1871, power had been given to the guardians to borrow for the purpose of redemption, and therefore their position would not be altered as in the case of lenders prior to the Act. I do not dispute this last suggestion, for it seems strongly to support my view of the section. As they knew of the power to borrow, so they knew of the power to redeem. The object of the insertion of the proviso is to me plain and clear, if the section gives to the guardians a right of compulsory redemption, for it then limits that right to contracts made after the passing of the Act. If the section does not give this right as is argued for the appellants, all I can say is that to me the proviso is senseless and without meaning. It was said that if my construction of the section be correct, there should be found in it some provision as to what notice should be given to the lender prior to the loan being redeemed. But the guardians are not to redeem and borrow money for that purpose without an order of the Poor Law Board in that behalf, and it seems to me that the Legislature might well leave a matter like this to such an authority, even if the guardians desired to perpetrate injustice, which is not to be assumed, and indeed, in the present case, we find that a six months' notice has in fact been given. It is next said that section 3 throws light upon section 2. Well, what light does it throw? Before the Act of 1871 boards of guardians could only repay borrowed money by annual instalments. Section 3 now allows them to do so by half-yearly instalments, and it expressly enacts that, whenever they have contracted to repay by annual instalments, they may pay by half-yearly instalments, if the lenders consent. It is said—how ridiculous this is,

If the Legislature has allowed loans to be redeemed without consent, if entered into after the passing of the Act, why not as to these also allow annual payments to become half-yearly payments without the consent of the lenders? I do not see for whose benefit making an annual payment a half-yearly one is given; I should, though, think it is more in favour of the lender than the borrower, and so the Legislature has compelled no one to consent, and left it to the parties to agree. But I think section 3, if it reflects any light at all upon section 2, fortifies my view of the construction of that section. As in section 1, so in section 2, and also in section 3, I find that the Legislature is careful to express that consent shall be obtained when it intends that it should be, and when it intends it should not be (as in section 3, regarding contracts made after the passing of the Act) it advisedly omits saying anything about consent. I cannot think that this section can be used in aid of the appellants' contention, for, in my judgment, it is against it.

For these reasons I think the appeal should be dismissed, but, as my brothers think otherwise, it will be allowed with costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—From the time of the passing of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, down to the present time, it has been the policy of the Legislature to enable boards of guardians and boards of management to borrow money on the security of rates, but such borrowing has always been subject to the consent of a Government department, at first the Poor Law Board and more recently the Local Government Board. As might have been expected the conditions prescribed for the borrowing have been very strict though they have varied from time to time.

In 1851 a statutory form of security was prescribed which, with an alternative made in 1867 (substituting for the rates the common fund of the union and immaterial for the present purpose), has ever since been, and still is, the prescribed form, and was the form made use of in all the cases before the court.

The material parts of that form are: (1) The charge of the common fund of the union with repayment by instalments of specified sums for principal and interest of the loan on fixed dates; and (2) a proviso that nothing in the security contained is to prevent the lenders from receiving the repayment of the whole or any part of the loan at any time before the day of payment of the last instalment if willing so to do.

From the nature of the security it follows that the instalments of debt, so far as they are payable out of rates, can only be raised when, according to the contract, they become due; that is to say, rates cannot be levied in anticipation to pay instalments payable in future years.

This is equivalent to saying that the guardians have no capacity by statute to pay off debt or redeem the charge on rates except in strict accordance with the terms of their original contract.

Regard, however, must be had to the proviso. As the lenders may be persons acting on their own account, or if trustees for others can derive no authority from the security which would aid them as against their cestuis que trustent, it is plain that the meaning of the proviso must be (as the learned judge in the court below has held) to relieve the lenders from the necessity of enquiring whether the borrowers have power to anticipate repayment or not.

We are led, therefore, to the conclusion that the Legislature has all along had in its contemplation that there are or may be cases in which the borrowers have power to redeem independently of the statutory power, and has provided for and so recognized the legality of redemption in such cases with the lender's consent. To go one step further, it seems plain that this consent may be given beforehand; for instance, in the contract of loan or by a variation of the statutory form of security.

What the cases are to which the proviso has reference it is not necessary to inquire.

They cannot, in all probability be cases of very frequent occurrence, but it is sufficient that the Legislature has thought it right, in the common form of security, to provide for redemptions in anticipation of the times actually fixed.

It is plain that according to the statutory form there could be no compulsory redemption by anticipation.

Where it is an object to obtain an investment that can be reckoned upon for a considerable number of years, as in the case of insurance companies, the stability of the investment will be an inducement to give better terms to the borrowers. At the same time it is not unlikely that among the vast number of borrowings under these Acts there may be some where the borrowers having reason to suppose that they may be in a position to redeem otherwise than out of the rates, have stipulated for the right to do so. Such a right, however, would in its operation be greatly extended to the prejudice of the lenders by any legislative extension of the capacity of the borrowers to redeem.

Down to the passing of the Act of 1871, on the construction of which the present appeal turns, it seems clear that the only function of the Government department charged with the supervision of these loans was to see that the borrowing was fit and proper from the point of view of the persons liable to repay. The department had no jurisdiction whatever to interfere in the slightest way with the rights of lenders, nor have they to this day any such jurisdiction unless it be given to them by section 2 of the Act of 1871.

For nearly a quarter of a century after the passing of that Act it does not appear to have occurred to any one that such a jurisdiction was conferred by the Act. It would obviously have been to the advantage of borrowers during the greater part of that period whilst the current rate of interest has been falling to invoke the exercise of it, but no attempt has been made to do so until the obtaining of the order of the 21st of September, 1895, which is relied upon in the case. It appears from the special case that this order was only made as an experiment and to allow the question to be raised. But it is now for the first time claimed on behalf of the borrowers that the section entitles them, whatever be the terms of the contracts they have made, to redeem loans contracted since the passing of the Act whenever they can borrow on easier terms as to interest and get the consent of the department.

It is, of course, part of the proposition that borrowers cannot contract themselves out of the benefit of the Act of 1871, or in other words that it is a hard and fast condition of all borrowing under the Act that borrowers may redeem under the Act whenever it is advantageous to them to do so. If this were thoroughly understood by lenders it would be taken into account by them and would certainly embarrass borrowers not improbably to the extent of making all future borrowing for long terms impossible in many conditions of the money market.

If the Act of 1871 has by plain words of enactment or by necessary implication brought about such an extensive change in the position of borrowers under the Acts and lenders to them the result however unexpected must be acquiesced in, and if lenders since the passing of the Act have failed to realise the meaning of the statute they have no legal ground of complaint; but before the construction suggested is accepted it must be shown to rest upon a clear basis. In my judgment there is no such basis, and on the ordinary rules of construction the rights of lenders under the Act are in no way interfered with. The operative words in section 2 of the Act (independently of the proviso) seem to me altogether incapable of the meaning sought to be attributed. In terms they give only the capacity to borrow with a view to redemption (a most valuable extension of powers as regards the ratepayers), but that does not profess to give and in my judgment as more fully appears below, is incapable of giving anything more.

There are two, and only two, parts of the section which can be relied upon by the guardians as giving new rights, the rest of the section dealing only with the conditions, subject to which the rights or powers, whatever they may be, are to be obtained and exercised. These are as follows: First, they (the guardians or managers) may apply to the Poor Law Board for an order to enable them to redeem the balance of the loan, and to borrow so much money as may be necessary for that purpose; secondly, and if the said board shall issue their order in that behalf the said guardians or managers may borrow the requisite amount to redeem such balance.

The first part quoted shows the object of the application, and the second the result of an order made upon the application.

In the first part above quoted, the right given is a right to apply. The purposes of the application are, however, carefully indicated; they are to enable them to redeem and to borrow. The one word "enable" governs both "redeem" and "borrow." In itself it has the primary meaning in the case of a person under any disability as to dealing with another of removing that disability, not of conferring compulsory power as against that other. But in such an Act as the present, one of a series which has never dealt with compulsory powers, but has been exclusively concerned with conferring capacity, the presumption already strong in favour of the primary meaning becomes almost irresistible. When we add to this that in order to use the word "enable" for the purpose required by the argument, it must have one meaning in connection with "redeem," and another in connection with "borrowers," it may be said to be fairly demonstrated that the word cannot bear the meaning sought to be attributed to it. But the case by no means ends there. The second part, above quoted, is inserted for the express purpose of explaining and defining the effect of an order made upon an application under part one, and it is confined strictly by removing disability or conferring capacity—the guardians and managers may borrow the requisite amount to redeem such balance. If it had been intended to confer a right of compulsory redemption it seems almost impossible to explain why such an important right should not have been even glanced at when the effect of the order is being stated.

I am quite unable to say as matter of construction that a compulsory power of redemption is here coupled with a mere capacity to borrow, compulsory borrowing is of course out of the question. I think that capacity, and capacity only, is being dealt with here as throughout the rest of the Acts.

But then comes the proviso which has to bear the whole weight of the argument of the guardians. Now, no doubt a proviso may assist in determining which of two reasonable constructions of the clause upon which it is a proviso ought to be adopted, but hardly to give to that clause an entirely different meaning from that which, standing alone, it would bear. At any rate such a controlling force can only be attributed to a proviso when it can be demonstrated to be entirely meaningless on any other supposition. Is that the case with the proviso in this section? I think not. It provides that only in the event (meaning, I suppose, in case) of loans outstanding at the time of the passing of the Act, no such redemption shall take place without the consent of the persons to whom the loans shall be owing. I think that the word "such" is emphatic and important. It means plainly a redemption under and by virtue of the preceding part of the section—that is to say, by money borrowed for the purpose. This seems to me to be the key to the whole proviso. The section itself, on any construction of it, introduces an important power (the power of borrowing with a view to redeem) which had no existence before the passing of the Act. No real consent to a redemption in such circumstances could possibly have been given before the passing of the Act, for no one could foresee that such a change would arise. I read the proviso, therefore, as necessarily referring to and requiring a consent after the passing of the Act. But although no real consent to such a redemption could have been made before the passing of the Act there might have been, and probably were (as hereinbefore shown), consents to anticipatory redemption which, though made with reference to totally different circumstances, would in terms apply to the new state of things introduced by the Act. To allow them to have such an operation would be manifestly unfair. The avoidance of this unfairness would be a reasonable, and is, I think, the true explanation of the introduction of the proviso. Expanded by construction it means, notwithstanding any consent to redemption given before the Act no redemption under the Act shall take effect without a consent given with reference to the new conditions. Of course this explanation would account for the fact that no reference is made in the proviso to loans incurred after the passing of the Act. All such loans would be contracted with the knowledge that the borrowers had, not indeed, a compulsory but a facultative power to redeem, and the parties would be left to make their own bargain as to redemption. If, as in the present case, the contracts and charges excluded the hypothesis of an anticipatory redemption by compulsion that would be enough. If, on the contrary, there was an agreement to accept redemption by anticipation there would be no reason why further consent should be given when the section became operative.

The result is that in my judgment the proviso is intended to place lenders before the Act not in a better but only in the same position as lenders after the Act. Section 3 of the Act, which plainly applies to all loans, whether contracted before or after the passing of the Act, seems to me strongly to confirm the conclusion to which I have arrived as to section 2. It indicates a continuing appreciation on the part of the Legislature of the strict manner in which the powers of redemption of borrowers under the Acts are limited, and the same abstinence from interference with the contractual rights of lenders which is manifest throughout those Acts, and so far as I know in this class of legislation generally. To entitle the borrowers by one and the same Act to pay off a loan compulsorily, it may be twenty or twenty-five years before the time fixed by contract for payment of the last instalment, and at the same time to make the right of paying by half-yearly instead of annual instalments dependent upon the consent of the lenders, would be such an insistance of straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel as could hardly be attributed reasonably to the Legislature. I have assumed that the Government department under section 2 of the Act have nothing to do with the interests of lenders as, of course, is the case, if their authority only extends to increasing the capacity of borrowers. On the other construction the want of notice to the lenders would increase the arbitrary nature of the legislation, if, indeed, anything could be more arbitrary than an enactment authorizing borrowers who have stipulated in terms for a loan to continue for thirty years, to pay off that loan whenever it is to their advantage, without even the usual six months' notice to which an ordinary mortgagee is by law entitled when the day for redemption had passed, or without any notice whatsoever.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. TOD-HEATLEY. (a.)

Nuisance—Vacant land—Deposit of filth—Removal—Duty of landowner — Injunction — Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), ss. 13, 35, 138.

The defendant was the owner of a piece of vacant land in the metropolis. Costermongers and others used the land for the deposit of offal and other kinds of filth, so that it became a nuisance to the neighbourhood. The Attorney-General, at the relation of the vestry of the parish, brought an action to restrain the nuisance.

Held, that there is a common law liability on the owner or occupier of land to abate a nuisance upon his land, and that the Attorney-General was entitled to an injunction to enforce the performance of such duty by the owner or occupier.

Appeal by the Attorney-General from a decision of Kekewich, J.

The action was brought by the Attorney-General at the relation of the united vestry of the parishes of St. Margaret and St. John the Evangelist, Westminster, and by the united vestry of the said parishes for an injunction (inter alia) to restrain the defendants from allowing or permitting a piece of land belonging to them to be in such a state as to be a nuisance or injurious to health.

The land in question was a piece of waste or vacant land situate at the corner of St. Ann's-lane and Great Peter-street, Westminster, and was vested in Sir Henry Moore Brownrigg, one of the defendants, prior to 1894 as trustee for the defendant Tod-Heatley, but since that date as absolute owner. It was alleged that the owner had allowed the hoarding enclosing the land to become very dilapidated, and that the public in the neighbourhood were in the habit of throwing or depositing upon the land all sorts of filth, refuse, and organic matter to such an extent as to create a nuisance and to be injurious to health within the meaning of section 2 (a) and (d) of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891.

The question at issue was whether the duty of cleansing the vacant land periodically and keeping it clean devolved upon the owner Sir Henry Brownrigg or upon the vestry under the provisions of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891.

Kekewich, J., held that the action was properly brought under section 13 of the Act, that there was a nuisance resulting from the deposit by the public of filth and refuse on the land, and that it was the duty of the owner to see that his land was not a nuisance to his neighbours. His lordship, however, having regard to the character of the neighbourhood, refused to grant an injunction to restrain the nuisance on the ground of the difficulty the defendant would have in obeying such an order, and therefore left the vestry, who had the means to remove the refuse, to their powers and remedies under section 35 of the Act.

The Attorney-General appealed.

Warrington, Q.C., and Morton Smith, for the appellant.—Under the Act the sanitary authority is not bound to remove anything but house refuse, and section 35, on which Kekewich, J., relied, contemplates something very different from summary proceedings in a case such as this, where the nuisance is continuing. We come both under our common law rights and under the Act. The injunction ought to have been granted.

They referred to Margate Pier and Harbour Co. v. Town Council of Margate, 20 L. T. N. S. 564.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Ingpen, for the respondent.—We do not admit that if a stranger comes on the land and commits a nuisance the owner is liable. [RIGBY, L.J.—A man has power to interfere with a nuisance committed by his tenant: White v. Jameson, 22 W. R. 761, L. R. 18 Eq. 303.] A distinction is drawn between a thing done by a man or his servants and a thing done by strangers over whom there is no control: see Gandy v. Jubber, 12 W. R. 526, 13 ib. 1,022, 5 B. & S. 78, 485. [LINDLEY, L.J.—I do not think it would be any defence to an indictment to say, "I am doing all I can to prevent a nuisance."] On the construction of the Act the vestry is bound to remove the refuse.

They referred to Saxby v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co., 17 W. R. 293, L. R. 4 C. P. 198; Reg. v. Bradford Navigation, 13 W. No reply was called for.

LINDLEY, L.J.—Looking at the matter from the point of view of the public—that is to say, with reference to the duty of the defendant, and the right of the Attorney-General as representing the public—the case appears to me to be one of the simplest possible description. The defendant is the owner and occupier, or possessor, of a piece of vacant land. It appears to me that it is a common law duty of the owner of a vacant piece of land to prevent that land being a public nuisance. If I turn to the books to which we are accustomed to go for information about such matters as this, the Criminal Law books, and I will take Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, which is one of the best, he says, in his chapter on Nuisances: "It seems that a common nuisance may be defined to be an offence against the public, either by doing a thing which tends to the annoyance of the king's subjects, or by neglecting to do a thing which the common good requires." If the owner of a piece of land does permit it to be in such a state, so smothered or covered with filth, that it is a public nuisance, he commits an indictable offence. He has no defence whatever to an indictment for such a public nuisance. It is no defence to say, "I did not put the filth on, but somebody else did." He must provide against this if he can. His business is to prevent his land from being a public nuisance. One very early authority or illustration of that doctrine is to be found in the case of Reg. v. Watts, 1 Salk. 357. It was an "Indictment for not repairing a house standing upon a highway, ruinous and likely to fall down"—I do not mean across the highway, but near it—"which the defendant occupied and ought to repair ratione tenuræ suæ. The defendant pleaded not guilty, and the jury found a special verdict—viz., that the defendant occupied, but was only tenant at will, and whether he was liable was the question." Then the court said: "The ratione tenuræ is only an idle allegation; for it is not only charged, but found that the defendant was occupier, and in that respect he is answerable to the public; for the house was a nuisance as it stood, and the continuing the house in that condition is continuing the nuisance." That principle has been always followed, so far as I know, in criminal law, and also on information by the Attorney-General representing the public. I cannot for a moment entertain the slightest doubt that it is the common law duty of the defendant to prevent that piece of land from continuing as a public nuisance. That it is a public nuisance is beyond all controversy. Under the circumstances, why is not the Attorney-General entitled to an injunction to restrain the defendant from committing a breach of that duty to the public? It appears to me it is almost a matter of course, unless there are instances to the contrary, which I will consider presently, that the Attorney-General should, on behalf of the public, have an injunction. The mere fact that it puts the wrong-doer to expense, or that it is difficult for him to get rid of it, is no defence in point of law, or any reason at all why the rights of the public should not be enforced.

So much for the common law aspect of the case. But the common law aspect of the case is that which we are to regard by reason of the 138th section of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, which has been so much referred to. That Act, which I will refer to presently at a little more length, gives the sanitary authority, who are here the vestries, power to remove nuisances and to clean streets, and do all sorts of things for the benefit of the public, and amongst other things, I have no doubt under the circumstances which have been referred to, they could proceed against the defendant criminally. But that is an extremely inconvenient mode of proceeding. They have found that so in practice. What does section 138 say? "All powers, rights, and remedies given by this Act shall be in addition to and not in derogation of any other powers, rights, and remedies conferred by any Act of Parliament, law, or custom, and all such other powers, rights, and remedies may be exercised and put in force in the same manner and by the same authority as if this Act had not passed"; that is to say, attending only to the rights of the public, and the Attorney-General as representing the public, saving all his rights and all his remedies. With that section in the Act no section in the Act can oust the jurisdiction of the court to grant an injunction if it be a proper case in other respects.

Now, as to the alleged reasons for not interfering. They are that the vestry is empowered by this Act of Parliament to clean such places as this at the expense of the ratepayers, and even under section 35 at the expense of the defendant himself. I think that is so. Now let us consider upon what principle of justice can the expense of keeping the place clean be thrown upon the ratepayers. It is the common law duty of the owner to prevent it being a nuisance. Why should the ratepayers pay for it? There is a clause in section 35 under which, so far as I can follow it, I think the vestry might have taken proceedings. That is itself an awkward section. It is inconvenient in practice. I do not say that it cannot be made use of, but the machinery of its provisions would have to be put in force constantly, and instead of having one declaration or one injunction there would have to be a heap of different orders—assuming of course, the defendant did not obey and perform the duty which lies upon him. It would be an extremely inconvenient procedure to have recourse to. Under these circumstances I think the existence of that power ought not to influence us in considering whether we should grant an injunction.

Now, look at the matter from a practical point of view. The defendant takes this position, which one would expect from any gentleman. He has fought for his rights. He finds the law is against him. He says, "Do not grant an injunction against me, I will make some arrangement with the vestry by which they shall keep this place clean at my expense." That was perfectly right and proper. Nobody wants to put him to greater inconvenience than necessary; therefore, I do not think it is necessary now, for the sake of the public or anybody else, to grant any injunction, but he must accept the consequences of being in the wrong, and that which we propose to do is to discharge the order, make the declaration (as stated below), and the defendant must pay the costs which have been incurred—not the whole costs, but the costs of the action so far as it was dismissed against him, and the costs of this appeal.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—It is proved undoubtedly that a public continuing nuisance to the danger of the inhabitants of the district exists upon the land of Sir Henry Brownrigg. The point is taken that Sir Henry Brownrigg is under no duty to abate that nuisance. It seems to me it is perfectly clear, in addition to what my learned brother Lindley said in one or two cases on this point, that where an owner and occupier, which Sir Henry Brownrigg is, is possessed of land, and upon it there is a continuing public nuisance which is dangerous to the health of the inhabitants, there is a duty cast upon the owner of that land to abate that nuisance; and the judgment of Lord Blackburn, in Reg. v. The Bradford Navigation, is very apposite to the point I am now upon. If that case is looked at carefully it is an indictment against the Bradford Canal for a public nuisance. I find it is "an indictment for a public nuisance by collecting, impounding, and keeping exposed on the 1st of July, 1864, and thence continually until the 10th of August, 1864, in the Bradford Canal at Bradford, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, large quantities of foul liquid, filth, sewage, and polluted water." It went down for trial, and judgment was given for the Crown, subject to a special case. The defence set up to this indictment was that when the canal was first supplied with water from the Bradford beck, the water of the canal was pure; and that the beck had been polluted by somebody else, and so it was that the defendants got their canal into such a state of public nuisance for which the indictment was brought. That is the history of the case shortly. In this state of things what does Lord Blackburn hold? He says: "There is no precise authority in point, and we must have recourse to the general principle of law. Persons who maintain their property so as to be a public nuisance are indictable." I will pause there. What did Sir Henry Brownrigg do? Is he maintaining this property so as to be a public nuisance? Of course he is. I have no doubt this part of the case is perfectly true; that he is indictable. "And the question in the present case which concerns the occupiers, the lessees of the canal"—they were the persons indicted—"is whether they, having maintained and kept part of it in such a state as to be a public nuisance, there is anything which prevents them from being indictable." He said: "You are indictable, there is a case against you, how do you get out of it?" I am paraphrasing this part of the judgment. Then they said: "The statute allowed us to bring the beck into our canal. Some people upon that beck have been polluting it, and hence it is that our canal is in the state you complain of." The learned judge points out that if the statute has compelled the company to take that beck, and put the obligation upon them, that might be an answer to the indictment, because they are doing what the statute compels them to do, but he points out that inasmuch as the statute only authorized them to take that beck into their canal, that is no answer to the position they are in. They had a public indictable nuisance upon their premises, and he held, like the rest of the court, that the indictment was good, and he held they must be convicted, and they were convicted. That is very apposite to the point we have to decide here. Then I come to read the other case to which I have been referred: the Margate case, before Lush and Hayes, JJ. There there was an indictment against the authority for having a nuisance of seaweed upon their foreshore. It was a continuing public nuisance. Lush, J., said: "I have no doubt whatever that it is the duty of the appellants to prevent the accumulation of seaweed so that it shall not become a nuisance, and that, whether produced by natural or artificial causes"—that would be if throwing the rubbish over the paling—"they are bound to remove all matter in the harbour which is a nuisance or injurious to health." These authorities, and the authority to which Lindley, L.J., has referred, appear to me to dispose of the first point taken—namely, that there is no duty upon Sir Henry Brownrigg to prevent this piece of land from continuing to be a public nuisance, dangerous to health.

Now, what is the next point that is taken? It is said, as I understand: "But you, the vestry, ought to have done this under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891." I will deal with the section in a moment; but if that had been the defence, is not that exactly the defence raised in Reg. v. The Bradford Navigation? It was raised, and this is how Lord Blackburn dealt with it. He said: "Inconvenience to the public and to the company may be occasioned if, from the want of pure water, the supply of water in the canal runs short; but that can afford no justification for the defendants creating a nuisance. It throws on them the necessity of taking legal steps to compel the Local Board of Health to do their duty in cleansing the beck, or, if that be found an inefficient remedy, to obtain a private Act of Parliament for the purpose." Supposing the argument on behalf of Sir Henry Brownrigg was right, namely, that it was the duty of the vestries to clear this piece of land, what answer is that to the information of the Attorney-General, who says there is a public nuisance which exists on the defendant's land which he is bound to abate? None at all; for, as Lord Blackburn points out, if it be the duty of somebody else, it is the defendants' duty to make them perform their duty. I doubt very much myself whether or not Mr. Renshaw with all his ingenuity is able to make out that it is the duty of the vestry to do this cleansing under either section 30 or 35. He only gets the cleansing by reason of reading in, the interpretation clause, and by reading in the interpretation clause I admit he does bring this case within the sections I have mentioned; but we ought not to overlook this fact, that in the interpretation clause, section 141, it says "In this Act unless the context otherwise requires." I think the context in section 30 or section 35 is repugnant to the introduction of the words contended for. Although I am not necessarily deciding it absolutely, I doubt very much whether these authorities—that is, the vestries—can be forced to do what it is contended they could be forced to do.

But be that as it may, that is no answer to the information of the Attorney-General, because if you read section 13 and section 138, one or the other, or both, it seems to me the jurisdiction of this court on information by the Attorney-General is left absolutely untouched. Section 13 says: "The sanitary authority may, if in their opinion summary proceedings would afford an inadequate remedy, cause any proceedings to be taken against any person in the High Court to enforce the abatement or prohibition of any nuisance liable to be dealt with summarily under this Act." That would seem to show their position if they go to the Attorney-General and get him to take proceedings as he has done in the present case. If not, section 138, which I am told was not called to Kekewich, J.'s, attention, seems to me to be conclusive of the subject. That section says: [His lordship read the section, and continued:] Therefore, as far as this relation by the Attorney-General is concerned, the case may be dealt with as if this Act had not been passed, as the Legislature says, and therefore, there being this continuing public nuisance upon the land of Sir Henry Brownrigg, on the information of the Attorney-General, he is bound to abate it, and an injunction ought to go.

I wish to add one thing. A good deal has been said about the impossibility of Sir Henry Brownrigg being able to obey the injunction. The injunction is not going at present, as Lindley, L.J., has said, and I quite agree. But if this had been used as a market garden and occupied as a market garden by Sir Henry Brownrigg I think he would have found means to prevent the nuisance without any difficulty at all. I am of opinion the appeal should be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—In this case, down to the present time, Sir Henry Brownrigg had denied his liability to abate the nuisance occurring on his property. It is argued, in addition to that denial of liability, that because the vestry deny their liability, he is entitled in some way or other to leave the nuisance to continue, or at any rate an injunction should not be granted against him. Upon those points I think he is entirely in the wrong. There is a common law liability in the owner or occupier of land to abate a nuisance arising upon his land, and whenever he becomes aware that there is a nuisance at once the duty arises. In some cases a man subjects himself to indictment—as for instance, being not the owner but a tenant at will only, as in Reg. v. Watts—if he allows a nuisance to remain upon the land of which he is occupier, in the shape of a dangerous thing. What is there peculiar in that? Mr. Renshaw tried to distinguish that case because of the ownership. I do not think the tenant at will is owner in any sense, or that that makes a substantial difference. The defendant in that case was there as tenant at will, and there was the dangerous structure. If it fell down it might injure someone passing by. I cannot, in point of principle, distinguish a case of dangerous structure and a nuisance in the nature of injurious effluvia that come from the land. It seems to me when you take the common law point of view there is only the alternative of allowing the nuisance to go on indefinitely, or making liable the only person who can abate the nuisance, whether the owner or occupier; so I have no doubt about the existence of that common law liability.

In reference to the next point, that the position is altered by the statute, reading section 138—which, by the way, does not appear to have been called to Kekewich, J.'s, attention—it appears to me that that argument, without further enquiry, must fail. The statute says that you are to have the same remedies as though the Act had never been passed; that is to say, you are to have all your common law remedies as though this statute, at any rate, was not in existence. That means that you are to disregard for the purpose of remedy everything that there is in this statute. Now I do not mean to say that if it were clearly shown that the vestry had been acting in a really vexatious manner, that that might not be taken into consideration. I do not find that at all. I asked for any clear admission that had ever been made by Sir H. Brownrigg that he was liable, and there is none to be found. Under these circumstances we do not really need to consider the difficulty in which he may be placed if an injunction is granted. He has not tried to do anything really practicable to get rid of this nuisance. I cannot imagine that that flimsy sort of hoarding that he has put up and allowed to be pulled down, is to any extent, what you might call a serious attempt to prevent the nuisance. He has gone upon the ground he is not liable and the vestry is, and that has been the case really down to the present time. I think a declaration that the Attorney-General is entitled to an injunction, and giving liberty to apply is the best way of settling the contention. No doubt it will lead to something which will render an injunction unnecessary.

Appeal allowed.

The order was as follows: Discharge the order appealed from and allow the appeal. Declare that the defendant, Sir H. M. Brownrigg, was legally bound to prevent the piece of land in question from continuing to be a public nuisance, and that the Attorney-General was entitled to an injunction to enforce the performance by him of such duty. Liberty for the Attorney-General to apply to the judge for such an injunction if necessary. The defendant to pay the costs of the action so far as it was dismissed against the defendant without costs, and also to pay the costs of the appeal.

Administration of assets—Crown debt—Specialty and simple contract creditors—Hinde Palmer's Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 46).

The object of Hinde Palmer's Act, 1869, is only to put specialty and simple contract creditors on an equal footing inter se for purposes of distribution, but it does not affect any other rights and priorities that may exist, nor does it bind the Crown in any way. Where, therefore, a testator died leaving assets sufficient, after the payment of his specialty debts in full, to pay a simple contract debt due to the Crown which before the statute would have had priority over other simple contract debts, but been postponed to the specialty debts,

Held, that the assets ought, in the first place, to be divided rateably between the specialty and simple contract creditors, and that the payment of the Crown debt ought to be borne by the fund for the payment of the simple contract creditors.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

In re Williams, Williams v. Williams, 21 W. R. 160, 15 Eq. 270, distinguished.

This was a summons taken out by certain specialty creditors of the testator in an action for the administration of the testator's estate to have it declared how, as between the specialty and simple contract creditors, the payment of the sum of £3,733, being a Crown debt due from the testator as legal personal representative and residuary legatee of a deceased relative, ought to be borne, regard being had to the provisions of the statute of 1869.

The Crown debt in question consisted of unpaid probate duty and unpaid legacy duty which ought to have been paid in or about the year 1874. Doubts having arisen as to whether the Crown had not lost their right to recover the same, the court had sanctioned an arrangement which in effect was a compromise of the claim of the Crown, and an order was made for payment to the Crown out of moneys in court of the sum above mentioned, without prejudice to the question how the debt should ultimately be borne.

The testator died in the year 1891, leaving assets amounting to about £114,000.

His gross liabilities exceeded the sum of £274,000, including specialty debts amounting to £17,980, the Crown debt of £3,733, and other simple contract debts amounting to £253,000. A dividend of 7s. 6d. in the pound had already been declared, and it was anticipated that a further dividend would shortly be declared. Before the Act of 1869 the Crown was entitled to be paid the debt of £3,733 after all specialty debts, but before any simple contract debts.

It was admitted that this right had not been affected by the statute, and the assets being sufficient for payment of the Crown debt in full after satisfying all specialty debts, the Crown debt was paid in full accordingly.

G. Hastings, Q.C., and Cunliffe, for the specialty creditors.—The statute of 1869 put specialty and simple contract creditors on equality, but does not affect the Crown. Here the Crown is a simple contract creditor in respect of this debt (In re Henley, 26 W. R. 885, 9 Ch. D. 469) and is entitled to priority over the other simple contract creditors, but has no priority over specialty creditors. The cases of In re Jones, Calver v. Laxton, 34 W. R. 249, 31 Ch. D. 440; and Wilson v. Coxwell, 23 Ch. D. 764, 32 W. R. Dig. 82, were cases of retainer by an executor, and we submit that these cases are analogous to the present, and the principle there laid down ought to be followed here. The application of the principle here gives the specialty creditors some advantage, and it is said that this is contrary to the statute, but that difficulty was also raised in these cases. The statute only says there shall be no priority in respect of a specialty debt. Retainer is merely a matter of preferential payment. In the same way the Crown here has a preferential payment (In re Henley). The statute does not abolish the distinction between specialty and simple contract debts, but only the priority of payment by reason of one debt being specialty and the other simple contract. In re Briggs, 38 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 662, W. N. 1894, p. 162.

Buckley, Q.C., and T. T. Methold, for the simple contract creditors.—As regards the point that the Crown is not bound by the statute we submit that the Crown gets the benefit of the statute, and therefore obtains priority over both specialty and simple contract creditors: In re Williams, Williams v. Williams, 21 W. R. 160, L. R. 15 Eq. 270. The right of retainer by an executor really stands on a different footing. Retainer is not payment, and that is the reason of the decisions in In re Jones, where In re Williams was distinguished, and Wilson v. Coxwell. The Crown having been paid, there are only two classes of creditors before the court, the specialty and simple contract creditors; of these the specialty creditors are setting up a claim to be paid more than the other creditors by reason of their being specialty creditors, but their priority has been expressly taken away by the statute. Section 3 of the Intestate Estates Act, 1884, would seem to imply that the Crown has no priority at all. [STIRLING, J.—I do not think that section applies.]

Davenport, for the executors.

G. Hastings, Q.C., in reply.—In re Williams does not govern this case for the reasons given by Kay, J., in In re Jones. [STIRLING, J.—I have some difficulty in grasping the distinction.]

Cur. adv. vult.

March 17.—STIRLING, J., stated the facts, and continued:—The precise point has not as yet arisen for determination, but decisions have been given in two classes of cases, each of which bears a resemblance to the present. The first was that of a simple contract creditor who, after the death of the debtor, recovered judgment against his legal personal representative. By so doing the creditor did not, before the Act place himself in the position of a judgment creditor of the testator, and he gained no priority as against specialty creditors, but it was held that he was entitled as a reward of his diligence to be paid in priority to simple contract creditors who had not obtained a judgment. See Ashley v. Pocock, 3 Atk. 208; Dollond v. Johnson, 2 W. R. 805, 2 Sm. & G. 301. In In re Williams, Williams v. Williams, arose the question of how the position of such a judgment creditor was affected by the statute of 1869, and it was held by Wickens, V.C., that he was entitled to be paid in priority to both specialty and simple contract creditors. The judgment of the Vice-Chancellor is as follows. [His lordship read the judgment, and continued:—] Now it is to be observed that the Vice-Chancellor recognizes that the effect of the statute was only for certain purposes, and to a certain extent to make the mode in which the debt was contracted by the intestate immaterial, but it appears to me that the inference from his language is that he did not consider that among those purposes was included the prevention of a simple contract creditor who had obtained judgment against the legal personal representative of the intestate from obtaining priority over the specialty creditors. That case stands alone.

The other class of cases relates to the right of retainer on the part of a legal personal representative, in respect of a debt due to him from the deceased; a right which can only be exercised in preference to creditors of equal degree. With reference to this right it has been decided in three cases—viz., Wilson v. Coxwell, In re Jones, Calver v. Laxton, and In re Briggs, that the assets must in the first place be divided rateably between specialty and simple contract creditors, and that effect is to be given to the right of retainer in respect of a simple contract debt due to the legal personal representative only out of the portion coming to the simple contract creditors. The grounds for the decision are thus stated by Kay, J., in In re Jones. [His lordship read the judgment from the words, "I think the object of this Act, . . ." to "Equality between them in the case of distribution is the declared purpose," and continued:—] Later he says: "I do not think that a statute, the object of which is to effect equality of distribution, should be construed to give incidentally the power to defeat specialty as well as simple contract creditors."

I understand the case of In re Williams to be there distinguished because, after the death of the testator the creditor had recovered judgment, and had thus attained a higher rank than he had at the time of the death. It is also distinctly laid down that the object of the statute is "only to take away the priority of a specialty creditor over simple contract creditors not to give any of them priority over him." I am not sure that Wickens, V.C., had the same view.

In that state of the authorities I have to say which of them ought to govern the present case; and in my judgment I ought to follow those which relate to the right of retainer. In the first place the creditor now in question has obtained no judgment; and nothing has happened to affect the rank of the debt as it stood at the testator's death, and the position of the Crown resembles more closely that of an executor seeking to retain his debt than that of a simple contract creditor who has recovered judgment from the legal personal representative. In the second place, if there be any difference in the views entertained by different judges as to the object of the statute, that expressed by Kay, J., appears to be that which is in itself preferable, and also that which is supported by the greater weight of authority.

Metropolis management—Street—New street—Adjoining owner—Metropolis Management Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 112.

A private roadway existed before 1855. No new buildings were erected which had access to it after that date.

Held, that the roadway was not a new street within the meaning of section 112 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862, and the adjoining owners were not liable to be charged with the expense of paving it under section 105 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855.

Case stated by justices of the county of London.

A complaint was preferred against the appellant for neglecting to pay the sum of £295 11s. 4d., which was charged upon him as owner of houses or land abutting upon a certain alleged new street known as "Beavor-lane" in respect of the expenses of paving the said street.

The appellant was the owner of the soil of Beavor-lane. Over a portion of the lane there was a public right of footway. The remainder was an entirely private roadway, but vehicles sometimes passed over it, a toll being charged by the appellant if he was aware of their presence. There were movable bars at either end of the roadway. The portion of Beavor-lane on which there was a right of footway was already paved.

On the west side of Beavor-lane there was a public-house, a row of cottages enclosed by a wall, and a warehouse or oil-mill. Neither of these buildings had access to the lane. In front of the wall of the cottages, at a distance of from three to eight inches from it, the appellant had erected a fence, and in front of the walls of the public-house and of the oil-mills, at a similar distance, he had placed rows of posts bearing his own name and the date 1877. There was no evidence as to when the buildings on the west side were erected. The buildings on the east side were erected before 1855, and were not in a continuous line.

The respondents proposed to pave a portion of the roadway, and sought to charge the appellant with the expenses of so doing as the owner of land abutting upon the whole of the west side of Beavor-lane.

The justices held that Beavor-lane was a new street within the meaning of section 105 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and that the appellant, having reserved to himself the narrow strip of land between the buildings on the west side and the fence and posts he had erected, was the owner of land abutting on Beavor-lane throughout its entire length on the west side.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the justices were right in so holding.

C. A. Russell, Q.C. (Mansfield with him), for the appellant.—New street is defined by section 112 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862, thus: "The expression new street shall include all streets hereafter to be formed or laid out, and a part of any such street, and also all streets, the maintenance of the paving and roadway whereof had not, previously to the passing of this Act, been taken into charge and assumed by the commissioners, trustees, surveyors, or other authorities having control of pavements or highways in the parish or place in which such streets are situate, and a part of any such street, and also all streets partly formed or laid out." Beavor-lane was not a new street within the definition. It was not laid out as a street, and no buildings had been built with access to it. The obvious intention was to preserve it as a private way to the appellant's house.

Macmorran, Q.C. (F. Low with him).—The justices have found as a fact that the appellant was the owner of the narrow strip, which he reserved for the purpose of preventing access from the houses on the west side into the lane. It has been decided that the owner of such a strip is chargeable: Williams v. Wandsworth Board of Works, 32 W. R. 908, 13 Q. B. D. 211. Beavor-lane is a new street. It comes within the definition in section 112 of the Act of 1862. For a definition of the word "street" in that Act, reference is made to section 250 of the Act of 1855, which provides: "The word 'street' shall apply to and include any highway, except the carriageway of any turnpike road, and any road, bridge (not being a county bridge), lane, footway, square, court, alley, or passage." The fact that it was not dedicated to the public does not prevent its becoming a new street: Vestry of St. Mary's, Islington v. Barrett, 22 W. R. 402, L. R. 9 Q. B. 278.

CAVE, J.—Two questions are asked in this case: (1) Whether Beavor-lane was a new street? and (2) whether the appellant was the owner of the land abutting on the west side of it? The justices were right as to the second point. There was evidence upon which they might come to the conclusion that the appellant had reserved to himself the narrow strip of land behind the fence and posts he had erected. But with regard to the first point they were wrong.

Beavor-lane was before the Metropolis Management Acts a private road, and there is nothing to show that it has altered its position since. There was no evidence to show that allowing people to pass along it turned it into a new street. No new houses were built with access to it. There is not the slightest difference between its position now and its position fifty years ago, except that the neighbourhood has become more populous. It has never been dedicated to the public, nor has it become repairable by the inhabitants at large. It was an old road, and nothing has been done to make it into a street.

It was admitted that it was not within the primâ facie meaning of the new street as defined in section 112 of the Act of 1862. But it is said that it comes under the words, "streets, the maintenance of the paving and roadway whereof, &c.," and that "streets" in that phrase means streets as defined in section 250 of the Act of 1855. But before a roadway can become a new street, something must have been done so as to make it of the nature of a street. You cannot take the two interpretation clauses together to find the meaning of "new street," because to be a new street the roadway must be used as a street. If the old roadway had been laid out as a street, or turned into a street, it would have been within the definition of "new street," but that is just what has not been done. It is still an old roadway. You cannot dovetail two provisions of an Act of Parliament together so as to make an old road become a new street.

Factory—Workshops—Work carried on in workshop on Sunday—"Open for traffic on Sunday"—Meaning of—Factory and Workshop Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 16), s. 51.

The occupier of a workshop, who was of the Jewish religion, employed a woman of the Jewish religion to work in his workshop on Sunday. The business carried on was the making of buttonholes on garments for tailors, and garments were carried to and from the shop on Sunday in pursuance of prior arrangements; but no arrangements, payments, or settlements were made with any customers or other persons on the Sunday.

Held, that the workshop was not "open for traffic on Sunday" within the meaning of section 51 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878.

Case stated by Mr. Mead, metropolitan police magistrate sitting at the Thames Police Court.

An information was laid by the respondent, an inspector of factories and workshops, against the appellant, who was the occupier of a certain workshop, for that on the 20th of September, 1896, a woman was employed at the appellant's workshop contrary to the provisions of the Factory Acts, and that the workshop was open for traffic on that day, being Sunday.

The magistrate convicted the appellant, and fined him 1s. and 4s. costs.

The appellant was a buttonhole machinist, his business being to make buttonholes for master tailors. He was of the Jewish religion, and having his workshop closed on Saturdays, had availed himself of an exemption under Part 2 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, section 51, which entitled him if he thought proper to employ women and young persons on Sundays, subject, however, to the condition that his workshop should not be open for traffic on Sundays.

The appellant's mode of doing business was as follows: He entered into arrangements with his customers under which he was to make buttonholes on their garments at certain prices. They sent the garments to the workshop and fetched them away when the work was done. The buttonholes were not paid for at the time the work was left, or when it was fetched away, but accounts were kept and settlements were made at times quite independent of these visits. The workshop was open on Sunday in order that such customers might send or fetch garments in pursuance of such prior arrangements; but the workshop was not kept open on Sunday for the purpose of making an arrangement either with an old or a new customer, or for the receipt of work from a casual customer, or for the payment for work already done, or for the settlement of any accounts with respect of work done or to be done.

The appellant employed on the 20th of September, 1896 (being Sunday), in the said workshop a woman of the Jewish religion, as charged in the information.

The magistrate was of opinion that the facts stated brought the appellant's workshop within the words "open for traffic on Sunday," and he convicted the appellant accordingly.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the facts stated brought the appellant's workshop within the words "open for traffic on Sunday."

Section 51 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 16), enacts that "No penalty shall be incurred by any person in respect of any work done on Sunday in a factory or workshop by a young person or woman of the Jewish religion, subject to the following conditions: (1) The occupier of the factory or workshop shall be of the Jewish religion; and (2) The factory or workshop shall be closed on Saturday, and shall not be open for traffic on Sunday."

Channell, Q.C. (Israel Davis with him), for the appellant.—The workshop was not "open for traffic on Sunday" within the meaning of the section. There was a similar provision in section 1 of the Workshop Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 19), so that this legislation is not new. In order that the section may apply, both the employer and the persons employed must be of the Jewish religion. The meaning of the word "traffic" as given in the dictionaries is "trade," and the meaning in this section is trading or trafficking. Persons may work in the workshop on Sunday, but they must not carry on a trading business or a trafficking with the outside world; and what is prohibited by the section is the trading or trafficking with outside persons. Here there was no such trading or trafficking with outside persons. There was the mere carrying of parcels to and from the workshop in pursuance of arrangements made previously; but no arrangements were made with customers or others, and no payments were made on the Sunday. The workshop was, therefore, not "open for traffic" within the meaning of the section.

H. Sutton, for the respondent.—The magistrate was clearly right in convicting the appellant. A workshop is not "open for traffic" within this section only when it is closed to outside persons for all business purposes. All business dealings or intercourse with outside persons must be cut off, though work may be carried on in the shop; otherwise the workshop is "open for traffic" within the section.

CAVE, J.—It is not very easy to construe the words "open for traffic." There is a natural difficulty attending the use of the word "traffic" which makes it difficult to say what is the real meaning of the words "open for traffic." But I think the view the learned magistrate took was rather too narrow. It is obvious that if the things had been done which the magistrate finds were not done in this factory, the factory would have been "open for traffic"; if, for example, people could have come in and out and have given orders as they would on other days, have made their arrangements, enquired the prices, and things of that kind, then there would have been no doubt that the place would have been "open for traffic." I have, however, some difficulty in seeing how that would be so where all that is done is that the things are brought by a person with whom an arrangement had been previously made. I have some difficulty in seeing that, because goods are brought there in pursuance of a business arrangement made on another day, therefore the workshop is open for traffic on a Sunday. The section is not very clear, but, according to the best interpretation I can put upon it, I should say that the workshop was not "open for traffic" if nothing more took place than what has been found to have taken place here. I think, therefore, the conviction ought to be quashed.

Master and servant—Employers' Liability Act, 188 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), s. 1, sub-section 1—Defect i condition of machinery—Absence of safeguard.

The temporary absence of a movable guard or shutt which had been provided to afford protection from circular saw, held to be a defect in the condition o machinery within the meaning of section 1, sub-secti 1, of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880.

Appeal from a decision of a Divisional Court on a appeal from a county court.

The action was brought under the Employe Liability Act, 1880. The plaintiff claimed that was entitled to compensation, first, under section sub-section 1, for injury caused by reason of a defe in the condition of the machinery used in the defe dants' business; and secondly, under sub-section for injury caused by reason of the negligence o person in the service of the defendants, to wh orders he was bound to conform.

The plaintiff was engaged in working at a circu saw in the defendants' saw-mills with a fell workman named Cook. The saw revolved o bench, the lower part of the saw being under bench. The saw-bench had been furnished wit movable shutter, or lid, made to cover the lower part of the saw, for the purpose of protection, which was taken off from time to time in order that the sawdust which collected under the bench might be removed. On the day of the accident this shutter was not fixed to the bench, having been taken off by Cook and not put back again. There was evidence that Cook was the person entrusted with the duty of seeing that the shutter was in its proper place. The plaintiff, while acting in accordance with instructions given him by Cook, slipped and fell under the bench, and was severely injured by the revolving saw.

The county court judge held that there was no evidence of any defect in the condition of the machinery, but left to the jury the question whether the defendants were liable under sub-section 3. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for £128.

Both the plaintiff and the defendants appealed to the Queen's Bench Division. The Divisional Court (Wright and Bruce, JJ.) held that the temporary absence of the shutter amounted to a defect in the machinery within the meaning of sub-section 1, but that there was no evidence on which the defendants could rightly be held liable under sub-section 3.

Both appeals were therefore successful.

The defendants appealed to the Court of Appeal, and the plaintiff gave notice of cross-appeal.

Jelf, Q.C., and H. Lynn, for the defendants.

Cyril Dodd, Q.C., and W. Addington Willis, for the plaintiff.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In my opinion there must be a new trial upon both the points which have been raised in the action. The first point is whether the county court judge was right in holding that there was no defect in the condition of this machinery. The machinery was a saw-bench; that is, it consisted of the circular saw and the whole bench, and the working of it was not confined merely to turning the saw and putting planks on the bench and passing them through the saw, but included also the removing of the sawdust. The machine was furnished with a guard which kept the sawdust in, and which, while the machine was in motion, protected any person standing by from being caught by the saw. When it was necessary to remove the sawdust the guard had to be taken off. In my opinion, if the guard was allowed to remain off, and if the machine was put in motion without the guard, the machinery might be said to be in a defective condition, and if by reason of such defective condition a workman sustained injuries, the owners might be liable. But in order the render the owners liable it is necessary that the defective condition should have been brought about by the negligence either of the owners themselves or of someone entrusted by them with the duty of seeing that the machinery was in proper condition. There is evidence that Cook was a person entrusted with the duty of seeing that the guard was in its proper place, and that he knew it was not in its proper place. Therefore the question whether the defendants are liable under sub-section 1 ought to be left to a jury. I think there is also evidence on which the defendants might be held liable under sub-section 3, and this question, too, ought to go to the jury.

The case must therefore go back to be tried again.

After the commencement of the voluntary winding up of a limited company T., the holder of certain shares not fully paid up, transferred them, with the consent of the liquidator, to P., whose name was substituted for that of T. on the register of members, and P. afterwards, with the like consent, transferred them to R., whose name was substituted for his on the register. It subsequently became necessary to make calls in respect of the shares.

Held, that R. was the proper person to be upon the register of members; that he alone should be upon the A list of contributories; and that T. and P. ought both to be on the B list.

Appeal from a decision of Vaughan Williams, J., reported [1896] 2 Ch. 851.

The National Bank of Wales was registered under the Companies Act, 1862, with limited liability. Its shares were not paid up in full.

By a confirmatory resolution dated the 12th of June, 1893, it was resolved to wind it up voluntarily with a view to its amalgamation with another bank.

At that date Taylor held thirty £20 shares in the bank.

On the 29th of November, 1893, he transferred them to Phillips with the assent of the liquidator, who registered the transfers, cancelled Taylor's certificate, issued a fresh certificate to Phillips and thereupon placed Phillips's name upon the register of shareholders in place of Taylor's.

On the 24th of May, 1894, Phillips transferred the shares to Rickards with the assent of the liquidator, who observed the same formalities as on the occasion of the former transfer, placing Rickards' name upon the register in place of Phillips's.

Eventually it became necessary to make calls in respect of the shares, and the liquidator put Taylor, Phillips, and Rickards all upon the A list of contributories.

These gentlemen thereupon applied to the court to have their names removed from the list. The case was a test case, each of the gentlemen named being representative of a class of persons having a like interest with himself in shares of the company.

Vaughan Williams, J., being of opinion that the liquidator had power to assent to a transfer of shares and to alter the register of members, but not to release from liability a transferor liable as a contributory at the commencement of the winding up, held that Rickards should be left on the register of members, but that Taylor alone should be on the A list of contributories, though Phillips and Rickards would be liable to indemnify their respective transferors, and should therefore be on the B list.

Against this decision Taylor appealed.

Levett, Q.C., and Macnaghten, for Taylor.—Taylor is no doubt a "member" of the company within the definition in section 23 of the Companies Act, 1862. He is not, however, a "present" but a "past" member within section 38, and therefore he ought not to be on the A list of contributories, though he may be on the B list. Though he transferred his shares after the commencement of the winding up, he did so with the consent of the liquidator. On the true construction of section 131 such a transfer has all the effect of an ordinary transfer, and is valid, even so far as it may involve an alteration of status. That section is analogous to section 153, which deals with the case of a winding up under the supervision of the court, and provides that every transfer of shares made between the commencement of the winding up, and the order for winding up shall, unless the court otherwise orders, be void. The latter section does not invalidate a contract to transfer shares made in the interval, or a transfer made after the winding-up order: Rudge v. Bowman, L. R. 3 Q. B. 689; Cleve v. Financial Corporation (Limited), 21 W. R. 839, L. R. 16 Eq. 363, 380. It is implied in the decision in In re Onward Building Society, 40 W. R. 26, [1891] 2 Q. B. 463, that in a compulsory winding up the court has power to sanction transfers, and in a voluntary winding up it must be presumed that the liquidator has a similar power. The expressions "present member" and "past member" in section 38 do not refer to the commencement of the winding up, but to the time when the list of contributories is settled. The section does not mean that the character of the membership is to be irrevocably fixed at the former period of time, and the contention that it does is not borne out by Webb v. Whiffen, L. R. 5 H. L. 711, and In re Hull and County Bank, Burgesses' case, 28 W. R. 792, 15 Ch. D. 507, 512, which were relied upon in the court below. A member who has validly transferred his shares cannot be put upon the list of contributories: In re Joint-Stock Discount Co. (Limited), Fyfe's case, 17 W. R. 978, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 768.

Buckley, Q.C., and Ingpen, for the liquidator.—Taylor, Phillips, and Rickards should all be upon the A list. Taylor was liable to be put upon that list at the commencement of the winding up, and he still remains under the same liability. The alteration in status which is rendered void by section 131, is any alteration in liability to contribute: In re Oriental Commercial Bank, Barge's case, L. R. 5 Eq. 420, 16 W. R. Ch. Dig. 66; In re Continental Bank Corporation, Castello's case, L. R. 8 Eq. 504. A shareholder by transferring his shares after the commencement of the winding up does not escape from his liability to contribute: In re Imperial Land Co. of Marseilles, Vining's case, 19 W. R. 173, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 96. It is implied in section 38 that the commencement of the winding up is the time when it is to be determined who are present and past members. It is only by applying to the court under section 138 that the liquidator has power to discharge a transferor's liability. Rickards was on the register of members at the time when the list of contributories was settled. By taking a transfer of the shares during the winding up he incurred a new liability different from that of Taylor. He stepped into Taylor's shoes and covenanted to pay the amount due upon the shares. Apart from the Act altogether, the company might sue him on his contract. He is liable under section 16, even if he is not liable under section 38. Phillips, by allowing his name to be put upon the register, covenanted to pay the calls. Under section 75 he became liable for a present debt payable at a future time. Several successive holders of the same shares may be liable as past members: Kellock v. Enthoven, 22 W. R. 322, L. R. 9 Q. B. 241, 247. If only one of these persons can be put upon the A list, Taylor should be put upon it.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for Phillips.—Phillips is not a present member, and therefore should not be put upon the A list. Section 22 authorises a member to transfer his shares. A transfer is valid as between the parties thereto: In re Blakeley Ordnance Co., Lumsden's case, 17 W. R. 65, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 31; Biederman v. Stone, 15 W. R. 811, L. R. 2 C. P. 504; and the liquidator's consent makes it valid against the company and entitles the transferee to be substituted for the transferor on the register of members: see In re Onward Building Society. Section 131 does not invalidate an alteration of status so far as that is involved in a transfer with the sanction of the liquidator. Neither is Phillips a past member. On the true construction of section 38 those only are "past" members who were members prior to the commencement of the winding up: In re Hull and County Bank, Burgesses' case. The cases relied upon on behalf of the liquidator do not support his contention.

Farwell, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for Rickards.—To be liable as a contributory under section 38 a person must be either a present or past member of the company. To be a member, he must be properly on the register. Rickards ought not to have been put upon the register. The liquidator has power to consent to a transfer of shares, but he has no power to rectify the register corresponding to that given to the court by section 98: Lindley on Companies, 5th ed., p. 748. There can be no alteration of status except by rectification of the register. In a compulsory winding up, even after the date of the order, the register cannot be rectified by the insertion of a transferee's name without the sanction of the court: In re Onward Building Society. Three successive holders of shares cannot all be liable in respect of the shares at one time.

Sheldon, for the Metropolitan Bank of England and Wales.

Levett, Q.C., replied.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question raised on this appeal is—Who ought to be put on the list of contributories of a company being wound up voluntarily, when after the commencement of the winding up shares have been transferred with the consent of the liquidator? Is the person to be on the A list the transferor or the transferee; or, are both to be on that list; or, is the transferee to be on the A list and is the transferror to be on the B list? This is the general question, and it turns on the true construction of section 131 of the Companies Act, 1862, a section which applies to all companies which are being wound up voluntarily, whether they are registered with limited or unlimited liability, and whether the shares are fully paid up or not.

The National Bank of Wales was formed and registered under the Companies Act, 1862, with limited liability. Its shares were not paid up in full. Resolutions were passed to wind it up voluntarily with a view to transferring its business to another limited company. At the commencement of the winding up Mr. Taylor was the registered holder of thirty shares. On the 29th of November, 1893, he transferred them to Phillips with the assent of the liquidator. This transfer was duly registered by the liquidator. Taylor's name was removed from the register, and Phillips's name was put on it. Taylor's certificate was cancelled, and a new certificate was issued to Phillips. All this was done by the liquidator. On the 24th of May, 1894, Phillips transferred these shares to Rickards with the assent of the liquidator, and the same formalities were gone through by the liquidator as on the former occasion. These transfers were sanctioned as part of a scheme of arrangement approved by the liquidator, and the propriety of which is not in question. If, therefore, the liquidator had powers to assent to these transfers and to give effect to them in the usual way by registering the transferee as a member in the place of his transferror, it will follow that both Taylor and Phillips have ceased to be members and Rickards has become a member in their place. The consequence of this on the same supposition would be that Rickards would be liable to be placed on the list of contributories as the member liable to future calls if any should be made in the winding up, and that Phillips and Taylor would only be liable to be put on the list as persons who had been, but had ceased to be, members. If, on the other hand, the liquidator had no power to assent to the transfer and to give effect to it by substituting the transferee for the transferor as a member, it would follow that Taylor ought to be still on the register and to be on the list of contributories accordingly, as a continuing or present member.

Vaughan Williams, J., has come to the conclusion that the liquidator had power to assent to the transfers and to alter the register of members, but that he had no power to release Taylor from the liability which he was under at the commencement of the winding up. The learned judge, therefore, has left the register as the liquidator altered it—i.e., has left Rickards on it as the existing member, but has put Taylor alone on the list of contributories. I confess I cannot think that this is right. The commencement of the winding up of a company is a very important date, whether the company is being wound up by the court, or voluntarily, or subject to supervison. Subject to what the statute allows to be done after that time, nothing can be done after that date to prejudice the creditors or to alter the rights or liabilities of the then members. Moreover, persons who have ceased to be shareholders for one year or more before that date are under no liability to contribute to the debts or liabilities of the company. (See section 38, clause 1.) But certain things are allowed to be done after that date, and amongst other things allowed are transfers of shares in companies being wound up voluntarily, if such transfers are made to or with the sanction of the liquidators of such companies. (See section 131.) But what is meant by a transfer of a share? The word "share" does not denote rights only, it denotes obligations also; and when a member transfers his share he transfers all the rights and obligations as a shareholder as from the date of the transfer. He does not transfer rights to dividends or bonuses already declared, nor does he transfer liabilities in respect of calls already made; but he transfers his rights to future payments and his liabilities to future calls. Again, the power given to liquidators by section 131 to sanction a transfer of shares is not a power to sanction a transfer of benefits only, but to sanction a transfer of all those rights and obligations which together constitute what is called a share. This appears to me to be so plain that I cannot suppose anyone could doubt it if it were not for the words in section 131 "or alteration in the status of the members of the company." I cannot construe these words as nullifying the power of the liquidator to take or sanction a transfer of shares and to register such transfer in the ordinary way. Some alteration in the status of a member other than that occasioned by a transfer sanctioned by the liquidator must here be referred to. The words in question are far from meaningless. They apply to transfers made before the commencement of the winding up and without the sanction of the liquidators, but not then registered. The words also apply to and prevent alterations in liability and status by agreements not involving transfers—e.g., such an arrangement as was made in Barge's case, L. R. 5 Eq. 420, 16 W. R. Ch. Dig. 66. Also alterations in the status or liability of members under a company's articles of association providing for forfeiture or cessation of membership and liability in the event of winding up. Other cases, which do not at present occur to me, might possibly arise in practice. The words are evidently put in to hit transactions not authorized by the words which precede them.

It is said that section 38 presents a difficulty in putting on the list of contributories, either as a present or a past member, any person who was not either a present or a past member at the commencement of the winding up. It is said that neither Phillips nor Rickards can be put on the list, they not being at that time either present or past members; and that Taylor, who was then a present member, must be put on the list as such. I admit that this view would be correct if there were no provisions in the Act permitting transfers after the commencement of the winding up. I have no doubt that the expression "all present and past members" has reference to the commencement of the winding up. But the expression is not confined to them. There is no definition or language in section 38 so rigid as to prevent transfers authorized by section 131 or section 153 from operating so as to render the transferees liable as present members and the transferors liable as past members. The court has frequently put on the list of contributories as present members persons who have agreed to buy shares before the commencement of the winding up, but who, not having been registered at that time, were not then present members of the company. Fyfe's case, 17 W. R. 978, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 768, is one of many instances in which this has been done. In all these cases the transferors who were present members at the commencement of the winding up have been struck off the list of contributories as present members, but no one ever doubted their liability to be put on it as past members. These cases show that section 38 presents no difficulty in giving effect to whatever transfers or alterations of status are permitted by other sections of the Companies Act, 1862. No doubt clause 1 of section 38 can have no application to members who transfer their shares after the commencement of the winding up with the consent of the liquidator, or the court, as the case may be. Such transferors do not escape liability altogether; but there is nothing to prevent them from being treated like all other transferors who are not discharged from liability altogether, nothing to prevent them from being put on what is called the B list. So as regards the transferee, although he is not a present member at the commencement of the winding up, there is nothing in section 38, when taken in conjunction with sections 131 and 153, which prevents him from incurring the liabilities of present members and from being put on the A list of contributories.

Then it is said that the section 133, clause 8, and sections 98 and 35, relating to the settlement of the list of contributories and rectification of the register, prevent the liquidator from rectifying the register and from giving full effect to any transfer which he may have sanctioned. But altering the register so as to make it conformable with a lawful transfer is not to rectify the register under section 35. That section only comes into operation when the company improperly puts on the register a name which ought not to be on it, or improperly refuses to put on the register a name which ought to be on it. To alter the

There is the place where we would expect a line to be drawn, beyond which no change should take place in the liability of the members. The section, however, seems to show that it was not the intention of the Legislature to draw a line. When we come to sub-section (1) we find the commencement of the winding up expressly referred to, but only for the purpose of showing that no past member shall be liable to contribute if he has ceased to be a member for a year before that point of time. I do not find in section 38 any prohibition of dealings which tends to give a restricted construction to section 131. The liquidator having authorized a transfer from Taylor to Phillips, and from Phillips to Rickards, when you are dealing with the question who is to be on the list of contributories, you must consider who are present and who are past members. In my opinion Rickards is the present member and Taylor and Phillips are past members. I therefore think that the former should be upon the A list of contributories, and the two latter upon the B list.

Trade-mark—Geographical word—Word bearing a geographical as well as another signification — Word which has become descriptive of a particular article—Assignment of trade-mark where there is no goodwill—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 50), s. 10—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 70.

A word which in its primary signification is not a geographical name may be registered as a trade-mark under section 10 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act of 1888 (which takes the place of section 64 of the Act of 1883), notwithstanding that it has also acquired a secondary signification in which it may be regarded as being a geographical name.

Thus the word "Magnolia" was held not to be incapable of registration by reason of its being used as the name of numerous towns and villages in the United States, seeing that in its primary signification it was not geographical, but had reference to the tree of that name.

A word which has been so used as to become the descriptive name of a particular article of manufacture has "reference to the character of the goods," and cannot be registered as a trade-mark.

Thus the word "Magnolia," which was the only name for a particular metallic alloy, was held disqualified for registration.

By section 70 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act of 1883 a trade-mark can be assigned "only in connection with the goodwill of the business concerned in the particular goods or classes of goods for which it has been registered, and shall be determinable with that goodwill."

Where, therefore, a trade-mark was registered in Class 6 in respect of "Anti-friction metal bearings," but the registered proprietors carried on business only in anti-friction metal intended for use in bearings, but not in bearings themselves,

Held, that the trade-mark above mentioned did not pass on an assignment by the registered proprietors of their goodwill and trade-marks, seeing that they had no goodwill in bearings to assign; and that the mark ought to be removed from the register.

Motion with witnesses.

In February, 1889, an American company trading under the name of "The Magnolia Anti-Friction Metal Co.," describing themselves as "manufacturers of anti-friction metal," and giving a London address, applied for and they shortly after obtained registration of a trade-mark (No. 86,401) for certain goods in class 6, namely, "anti-friction metal bearings, being parts of machinery being other than horticultural or agricultural machinery." The trade-mark consisted of a representation of a magnolia flower with two leaves.

In June, 1889, the same company, describing themselves as above, but giving as a first address 74, Cortlandt-street, New York, U.S., applied for and subsequently they obtained registration of a second trade-mark (No. 90,573) for the same goods in class 6 as before, the trade-mark consisting of the same representation of a magnolia flower with leaves as before, but with the addition of the words "Magnolia Anti-Friction Metal," stating in their application, "The essential particulars of the trade-mark are the device and 'Magnolia,'" and disclaiming any right to the use of the added words.

In June, 1894, the same company, describing themselves as "manufacturers" simply, and giving their New York address only, applied for and subsequently they obtained registration of a third trade-mark (No. 180,551) for certain good in class 5, namely, "Unwrought and partly wrought metals used in manufacture." This trade-mark consisted of the word "Magnolia" alone.

None of these three trade-marks was claimed as an "old mark" as having been in use before the 13th of August, 1875.

In 1889 a partnership firm was constituted in England under the style of "The Magnolia Anti-Friction Metal Co. of Great Britain," and this firm entered into a contract with the American company, undertaking to purchase from them a certain fixed amount of "Magnolia Metal" per annum as therein stated, and in consideration thereof the American company undertook (inter alia) not to sell either directly or indirectly "Magnolia metal" to any person or firm in Great Britain.

The English firm continued to have the exclusive sale of "Magnolia metal" in the United Kingdom down to 1896, but from time to time their contracts with the American company were varied as to price and quality, only the exclusive use being always reserved to the English company.

In 1894 the persons controlling the American company formed a new American company called the "Magnolia Metal Co.", and the new company claimed to have acquired by purchase from the old company the goodwill of its business and rights, including its trade-marks (which, with the goodwill, were assigned to the new company on the 19th of October, 1896), and took its place as manufacturers and vendors of Magnolia metal; and by a contract made between the English firm and the "Magnolia Metal Co." in that year provision was made for the taking by the English firm of 3,000,000 lbs. of Magnolia metal as therein provided, after which the English firm were to own absolutely all the rights of the American company in the territories (including the United Kingdom) comprised in the contract, and to have the right to manufacture the metal on their own account.

In September, 1895, disputes arose between the English firm and the American company, and the former alleging that they could not obtain a sufficient supply of Magnolia metal from the American company, claimed to have the right to manufacture and sell it themselves, which they accordingly did; and after the Atlas Metal Co. (Limited) was formed in June, 1896 (after the dissolution of the English partnership firm), they did the same thing, the process of manufacture being well known to them.

On the 26th of June, 1896, the Magnolia Metal Co. issued a writ against the Atlas Metal Co. (Limited), against the members of the English firm, and other persons, and obtained an interim injunction against the Atlas Metal Co. (Limited) from using the plaintiffs' trade-mark, trade designs, or any mark or device or design in any way resembling those of the plaintiffs.

On the trial of the action, on the 6th of November, 1896, Collins, J., refused to grant an injunction founded on infringement of the trade-marks, but granted an injunction restraining the Atlas Co. and all the other defendants except one, from selling Magnolia metal without clearly distinguishing it from the metal sold by the plaintiffs.

Prior to the formation of the English firm, the original American company had, by agreement, appointed a Mr. Stanley, a metal merchant at Cardiff (and subsequently his firm of Toywill & Son), their sole agents or importers. Stanley had the management under this agreement, and was supplied by the American company with metal and with gratis samples of bearings to show to intending purchasers. He did not sell any of the bearings supplied to him by the American company, but had a few made by manufacturers at Cardiff by his instructions, and these he, on his own behalf, sold to customers. The metal he received from the company (with the exception of the gratis samples), and which amounted to between one and two tons, he bought absolutely from and paid for to the American company, and then resold on his own account, without accounting, or being held liable to account, in any way to the American company. The agreement was subsequently terminated, and Stanley, on the formation of the English firm, entered its service.

At the date when the trade-marks were registered, "Magnolia" had become the name by which the metal alloy was widely and exclusively known. The composition was originally a secret one, but in 1889 was disclosed by a patent being taken out; and it appeared that it consisted of an alloy of lead, tin, antimony, bismuth, and graphite. The validity of this patent had been put in question by an alleged infringer, and it was not set up in this case.

At the date of the registration it appeared that there were about twenty places in the United States of America bearing the name of "Magnolia," being so called, no doubt, after the magnolia tree, which is very abundant in that country.

Section 10 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act of 1888 (which takes the place of section 64 of the Act of 1883) provides, by sub-section (1) (e), which was the sub-section applicable to this case, that (1) "a trade-mark must consist of or contain at least one of the following essential particulars:" (e) "a word or words having no reference to the character or quality of the goods, and not being a geographical name."

Section 70 of the Act of 1883 says: "A trade-mark, when registered, shall be assigned and transmitted only in connection with the goodwill of the business concerned in the particular goods or classes of goods for which it has been registered, and shall be terminable with that goodwill."

This was a motion on behalf of the Atlas Metal Co. (Limited), asking that the register should be rectified by striking out the three trade-marks.

Bousfield, Q.C., and Wilkinson, for the respondents, raised the preliminary objection that the applicants were not "persons aggrieved" within the statute, but Kekewich, J., overruled the objection.

Warrington, Q.C., and Sebastian, for the applicants.—There are three trade-marks we seek to remove: (1) No. 86,401, registered the 7th of February, 1889, consists of a representation of a magnolia flower, and was registered in class 6 for bearings; (2) No. 90,573, registered the 5th of June, 1889, a magnolia flower with the word "Magnolia" (claimed) and added words (disclaimed) in the same class and for the same goods; (3) No. 180,551, registered in 1894 the word "Magnolia" alone, registered in class 5 for wrought or unwrought metals. As to 1 and 2, we say the American company had no business in bearings in the United Kingdom; that the metal in the bearings was a mere film and not a part of the machinery; and that the trade-marks were acquired by the present American company without any "goodwill." We further say with reference to 2 and 3 that the flower is a mere pictorial representation of the word "Magnolia," which cannot be a good trade-mark, because it is the descriptive name of the metal sold; moreover, it is a geographical name within section 10 of the Act of 1888. Taking the word "Magnolia" first. It is geographical: In re Apollinaris Co.'s Trade-Mark, [1891] 2 Ch. 186, at pp. 202, 221, 39 W. R. Dig. 237; In re Van Duzer, 34 W. R. 730, 35 Ib. 294, 34 Ch. D. 623; In re Sir Titus Salt, Son, & Co.'s Trade-Mark (the "Eboline" case), 42 W. R. 666, [1894] 3 Ch. 166. The word "Magnolia" is expressly claimed in 2, and is therefore an essential part of that mark.

Bousfield, Q.C., Wilkinson, and Newton Crane.—The primary meaning of "Magnolia" is not geographical: ("Trilby" case) Holt v. Saunders, 44 W. R. 369, [1896] 1 Ch. 711. "Trilby" is geographical.

Warrington replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—This is a question of novelty. Notwithstanding the many decisions on the Act, and this particular section of the Act, and in view of the novelty, and the other decisions which do not directly touch it, it is necessarily of some importance, and, to my mind, it is one of considerable difficulty. The respondents have registered—one in class 5 and one in class 6—two trade-marks; I entirely set aside the trade-mark which is first mentioned as not now being under consideration, though I will refer to it directly.

The first registered trade-mark consists of the word "Magnolia," with a device representing the flower of that name in bloom. The second consists of the word "Magnolia" alone. In the first the word "Magnolia" is described as one of the essential parts of the trade-mark. In the second, as I have already mentioned, "Magnolia" itself is the trade-mark, and there is nothing else. It follows that if "Magnolia" is bad both the trade-marks go, one because it consists wholly of "Magnolia," the other because it depends on "Magnolia" as an essential part. The question is whether "Magnolia" can be sustained. It is entirely a question of the meaning of the Act of Parliament construed with reference to decided cases. The Act of Parliament excludes from words that may be properly registered those of a geographical character, but the exact words of the Act which is before my mind, sub-section (1) (e) of section 10 of the Act of 1888 (which takes the place of section 64 of the Act of 1883), are these: "The essential particulars (which are described under (a) (b) (c) (d) and (e)) must be a word having no reference to the character or quality of the goods, and not being a geographical name." Now in one sense, the literal sense, "Magnolia" is a geographical name, and, therefore, if that is the proper sense of the statute, there is an end of the respondent's case, and the applicants are entitled to have the trade-mark expunged. I have been referred to one definition, and one only, of the meaning of this clause in sub-section (e) of the Act. I think others might probably be found, but what Chitty, L.J., said in the Eboline case is sufficient for all purposes: "The object of the Legislature was to prevent a trader from acquiring a monopoly in the name of a place, and from thereby suggesting that the goods had a local origin or a local connection, which, in fact, they might not have." We need not press the matter further, and consider why that seemed important to the Legislature.

What Mr. Warrington says or suggests was the reason is this, that if any trader in a particular place desire to name his goods by reference to his place of residence, or where he carries on his manufacture or business, he would be precluded from doing so, if there was a trade-mark containing the name of that place registered against him, and that that would not, of course, be right. It would no doubt be wrong, I mean in moral justice, that a man living in a small town or village, and having put forward some new article of trade, should not be entitled to connect it with his residence or place of business. That may not impossibly, by any means, be the object of the Legislature. But it is sufficient for my purpose that the Lord Justice's words say what the object of the words of the Act was. Then Mr. Bousfield says that that cannot apply very well to a case like this, where in 1889 some fifteen Magnolias were in existence in the United States, and there are more now, and it cannot be applied to prevent persons living in forty-four different towns—fifteen will do as well for this argument; and I think it convenient first to say that I must try the question as at the date of the registration, and that the subsequent growth or creation or incorporation of towns cannot have any bearing on the subject. If it was a geographical name at the date of the registration, it fails on that ground. If it was not a geographical name at the date of the registration, it seems to me that no one can have a right to have it expunged because some town or place has grown up and been called by that name since the registration.

Those being the words of the Act, and that being the object, am I bound to say that the Legislature meant that whenever a name proposed to be put on the register, or being actually there and sought to be expunged, has a geographical meaning, therefore it must not go on the register, or, being there, it must be taken off, even though its primary meaning may be something quite different, and it may have two or three other meanings, perhaps all of them better known than the geographical meaning? That is, the real question in this case is the question which was illustrated by some remarks made by myself in the the Apollinaris Co.'s case, and which have been cited on p. 204 of [1891] 2 Ch. There, taking up, I suppose, what was said in argument, I instanced or illustrated what I had to say by reference to "Monkey" as connected with soap, and to "St. Paul" as connected with some other goods, I am not sure what. No ordinary person would jump at the conclusion, when he found that soap was called "Monkey," that it had any connection with the one or two by no means large places, or well known to the public, which are called by the name of Monkey. He would naturally consider that it was connected with the inferior animal of that name. Again, as regards St. Paul, no one would suppose, if he came across St. Paul, that any reference was meant other than one to the apostle known by that name. Nevertheless, it may be (and it appears that it is so), that both are geographical names. Of course, if the point had been decided in that case, I should not have been discussing it now, but the point was not decided.

It seems to me that on these lines I have good ground for consideration whether "Magnolia" here is a geographical name in the sense of its being the primary meaning of the word, or that which would occur to the man of ordinary education and intelligence, I mean the Englishman of that character. I am not for a moment putting out of sight that "geographical" extends to the whole of the world, and that if there is a geographical name derived from any part of the globe it will offend against the words of the Act; but still, the persons who are to decide, whether it be a judge or a jury, if there is any question for decision at all, must be Englishmen of ordinary education and intelligence. If there is no question to decide it is because all that you have got to do is to establish, as has been established here, that there are several places known as Magnolia in the United States, and that therefore it is in one sense a geographical name, and there is an end of the whole discussion. If there is any question at all, then I think it has to be submitted to the Englishman of ordinary education and intelligence, and he has to decide whether that is—I will not say even the primary meaning of the word, but—the meaning which would occur to the large majority of people, as that which it would be regarded in ordinary society as bearing. Without going into the evidence I venture to say that a very small proportion of persons of the character I have mentioned would recognize in the word "Magnolia" any reference to any town or place in the United States or elsewhere. On the other hand, though not so common as many other flowers, the magnolia is thoroughly well known to all persons of the character I have mentioned, and if "Magnolia" were mentioned in any ordinary society consisting of persons of fair education, it would be understood at once to refer to the flower. That seems to me to be, I will not say the primary meaning, because primary or secondary are rather out of the question, but the meaning which the word would bear ordinarily to ordinary people. Is there any reason why I should not construe the Act in that way? I admit, and I do not hesitate to say it, I am perplexed by the extreme terseness and literal use of the words "geographical name," but, on the other hand, I do not think I am bound to decide that it was meant by the Legislature that every word that was capable of being treated as a geographical name, but was also capable of being used, and was ordinarily used, among ordinary people as meaning something else, was intended to be referred to as a geographical name. Mr. Bousfield has given me many instances in addition to those which I have noticed above—"Monkey" and "St. Paul." I take for instance "Magnet." I suppose there are few things of which every little boy or girl at school know more than a magnet. It is a thing to which one is introduced in his early youth; and to be told that when a magnet is mentioned it means not that extremely useful article, which may be also made an extremely amusing toy, and useful in that way, but some place, somewhere in America or elsewhere, that we have never heard of, is, I think, rather running the language of the Act of Parliament into an absurdity. I have tried to dismiss from my mind, I hope successfully, but I am by no means sure, one consideration which I mention to show that I have not forgotten it. The first mark registered by the respondents was the magnolia flower, without the word "Magnolia." Then came "Magnolia" and the flower, and then the word "Magnolia" and no flower. I know as a matter of fact in this case that the origin of the series of trade-marks was the magnolia flower. Now, I do not think that has anything to do with it. I think I ought to dismiss it from my mind. I am not sure my mind is capable of the process, but I will endeavour to perform it, and decide it simply on the grounds which I have mentioned. I think it would be going too far, notwithstanding many cases, including the Eboline case, to say that "Magnolia" must be expunged because it is a geographical name. I think, though it is a geographical name—I feel that difficulty—for this purpose it is not a geographical name, but the name of a flower.

Warrington, Q.C., and Sebastian.—Our next point is that the word "Magnolia" has reference to the character and quality of the goods, and therefore cannot be a good trade-mark: Linoleum Manufacturing Co. v. Nairn (Linoleum case), 26 W. R. 463, 7 Ch. D. 834; Waterman v. Ayres, 37 W. R. 110, 39 Ch. D. 29 (Reversi); Leonard v. Ellis, 32 W. R. 530, 26 Ch. D. 288 (Valvoline); In re Harrison, M'Gregor, & Co., 42 Ch. D. 691, 38 W. R. Dig. 198 (Albion); In re Arbenz, 35 W. R. 527, 35 Ch. D. 248 "Gem" Guns).

Bousfield, Q.C., Wilkinson, and Newton Crane, for the respondent. — We are entitled to protection: Powell v. Birmingham Vinegar Brewery Co., 44 W. R. 688, [1896] 2 Ch. 54 (Yorkshire Relish).

Warrington, Q.C., in reply, cited In re Farbenfabriken's Trade-Mark, 42 W. R. 488, [1894] 1 Ch. 645 (Somatose); In re Trade-Mark "Bovril," ante, 150 (Bovril).—On the evidence it is quite clear that "Magnolia" meant a particular alloy of metal, and that alloy has been disclosed by a patent, which is bad, and so anyone can make "Magnolia."

KEKEWICH, J.—The objection now urged depends entirely upon seven words of the same sub-section of the same section of the Act of 1888. The essential particulars must be, according to sub-section (e), "a word or words having no reference to the character of the goods." The exact words of the section are "to the character or quality of the goods," but I have intentionally left out "or quality." I think they are strictly an alternative proposition, and have no connection with character. They are not meant as in any way synonymous, pointing to the same thing, and I am not sure that during the argument my mind has not been wanting in precision by reason of thinking of the two things together. I think they are essentially different. The character and the quality of the goods are necessarily, as it seems to me, when one comes to consider, entirely different in language, and also in substance and practice. I dismiss quality—one might easily illustrate it—and deal only with the character of the goods.

In this case the respondent has, I will not say invented, because that is a word very difficult of construction, but has discovered a new metal to which he has affixed the title or name "Magnolia." He has, as he is entitled to, taken out letters patent to protect, for a limited period, the goods manufactured by him, and he is bound to have set out in the specification a sufficiently full description of the method of manufacture so that any competent workman can produce it when the time for protection expires. That, of course, entitles him to prevent any person during that period, as long as the patent is held good, from manufacturing goods or selling goods of that character, but subject to those letters patent the right of all her Majesty's subjects to make those goods still exists. It is only suspended for a limited period during the currency of the letters patent, and during that time the specification and the process of manufacture may be studied, and at the end of that time the goods may be produced. It is therefore, it seems to me, important that the patentee shall not, by virtue of his patent, be able to lay hold upon any particular class of goods, and be able to say at the expiration of the patent, "That which I have made under the patent until now, henceforth I will protect under a registered trade-mark, or in some other way." It is reasonable to suppose that the Legislature has intended that the liberty of the public shall be preserved in that manner, and that the patent shall only operate during the currency of the patent. There is no reason why a man should not call—at least so I have held—any goods which he has produced "Magnolia," and there is no reason why he should not call a white metal which he produces "Magnolia," but it seems to me that, regarding it from general law, and remembering that the Legislature must be taken to have meant that the general law shall only be interrupted so far as is necessary for the purpose of particular legislation, and so far as the particular purpose is expressed, it seems to me reasonable to conclude that what a man can protect by means of a trade-mark must be something which the public can produce either now, or, if it is in the meantime protected by letters patent, at the expiration of those letters patent. If the respondent's arguments be sound, that position is supported in the present case, because what the respondent makes is a metal to which he has given and which he says has assumed and has gained the title or name of "Magnolia," and he has registered it as "Magnolia." The result is that it is known as magnolia, and nothing else; that any magnolia which is produced is the respondent's magnolia; that anyone who professes to manufacture and sell magnolia will, quite apart from the letters patent, simply under the trade-mark, be acting wrongfully, and be liable to an injunction and other remedies, because he has made that which the respondent has appropriated to himself, that is, magnolia. There are not several kinds of magnolia. Magnolia is not one of a class of white metals. It is what it is described as; it is a white metal named magnolia. There may be, and apparently there are, many other white metals; there are apparently many other anti-friction white metals, but this is a new production to which the name of magnolia is given. The result is that either, if not now, at anyrate by-and-bye, if this white metal can be described only as magnolia, it will probably be so described, unless other persons manufacture it, if nothing happens by reason of what we are told in this affidavit of Mr. Mellor's. It will be described so during the continuance of the letters patent, and it will be continued to be so described after the letters patent have expired, with the result that the respondent will have appropriated to himself the name "Magnolia," not as describing one of the descriptions of anti-friction white metal, but the particular white metal which he produces, and which he has discovered. It seems to me that it cannot have been the intention of the Legislature that that should happen, and I think it comes within the exact words. The character of those goods is described by the name "Magnolia." Whether it is a full and sufficient description in the letters patent or not is not for this purpose material. If it is, then you have the whole description, and it is called magnolia. If you have not, still it is what the respondent makes and calls magnolia. Whichever way it is, what he is protecting is of the character magnolia. It seems to me, therefore, that the respondent unfortunately selected a word which does not fall within the limited terms of the Act of Parliament, and on that ground these two trade-marks must come off. That leaves the flower.

Warrington, Q.C., and Sebastian.—As to the first trade-mark, our first objection is that the magnolia flower is only the equivalent of the word "Magnolia," and as the word "Magnolia" has been found improper for registration as a trade-mark, the trade-mark consisting of a flower must be bad also. We further say that it is registered only in class 6 for bearings by the Magnolia Anti-friction Metal Co. That company had no goodwill in England at all. Certainly none in bearings. Persons here bought in America metal from the American company, but that was all in ingots and was paid for. Subsequently the American company assigned to the present registered proprietors, but the American company had no goodwill in the class, so nothing passed. The facts show that there is no question of agency for the American company, but only an exclusive contract. The object of a trade-mark is to protect a man's trade, here there was no trade or goodwill in the matter of bearings.

Bousfield, Q.C., Wilkinson, and Newton Crane.—The sole use of this metal is for anti-friction bearings, either alone or in combination with a hard metal. The New York company wished to establish a business in this country, and appointed "agents" for the purpose of pushing the business, and these agents were to be paid for it—it does not matter in what way, and the fact that in this case it was by grant of right of exclusive use of metal instead of commission is immaterial. We established a goodwill at the expense of giving Stanley exclusive right to sell the metal. Then comes the partnership which paid Stanley £300 in lieu of his sole right to trade in the metal hereafter. Consequently they stand in his shoes. Suppose the partnership came to an end the goodwill would revert to us, even if for years we sold not an ingot, and we could sell it along with our trade-marks.

KEKEWICH, J.—The only trade-mark remaining to be dealt with is No. 86,401, registered on the 9th of February, 1889. It is in the form of a flower. The first objection taken to it is that that flower is merely the representation of a magnolia; that it must be taken to be equivalent to the word "Magnolia"; and that as "Magnolia" itself has been held to be an insufficient and improper trade-mark, therefore the flower which is its equivalent is also improper.

I cannot follow that argument. Here I have a device or a design, and not a word. It may very well be that this is intended, as we know it is, to be a magnolia, and that any persons of ordinary acquaintance with flowers would recognize it as a magnolia. But there seems to me to be all the difference in the world between a device, however equivalent it may be to a word, and a word itself. Without going further into it I overrule that objection.

The other objection is of an entirely different character. This trade-mark was registered in the first instance, and, I assume, properly registered, by the Magnolia Anti-Friction Metal Co. It has been assigned by that company to the Magnolia Metal Co., which company is now defending this trade-mark. The objection is that there can have been no proper assignment of that trade-mark to the Magnolia Metal Co., because the assignor had not, at the date of the assignment, which was the 29th of October, 1896, any "goodwill of the business concerned in the particular goods or classes of goods" for which it was registered.

Mr. Bousfield has addressed me an argument which is perfectly convincing, to my mind, that the Magnolia Anti-Friction Metal Co. had at the date of that assignment a goodwill in a business. It seems to me that whether you call Mr. Stanley and those who succeeded him agents or sole importers, whatever the particular relation of his was to the company, and how he was remunerated, whatever those details may be, and however they may be accurately described, still, on the determination of that agency or licence or privileges, the business which had theretofore been conducted by them in that representative capacity reverted, as Mr. Bousfield says, to the principals, or the Magnolia Anti-Friction Metal Co., and therefore, they thenceforward had the benefit of the business which had been established in this country, and in that business they had a goodwill. So far I entirely follow the argument, but that does not grapple with the meaning of the statute or the circumstances of the case. The statute says that it shall be the goodwill of the business concerned in the particular goods or classes of goods for which it has been registered. Therefore, in order to sustain the trade-mark, it must be shown that the company had not merely a goodwill in a business of metal manufacturers—but a goodwill in a particular business—namely, that of the manufacture and sale in this country, of metal bearings, the trade-mark being registered simply in class 6, and being for "anti-friction metal bearings, being parts of machinery other than horticultural and agricultural machinery." It is not pretended that the American company ever sold a metal bearing in this country. They were minded to sell their metal in this country, and by means of arrangements between Mr. Stanley and others they succeeded in pushing apparently a considerable business in England. In order, as I understand the evidence, to procure purchasers in this country they sent over to Mr. Stanley, and I suppose also to those who succeeded him, samples of metal bearings, not samples for sale, but samples by way of illustration of the great and advantageous uses to which the metal was capable of being applied. Some of them were bearings not fresh from the manufacturer, but bearings which had been used by railway companies, and were intended to show and convince intending purchasers what a long life these metal bearings had when properly constructed. Mr. Stanley says that the American company were as a fact prepared to supply the bearings themselves, but equally as a matter of fact they never did so, and I have heard of no transaction, no attempt at an order, no attempt at a fulfilment of an order for metal bearings to be supplied by the American company. What happened was this. Mr. Stanley having persuaded divers persons here of the great merits of this metal and its applications to metal bearings, instructed certain manufacturers in Cardiff to produce these metal bearings and then those metal bearings were sold by him or his firm for their own profit, not accounting in any way to the American company. The business so far as there was a business, and so far as there was a goodwill in it in the matter of bearings, was the business not of an American company but of Mr. Stanley and his firm. There was no business done—no business really attempted to be done—however much there might have been if the opportunity had occurred to do it, no business was actually done by the American company. The opportunity did not occur. Therefore, though they had a goodwill apparently of considerable value at the date of the assignment, in the metal, they had no goodwill in the metal bearings. The result is that they had no goodwill in a business—"of a business" is the term used in the statute, "concerned in the particular goods or classes of goods for which the trade-mark was registered." The result is that the trade-mark is incapable of assignment by them. It was really an assignment of a trade-mark "in gross" as the phrase is, and of course it cannot any longer belong to the original company if it still exists, they having attempted to assign it, and it cannot be held by the assignees because nothing passed to them. The result is that that trade-mark like the others must come off, and the respondents must pay the costs.

RYMER v. MCILROY. (a.)

Easement—Right of way—Easement in gross—Covenant with yearly tenant and his "heirs and assigns"—Alteration of grantee's interest in the dominant tenement—Estoppel.

A grant by deed of a right of way to a yearly tenant of the dominant tenement and his heirs and assigns, will not determine by reason of the fact that the yearly tenant of the dominant tenement subsequently acquires the fee in the dominant tenement.

Trial of action.

This was an action in which the plaintiff claimed a declaration that the defendant was not entitled to a right of way over certain land of the plaintiff in Wellesley-road, Croydon, an injunction, and damages.

The facts of the case were as follow:

By an indenture dated the 12th of March, 1869, and made between John Drummond and William Drummond of the one part, and the Warden and Poor of the Hospital of the Holy Trinity in Croydon of the Foundation of John Whitgift, Archbishop of Canterbury (thereinafter called "the said hospital"), of the other part, a piece of land in the parish of Croydon containing 3a. 19p., or thereabouts, was conveyed by the said John Drummond and William Drummond to the use of the said hospital in fee simple. From the date of the said conveyance the said hospital and the governing body thereof had been in undisturbed possession of the said land, which is known as "The Cricket Field."

The said indenture contained a recital that it had been agreed upon the treaty for the purchase of the said land that the said hospital should, immediately after the completion of the said purchase, grant unto the said John Drummond and William Drummond, their heirs and assigns, a right of footway at all times of the width of six feet, for them and each of them, and their and each of their heirs and assigns, and their or any of their agents and servants, and the tenants and occupiers for the time being of the messuages, gardens, and premises coloured pink on the plan annexed, or any part thereof, and all persons going to or from the said messuages, gardens, and premises with the permission of them, or any of them, over and along a footpath on the north side and part of the west side of the said piece of land thereby conveyed, which footpath was distinguished by a yellow colour on the said plan, and which said right of footway was to extend to and into and from any part of the boundary line of the said premises coloured pink from and to and into the said road called "Wellesley-road"; and a further recital that in pursuance and part performance of the said agreement a deed had been prepared and was intended to be executed immediately after the execution of the said indenture now being stated for the purpose of granting such right of way as aforesaid.

Accordingly, by a deed dated the 13th of March, 1896, and made between the said hospital of the one part, and the said John Drummond and William Drummond of the other part, in pursuance of the said stipulation and agreement and in consideration of the said conveyance, the said hospital covenanted and granted as follows:—"The said hospital doth hereby, for themselves, their successors and assigns, covenant and grant with and to the said John Drummond and William Drummond, their heirs and assigns, that it shall be lawful for the said John Drummond and William Drummond, their and his heirs and assigns, and their and each of their agents and servants, and the tenants and occupiers for the time being of the messuages, gardens, and premises coloured pink on the plan in the margin of these presents, and of every part of such messuages, gardens and premises, and all persons going to or from the said messuages, gardens, and premises with express or implied permission by them or any of them, to enjoy and use a right of footway at all times hereafter of the width of six feet over and along a footpath on the north side and part of the west side of the piece of land conveyed by the said recited indenture (i.e., the deed of the 12th of March, 1869) and which said footpath is distinguished by a yellow colour on the said plan drawn in the margin of these presents, and which said right of footway shall extend to and into and from any part of the boundary line of the said premises coloured pink from and to and into the said road called Wellesley-road."

The deed contained covenants for title in respect of the said grant.

At the date of these deeds the land conveyed to the hospital was bounded on the east by the Wellesley-road, on the northerly half of its west side by two pieces of land, one of which was then held by John and William Drummond as lessees for a term which expired in 1878, and the other by John Drummond on a parol tenancy from year to year, which lasted until 1870. These two pieces of land were the premises coloured pink on the plan annexed to the deed of the 12th of March, 1869.

In 1870 John Drummond purchased the fee in the latter portion.

John Drummond died in 1880, having devised and bequeathed his residuary estate (which included the fee simple in this plot) to William Drummond, who died in 1884, having devised and bequeathed all his estate to Elizabeth Drummond, whose devisees, by an indenture dated the 14th of November, 1894, granted and conveyed the same piece of land to Staples in fee, "together with such rights of way belonging to the vendors as tenants or occupiers of the premises hereby conveyed or otherwise at all times over and along the footpath of the width of six feet as was granted by" the indenture of the 13th of March, 1869.

By a lease dated the 29th of May, Staples demised the same piece of land together with the right of way to the defendant.

In 1895 the plaintiffs, who, under a scheme approved by the Queen in Council in 1881, were the governing body of the hospital, commenced the erection of a wall to divide their three-acre field known as the "Cricket Field," from the defendant's land, a portion of which wall the defendant on the 25th of August, 1895, caused to be thrown down, claiming a right of access from his land to, and a right of way across the plaintiffs' field to, the Wellesley-road.

Eve, Q.C., Badcock, and Henderson, for the plaintiffs.—It is not possible to grant a right of way in perpetuity by a use of the words heirs and assigns. The grant of the easement could only operate to vest in John Drummond an interest co-extensive with his interest in the dominant tenement, which was that of a tenant from year to year. Such interest terminated by merger when he purchased the fee in 1870, and the grant can have no application to the new interest which he acquired at that date. If the grant was more than this it was an attempt to create an easement in gross, and this is invalid. The words heirs and assigns cannot assist the defendant.

They referred to Lord Dynevor v. Tennant, 37 W. R. 193, 13 App. Cas. 279; Year Books, 21 Edw. 3, 2, pl. 5; Ackroyd v. Smith, 10 C. B. 164.

Rentoul, Q.C., and Turrell, for the defendant.—The two conveyances must be regarded as one transaction, and the plaintiffs cannot insist on the validity of the conveyance to themselves and treat their own grant and covenant as bad. This was not an attempt to create an easement in gross. It was a covenant to grant a right of way to a person so long as his interest in a certain tenement continued. It was probably in the contemplation of the parties at the time that these deeds were drawn up, that the Drummonds, or one of them, might acquire the fee in the tenement in question.

Eve, Q.C., in reply.—On the question of intention the grant could hardly have been supported if the fee had been purchased after the leasehold interest had determined.

BYRNE, J.—[His lordship first stated the facts of the case, and then continued:] The short point is this. John Drummond was tenant from year to year of a plot of land marked C in the plan on the statement of claim. In 1870 he bought the fee simple in that land. There were some other plots held by the Drummonds on leases which have expired, and with these I have therefore not to deal; confining myself, therefore, to plot C. At the date of the covenant and grant relating to the right of way, John Drummond was only tenant from year to year of that plot, and the argument is that the grant was only intended to give him a right of way while the tenancy lasted, and if that were so, the right would not extend to any subsequent interest that he might acquire in the tenement. But in my judgment, having regard to the use of the words "heirs and assigns" and "at all times hereafter," and the whole tone and tenour of the deed, and in view of the fact that John Drummond shortly afterwards acquired the fee, this cannot be said to be the true construction. It was, I hold, contemplated that so long as the Drummonds or either of them, or the heirs or assigns of either of them, were interested in the tenements in question, the right of way was to subsist. It is not an unfair inference to draw that it was in the contemplation of the parties that the Drummonds might acquire the fee simple. There is no need to dwell on the authorities. The case from the Year Books is no authority in the present case. In that case the grantee of the right of way over land to a mill, of which he was not, at the time of the grant, seised for any estate, afterwards purchased the mill, and it was held that he could not maintain an action against the grantor for disturbing him in this right of way. The point, however, was that the grantee had no interest in the mill when the right of way was granted. Lord Dynevor v. Tennant does not involve the present point. Assuming that it does decide that you must regard a right of way as having been made with reference to an existing interest in a dominant tenement, that does not preclude the question whether, on the determination of such interest, if a larger interest is acquired by the grantee, his right is not continued. The action must be dismissed.

Action dismissed.

Q. B. Div. (Cave and Lawrance, JJ.) March 18.

WILLIAMS AND ANOTHER v. MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF MANCHESTER. (a.)

Local government—Municipal corporation—Burgess—Minutes of proceedings of council—Right to inspect—Committees—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 233.

By section 233 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, a burgess has the right to inspect minutes of proceedings of the municipal council, but the Act does not give the right in terms to a burgess to inspect minutes of proceedings of a committee appointed by the council.

Burgesses of the city of M., being dissatisfied that on the minutes of the council no particulars appeared of the proceedings of committees approved by the council, claimed the right to inspect all minutes of such committees.

Held, that the burgesses had the right to inspect only such minutes of committees as were actually laid before the council for their approval.

Special case.

This was an action brought to obtain an expression of opinion by the Divisional Court as to the nature and extent of the right conferred on the burgesses of a city or borough by section 233 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, to inspect the minutes of the council and those of its committees.

The facts set out in the case were as follow:—The plaintiffs were certain citizens, and the defendants the municipal corporation, of the City of Manchester. The proceedings of that corporation are regulated by the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, which provides as follows by section 233:—"(1) The minutes of proceedings of the council shall be open to the inspection of a burgess on payment of a fee of 1s., and a burgess may make a copy thereof or take an extract therefrom. (2) A burgess may make a copy of or take an extract from an order of the council for the payment of money."

The corporation had from time to time exercised the powers conferred on them by this statute and by various local Acts, and had appointed committees for the transaction of certain business, and the acts of these committees had been submitted to the council for approval, as required by the Act of 1882.

The corporation, under clause B of Schedule II. of the Act, made several standing orders for the regulation of the management of the council. Among them was the following:—"XI. (1) An epitome of the minutes of the several committees of the council shall be prepared each month under the direction of the town clerk and be submitted to the chairman of each committee prior to its being sent to the council."

The minutes kept by the council merely referred to the proceedings of the different committees by stating that the proceedings of a particular committee had been read and approved. Minutes of proceedings of committees are also recorded in books, which are submitted for the approval of the council.

The plaintiffs made an application for an inspection of the minutes of proceedings of the Gas and Rivers Committees, which are referred to in the minutes of the council as having been read and approved during the past two years, and they tendered the fees mentioned in the section. The corporation declined to produce the minute-books of either committee, on the ground that the production of them for inspection would be inimical to the interests of the citizens. They were advised also that it would be inconsistent with public interests to permit an inspection of the minutes of committees as of right in all cases, and as they believed such inspection could not be claimed under the statute, they declined to accede to the plaintiffs' demand.

C. A. Russell, Q.C., for the plaintiffs.—The minutes of the town council had been kept for years past in such a way that it was impossible to ascertain therefrom what the proceedings of committees really were that appeared on the minutes as having been approved. The plaintiffs do not ask the court to direct that the corporation should adopt a different method of keeping their minutes, but to express their opinion that so long as the council thought fit to keep them in the present illusory manner, the burgesses should have the right to inspect the minutes of the committees for the purpose of ascertaining what in fact the proceedings were that the council had approved. The minutes of the council certainly did not give sufficient details of work sanctioned to be done. For instance, the minutes of the corporation would read: "The proceedings of the Watch Commitee having been read, resolved that the same be approved." To ascertain what was approved a burgess must have access to the minutes of the Watch Committee referred to. Again, suppose the Parks Committee recommended the erection of a bandstand at a cost of £250. The minute of the council would give no information whatever, and this was clearly against the spirit of the Act.

Asquith, Q.C. (Macmorran, Q.C., with him), for the corporation.—The corporation do not contest this matter in any contentious spirit, but merely to get guidance from the court. [CAVE, J.—One thing is clear, that under the Act the burgesses are intended to know about the acts of the corporation.] The burgesses have always been allowed to inspect the minutes of committees when such inspection was consistent with public interest, but there were cases when it would be most inexpedient to allow them to see all the preliminary details. [CAVE, J.—They are entitled to ask to be shown what has been approved by the council.] The corporation were willing at once to concede that point, but they desired to keep back from inspection such minute-books of committees as contained preliminary proceedings leading up to the final acts. [CAVE, J.—There I agree with the corporation. But the difficulty is to separate what the burgesses are entitled to see in the minutes, from what they are not.] A practical solution of the difficulty might be arrived at if the "epitome" directed to be presented to the council under Order XI. (1), which contained a summary of the decisions actually arrived at by the committees, were in future treated as part of the minutes of the council. What the corporation desired to be made clear was that they were in no way bound to disclose confidential preliminary matters. The Act did not confer on a burgess a right to inspect minutes of any committee. There was a distinction made in the Act between the two. Thus, in section 22 (5) reference was expressly made to the "minutes and proceedings of the meeting of the council and of committee." The prayer of this claim was that the burgesses should be declared to have a right to inspect the minutes and proceedings of any committee. [CAVE, J.—That, in our opinion, is asking too much. Mr. Russell has intimated that he is willing to accept the offer of the corporation, provided that the right to inspect be extended to all acts submitted for approval to the council.] The corporation offering no further objection.

The COURT (CAVE and LAWRANCE, JJ.), on those terms, granted a declaration that the burgesses were entitled to inspect in future the minutes of all acts of committees submitted to the council, whether those acts were finally approved or not.

The question of costs having previously been arranged by the parties, the court made no order thereon.

COWEN (Appellant) v. THE TOWN CLERK OF KINGSTON-UPON-HULL (Respondent). (a.)

Election law—Registration—Parliamentary franchise—Borough vote—Disqualifying alms—Almspeople in almshouses—Lands vested in almspeople—Reform Act, 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 45), s. 36.

By a grant of lands a charity, known as the Charterhouse Hospital, was established at Hull for a number of poor men and women, and the condition for election to the charity was, and still is, that the persons should be "feeble or old, so long as they are necessitous." The lands, including the Charterhouse Hospital itself, were, and still are, vested in the master and almsmen themselves, and form the source of the revenue of the charity. Under the scheme at present in force the almsmen were appointed by the town council and were removable by them, but the power of removal had never been exercised. The almsmen receive a weekly allowance out of the revenues of the charity, and each occupy a separate room in the Hospital House, which room is separately rated, but the rates are paid out of the charity funds. The almsmen had hitherto always voted at parliamentary elections without objection.

Held, that the almsmen, the recipients of this charity, were not disqualified by the receipt of alms within section 36 of the Reform Act, 1832.

Case stated by the revising barrister for the borough of Kingston-upon-Hull.

The facts were stated in the written judgment of Hawkins, J., as follows:

This is an appeal from the decision of the revising

barrister for the borough of Kingston-upon-Hull removing the name of the appellant, John Cowen, from the occupiers' list of voters for the central division of that borough upon the ground that he was disqualified under section 36 of the Reform Act of 1832 by the receipt of alms during the past year.

The appellant is, and for some years has been, a brother of a charity known as the "Charterhouse," or "God's House" Hospital, in the said borough, and as such brother he has during all that time occupied a room in the said house or hospital, in respect of which he has been duly rated in the rates for the relief of the poor. Such rates, however, have been paid out of the funds of the charity. He has also been in receipt of a weekly allowance of 7s. and medical attendance and coals.

The charity was founded by letters patent in 1384, in the reign of Richard II., by a grant of lands by Sir Michael de la Pole "to the masters, brothers, and sisters of the house" in two messuages called "Maison Dieu for thirteen poor men and thirteen poor women, feeble or old, to be called God's House of Hull, so long as they are necessitous"; and this is still the necessary qualification for election to the charity. Over them was appointed a master and warden, under obedience to whom the rest of the poor people, as well brothers and sisters, should continue in perpetuity, and the said master was required to pay to each one of the said poor people 40s. annually for all their necessities, as well food as clothing—namely, to everyone of them 8d. per week. By the said letters patent the said founder, with the King's licence and consent, gave, granted, and confirmed unto the master and brethren and sisters the said messuages, &c., for their dwelling, or foundation, or endowment, to have and to hold unto the said master, brethren, and sisters, and their successors, &c., for ever. The property so granted, with subsequent additions, forms the source from which the revenues of the charity are derived. In 1752 the rents of the property had increased to a sum considerably in excess of the sum necessary for the current expenses and allowances of the house as they then stood. In 1755 a suit in Chancery was instituted which resulted in the approval in 1764 by the Lord Chancellor of a scheme for the better management of the house and the application of its revenues. This scheme provided that fifteen poor men and fifteen poor women, feeble and old, should be placed in the said hospital, each of whom should receive 3s. a week for maintenance, with an allowance for coals and turves, and that the number of rooms and the pay of the poor of the hospital should be increased or diminished in proportion to the increase or decrease of the revenues of the charity estate, as the mayor and aldermen of Hull and the master of the said hospital should see convenient and direct. So things remained substantially till 1872, when a new scheme was formulated and legalized by the Charity Commissioners. That scheme did not, however, alter the existing state of the hospital beyond this, that the brethren and sisters of the Charterhouse who are elected by the town council were made removable at the pleasure of the town council, and on such removal his or her allowance was to cease, but such power of removal does not appear to have been exercised. At present there are about eighty brethren and sisters, each of whom receives 7s. weekly.

It is found as a fact that the houses and land forming the charity estate and from whence the revenues are derived are still vested in the master, brothers, and sisters. It is also found as a fact that one necessary qualification for election to the charity still is that the brothers and sisters should be feeble or old and necessitous; and, further, that they are elected by the town council. The brethren are required by the rules to keep within the hospital premises, and the gates are closed for the night at 10 p.m., at which hour all the brethren must be within. They cannot sleep out or allow relations to sleep in their rooms without leave. The gates are also closed for an hour on Sunday afternoons, and the inmates are unable to pass in or out during that time. The brethren are bound to clean their rooms to the satisfaction of the master; and each of the brethren is separately rated, but the rates are paid out of the funds of the charity.

Hitherto the brethren have always voted at Parliamentary elections without objection.

It was agreed that the translation of the original grant, and the account of the Charterhouse contained in the "History of God's House in Hull commonly called the Charterhouse," by John Cook, should be accepted as correct.

The revising barrister decided, on the authority of Harrison v. Carter, 25 W. R. 182, 2 C. P. D. 26, and Baker v. The Town Clerk of Monmouth, 34 W. R. 64, that the appellant, John Cowen, was disqualified by the receipt of alms.

There was another appellant, William Steele, who was an inmate of the Mariners' Almshouse in the same borough, but it was agreed that the result in his case should follow the result in Cowen's case.

The question was whether the decision of the revising barrister was right in law.

Jelf, Q.C. (Grotrian with him), for the appellant.—In the present case one of the conditions for election to this charity is that these poor men or women should be "necessitous." That is not equivalent to a state of absolute poverty, and does not of itself disqualify these persons. Although the recipients of this charity should be "necessitous" as the condition of their receiving the charity, still they have a legal right to the relief they receive, and they are not disqualified. The cases relied on by the revising barrister are clearly distinguishable from the present. In Harrison v. Carter the facts were very different from the facts in this case. In that case there was no legal right to receive the fund; here there is a legal right on the part of the recipients to receive the fund, and the lands and houses of the charity are legally vested in the almspeople themselves. That completely distinguishes this case from Harrison v. Carter, and Lindley, L.J., in that case, takes the very point, where he says: "If the fund is one in which the party is legally entitled to participate, as in Smith v. Hall, 12 W. R. 172, 33 L. J. C. P. 59, he is not disqualified." In Baker v. Town Clerk of Monmouth the condition was that the persons "should be unable to maintain themselves by their own exertions." Here there is no such condition, as the utmost is that they should be necessitous. In Edwards v. Lloyd, 20 Q. B. D. 302, 36 W. R. Dig. 75, there was the same condition, that the persons should be "unable to maintain themselves by their own exertions," and disqualification followed. Smith v. Hall governs the present case.

He also referred to Dix v. Kent, 39 W. R. 173; Fryer v. Bodenham, 17 W. R. 294, L. R. 4 C. P. 529; Roberts v. Percival, 13 W. R. 265, 18 C. B. N. S. 36; Simpson v. Wilkinson, 7 Man. & G. 50; Daniels v. Allard, 1 Fox & Smith Reg. Cas. 70.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 21.—The judgment of the court (HAWKINS, CAVE, and WRIGHT, JJ.) was read by

HAWKINS, J.—[His lordship having stated the facts, proceeded:] By the Reform Act of 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 45), s. 36, it is enacted that "no person shall be entitled to be registered in any year as a voter in the election of a member or members to serve in any future Parliament for any city or borough who shall within twelve calendar months next previous to the last (now, by 41 & 42 Vict. c. 26, s. 7, the 15th) day of July, in such year, have received parochial relief, or other alms which by the law of Parliament now disqualify from voting in the election of members to serve in Parliament."

The question we have to determine is, whether under the circumstances the appellant was within the year next before the 15th of July, 1896, in the receipt of such alms. It was not suggested before the revising barrister that any of the appellants have been in receipt of parochial relief. But it was objected that the appellants had received such other disqualifying alms as are mentioned in section 36. This objection was upheld by the revising barrister on the authority of Harrison v. Carter and Baker v. Town Clerk of Monmouth.

It would be difficult to point to any authoritative definition of the law of Parliament upon this subject, and it would serve no good end to examine in minute detail such authorities as are to be found in the reports of the trials of election petitions before Parliamentary Committees, for they are conflicting beyond the power of reconciliation. Many of them are to be found collected in Rogers on Elections, Part I., pp. 79, 189, et seq., to which I simply refer. It is stated by Whitelocke in his work on elections, published in 1766, that persons who are, or have been, within a certain time obliged to depend wholly or in part on eleemosynary assistance are disqualified by the common law, not only because from their indigence they were unable to contribute to the wages of their members, but because from their dependent situation their voices were no longer free. This receipt of alms, however, was only considered as evidence of inability which might be rebutted by circumstances. On the other hand, it was presumed that a voter continuing in possession of his freehold was not in a condition of disqualifying indigence, and that even parish alms paid to a freeholder did not invalidate his vote—Bedfordshire, 2 Lud. Elec. Cas. 564.

In dealing with the question, What are disqualifying alms? it is necessary always to bear in mind that the answer depends not upon whether the person whose voting capacity is challenged has been the recipient of charitable assistance or alms in the popular sense of that term, but whether he has accepted such alms under such circumstances as by the law of Parliament as it existed when the Reform Act of 1832 was passed would have disqualified him from voting. And it must further be remembered that, although the onus of proving a primâ facie title to vote by reason of property, occupation, &c., rests on the person claiming to vote, the onus of proving affirmatively the disqualification to vote by reason of the receipt of alms, is cast upon the objector. I may observe also, what I believe to be a generally accepted view, that a qualification should be favoured, unless the law compels the contrary. It is impossible to say that there was when the Reform Act of 1832 was passed any fixed definite rule of Parliamentary law which was applicable to every case. If there had been such definite rule the conflicting authorities reported in the books, would have made one marvel at the incompetency of some of those who were called upon to administer it; but the truth is there was no fixed principle at all to guide. Each case of necessity depended, as it still does, upon its own particular circumstances, and that state of things which in one place would have been held to be a disqualification might have been no disqualification in another. It is truly stated in Rogers on Elections, Part I., 193, that in many of the old boroughs the usage of the place and the decisions of the House or Committees have determined the point—in fact, the usage made the law. A perusal of the old election cases determined by Parliamentary Committees, some of which are referred to in pp. 193-5 of Rogers, abundantly proves this. In one borough usage sanctioned that which would have been condemned in another.

If usage may be taken into consideration, and I see no reason why it should not, we have this very striking fact found by the revising barrister, that certainly for sixty-four years since the Reform Act was passed, and I know not how many years previous to that time, the brethren of this hospital at Kingston-upon-Hull have always voted without objection, nobody ever dreaming they were disqualified because of such charity as they have received. This concession of right to vote was strong evidence that in fact the relief was not deemed to be of a character to disqualify. It would certainly be a strong measure to disqualify so large a number of voters as the brethren now represent without overwhelming proof of their disqualification. Such I fail to find in the case submitted to us, upon which alone we must act, for we have no right to draw any inferences of fact which are not the irresistible conclusions to be drawn from facts actually found by the revising barrister. I am not concerned to question the soundness of the two judgments relied on by the revising barrister as the basis of his decision—Harrison v. Carter and Baker v. Town Clerk of Monmouth. On the contrary, in each of these cases I think there was evidence to justify the finding of the court—viz., that there was that amount of poverty and such a receipt of alms to alleviate it as was calculated to destroy the independence of the recipient. But I do not concur in the revising barrister's opinion that they were decisive of the present case, for I think they are distinguishable in some substantial particulars. In Harrison v. Carter the lands forming the charity estate were devised to and vested in trustees, persons other than the claiming voter. Here they are vested in the brethren themselves, and the brethren, so long as they are such, live in houses of which they are for the time legal owners; and though their right to occupy is dependent on the will of the trustees, the power of removal has never yet been exercised. Again, here the funds are to be distributed to feeble, old, or "necessitous" persons—"necessitous" not necessarily meaning persons in extreme poverty. In Harrison v. Carter they were to be shared by the poorest inhabitants, and the particular voter whose vote was questioned was so needy as that, the money being distributed according to actual necessity, he was awarded the largest amount distributed to any one family. There was also this further fact in Harrison v. Carter—that before 1867 the person who was removed from the register had never been in a condition to claim a vote, the house he occupied being of insufficient value, whereas in the present case the claimant had, with his predecessors for a longer period than 1832, been uninterruptedly allowed to vote in respect of the same qualification until 1896. In Baker v. The Town Clerk of Monmouth poverty and inability to maintain themselves by their own exertions were found as the condition of the claimants to vote, and each occupant of an almhouse was required to wear a badge; and it was not suggested that any occupant had any freehold interest in the house he occupied. Following these two cases, Edwards v. Lloyd, (1887) 20 Q. B. D. 302, 1 Fox's Reg.

Cas., 54, and Dix v. Kent (1890), 39 W. R. 173, 1 Fox 186, 63 L. T. N. S. 641, might also be cited as supporting to some extent the objection of the respondent. Those cases are, however, distinguished in their material facts from that now before us. They were both cases of almspeople occupying almshouses or charitable hospitals, and receiving money allowances from the hospital funds, and the qualification for such charity in the first of them was inter alia inability of the recipients to maintain themselves by their own exertions. In the other the qualification was that the recipients had no means of subsistence other than the allowances from the hospital. In neither case was any legal interest in the almshouses vested in the almspeople, and it did not appear that the almspeople had for any substantial period (if at all) been allowed to exercise the franchise.

On the other hand, the case of Smith v. Hall (1863), 15 C. B. N. S. 485, strongly supports the case of the appellant to have his name upon the register. In that case the persons objected to were on the list of voters as freemen of the borough of Sandwich, they were brethren of one or other of the two hospitals, St. Bartholomew's or St. John's, Sandwich, both of which were identical in their constitution and management, and both were under charity trustees appointed by the Lord Chancellor. Each was a corporation by repute. The property of each consisted of landed estates and houses occupied by the brethren. In each, income of the landed estates was divisible annually among the brethren in equal proportions, and a house was assigned to each wherein to live, and each brother kept the house occupied by him in repair. The appointment of the brethren to the hospitals was vested in the charity trustees, and there was no instance of a brother once appointed being turned out. There was no deed defining the qualifications of the persons to be appointed brethren, but in the year 1612 the mayor and jurats of Sandwich having the management of the hospitals, an ordinance was made by them that "every person placed in the hospitals should be of the age of forty years or thereabouts, except always decayed jurats, or any lame, blind, or impotent person"; and by an inquisition of charitable uses taken on the 7th of September, 6 Car. I., it was found that the brethren ought to be "above the age of fifty, except lame, blind, or impotent persons, and unfit for husbandry, and should be inhabitants of the said town, or a child of some of them, or late inhabitant having no competent means to live." The brethren had always theretofore voted for members of Parliament without objection. The persons objected to were all brethren, and had been recipients of the gratuities and other benefits for more than a year next previous to the last day of July, 1863. The revising barrister held they were not disqualified from being registered by section 36 of 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 45. An appeal against that decision was heard before Erle, C.J., Williams, Byles, and Keating, JJ., who upheld the decision. Erle, C.J., in delivering judgment, said: "We should always incline to favour the qualification unless the law compels us to decide against it. If we are to resort to conjecture as to the meaning of the Legislature which evidently was that persons so placed by their indigence as to be presumably subservient and destitute of all freedom of mind, should not be permitted to exercise the franchise. . . . I must own I should think that these freemen, by reason of their having a house and a share in the profits of the land belonging to the hospital for life, are gifted with a far greater probability of independence than those who have nothing to rely on but the precarious proceeds of their own labour." Williams, J., agreed on the ground that the recipients of these benefits were not shown to be in a state of indigence and abject dependence. Byles, J., agreed on the ground that the persons were residing in houses in which they were entitled by law to continue for life, sharing the revenue of the corporation; and he added that what a man receives as a matter of right cannot be treated as disqualifying alms. Keating, J., said that usage is in favour of their qualification.

The case of Daniels v. Allard, wherein the question arose whether the inmates of the Licensed Victuallers' Asylum were disqualified as having been in the receipt of alms, is not of much assistance in the consideration of the main question before us. I therefore abstain from comment upon it. It does, however, decide that when a body of men claim to be placed on the register—all relying upon the same qualification as owners or occupiers—the disqualification by receipt of alms must be decided upon the case made and presented against the whole body, and not by considering every possible case against particular individuals, unless in the case stated by the revising barrister a distinction is made between different members of the general body of the claimants. The case of Smith v. Hall is, in my opinion, more applicable to this case than the case of Harrison v. Carter. I therefore, for the reasons I have set forth, after much consideration have arrived at the conclusion that the appellant is entitled to our judgment, with costs.

CAVE, J., added: I agree with the judgment just read; and I agree also that the revising barrister was bound by Harrison v. Carter, but that case, so far from being a decision against the appellant, is in his favour. In that case Lindley, J., said: "If the fund is one in which the party is legally entitled to participate, as in Smith v. Hall, he is not disqualied." The appellant in this case had a legal right to participate in these funds until for good cause he was removed. That distinguishes this case from Harrison v. Carter. The revising barrister also relied on Baker v. The Town Clerk of Monmouth. If that case goes no further than Harrison v. Carter it is unnecessary to consider it; if it does go further, then I cannot agree with it, as I think Harrison v. Carter is right. I think, therefore, that in this case the appellant is entitled to succeed and to have his name on the register.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, J.) — March 30.

Ex parte BROWN v. STEPHENSON AND OTHERS. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Voluntary settlement—Life interest defeasible on bankruptcy—Damages in divorce suit—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 47—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 33.

A settlement of damages obtained by the settlor in a divorce suit cannot be set aside as voluntary or as made with intent to defeat creditors.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Motion for a declaration that a settlement by the debtor, dated the 6th of March, 1896, was voluntary, and made with intent to defeat creditors, and for an order for the payment of the income of the settled funds to the trustee in bankruptcy.

In November, 1895, the debtor obtained a decree nisi against his wife, and a verdict for £1,500 damages against the co-respondent. On the 6th of March, 1896, with the approval of the Divorce Court, he executed a settlement of the £1,500 upon trustees, firstly, to pay the income thereof to his wife until death or re-marriage; secondly, to pay the income to himself until death or bankruptcy, in which latter event the trustees were to apply the income at their discretion for the maintenance of himself or his children. The debtor was admittedly in difficulties at the time when he executed the settlement. The trustee now sought to invalidate the gift over on bankruptcy, and asked that the income should be paid to him for the benefit of the creditors.

Muir Mackenzie, for the trustee.—The damages were the husband's property, and the settlement thereof was none the less the act of the settlor because it was made with the approval of the court. It was a voluntary settlement, and the gift over on bankruptcy is evidence of intent to defeat creditors. No one can settle his own estate so as to qualify his own interest in the event of bankruptcy: Higinbotham v. Holme, 19 Ves. 88.

Leigh Clare, for the trustees of the settlement and the beneficiaries thereunder.—The damages are not the property of the husband; the invariable practice is to pay them into court; and, by section 33 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, the court has power to direct how they are to be applied or settled. A bankruptcy petition cannot be based upon them: Ex parte Muirhead, Re Muirhead, 24 W. R. 351, 2 Ch. D. 22.

[He was stopped by the court.]

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I am of opinion that in this case the trustee must fail; it is quite plain that this case does not come within Higginbotham v. Holme. That decides that where a man voluntarily settles his own property to pass away upon bankruptcy, that is evidence of intention to defraud creditors. But it seems to me that the moment one arrives at the conclusion that the damages cannot come to the husband at all without the judgment of the court, and that the court has power the direct a settlement for the benefit of the wife or children, and that the husband can only make a settlement of them with the approval of the court, it is clear that this is not a voluntary settlement. The court could have directed a settlement in favour of the wife or children alone, but here it has thought proper to allow the debtor a life interest to go over on bankruptcy, and then to be applied for the benefit of the husband or children at the discretion of the trustees. This is a very different thing from a settlement of property by a man of his own free will. It is an act of the court, and I cannot hold that it is an attempt to defraud creditors.

Application dismissed.

SMITH v. CHORLEY RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Building plans—Refusal by district council to sanction—Action of mandamus.

An action of mandamus will not lie against a district council to compel them to approve building plans which they have bonâ fide in the exercise of their discretion refused to approve.

Appeal from the judgment of Kennedy, J., after the trial of the action with a jury, reported [1897] 1 Q. B. 532.

The plaintiff was the owner of certain land in the defendants' district, upon which he proposed to build certain houses, and in accordance with the defendants' bye-laws he deposited the plans of the houses with them.

The defendants came to the conclusion that the proposed houses amounted to the laying out of a new street, and refused to approve the plans upon the ground that the proposed street was not of the width required by their bye-laws.

This action was thereupon brought for a mandamus to compel the defendants to approve the plans.

At the trial the jury found that the proposed houses did not amount to the laying out of a new street.

The learned judge, however, held that an action of mandamus would not lie, and gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—A local tribunal, which admittedly had jurisdiction to consider the question whether it would or would not approve of certain plans laid before them, considered that question. The plans were not laid before them that they might ministerially express their approval. The plans were laid before them in order that they, in the honest exercise of their jurisdiction, might say whether they approved or disapproved of them. It was admitted that they honestly considered the question. The question before them depended upon this fact, amongst others—namely, whether or not the plans showed a proposal to lay out a new street. They were bound to consider and decide that fact, as it went to the root of the question before them. They decided that it was proposed to lay out a new street, and disapproved of the plans. It is impossible to say that they exceeded their jurisdiction. They acted within their jurisdiction in every way. It follows, in my opinion, that there is no appeal from their decision. The plaintiff has brought this action for a mandamus avowedly to compel the defendants to alter their decision. The jury, in answer to a question put to them by the learned judge found that the propose buildings did not amount to the laying out of a new street. The learned judge, upon further argument, came to the conclusion that he ought not to have left any question to the jury, and entered judgment for the defendants. In so holding, the learned judge, in my opinion, was quite right. The local tribunal acted honestly within their jurisdiction, and this action, which was really brought by way of appeal from their decision, connot be maintained. Our decision simply comes to this, that this action is not maintainable.

LOPES, L.J.—The plans of these houses were laid before the district council. The district council did not refuse or neglect to come to any decision with regard to them, but, in the exercise of the discretion vested in them, they disapproved of the plans upon the ground that the plans involved the laying out of a new street which was not of the requisite width. It seems to me that the law applicable to that state of affairs is this: The exercise by the local tribunal of the discretion vested in them in respect of a matter within their jurisdiction, if the discretion is bonâ fide and honestly exercised, is a matter for the local tribunal alone, and, however erroneous the exercise of that discretion may be, no appeal lies. If that were not so, the result would be that, when a matter was entrusted by the Legislature to the local tribunal, and the tribunal exercised their discretion in the matter honestly, the court would be entitled to review the exercise of that discretion, and tell the tribunal to exercise it in another way. Though the learned judge at the trial left a question to the jury as to this being a new street, upon further consideration he held—and I think rightly held—that there was no question for the jury, as the action would not lie.

CHITTY, L.J.—This is an action for a mandamus to compel the district council to approve of certain plans of which they had previously disapproved. The district council have a discretion conferred upon them as to approving or disapproving of these plans. They honestly considered the plans and disapproved of them. It was within their province, as forming part of the ground of their decision, to inquire whether the plans proposed the laying out of a new street. It is said that the court can, in this action, review the decision of the district council honestly arrived at, and can overrule the exercise of their discretion. I am of opinion that such an action will not lie. The jury were asked to say whether what was proposed amounted to the laying out of a new street, and that was done with the object of getting a decision that the discretion vested in the district council had been wrongly exercised. That is in reality appealing from the decision of the district council, and such an appeal will not lie.

*Company—Winding up—*De facto auditor—Officer—Misfeasance—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), s. 10.

An auditor may or may not be an officer of a limited company; primâ facie he is not. If he is appointed to an office under the company and acts in that office he will be liable under a misfeasance summons under section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890. But a person is not an "officer" who fills no position either de jure or de facto, but who happens to do some of the work which he would have to do if he were an officer in the proper sense of the word.

So held by the Court of Appeal (reversing Stirling, J., ante, p. 263).

Appeal of the auditors of the above-named company from a decision of Stirling, J. (reported ante, p. 263).

The facts sufficiently appear from the report in the court below and from the written judgment of Lindley, L.J.

Stirling, J., held, following In re London and General Bank, 44 W. R. 80, [1895] 2 Ch. 673, and In re Kingston Cotton Mill Co., 44 W. R. 210, [1896] 1 Ch. 6, that two gentlemen who had acted as auditors of the company, though not formally elected to the office, were liable as officers of the company under the misfeasance section (section 10) of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890.

The auditors appealed.

Eve, Q.C., and Frank Evans, for the appellants.

Buckley, Q.C., and Edwin Ward, for the liquidator.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 11.—LINDLEY, L.J., read the following judgment: This is an appeal by Messrs. Parsons & Robjent from an order of Stirling, J., refusing to stay proceedings taken against them by the liquidator of the above company, under section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890.

The question raised by this appeal is whether Messrs. Parsons & Robjent are liable to be proceeded against under that section as "officers" of the company. To answer this question it is necessary to ascertain who Messrs. Parsons & Robjent are, and what they have done. They were accountants carrying on business in partnership, employed by one of the directors to audit the accounts of the company and to prepare a balance-sheet for the year 1889, to be laid before the shareholders of the company at their annual general meeting. This they did; the partners signed, per pro., a certificate at the bottom, worded, "We have carefully examined the accounts of the Western Counties Steam Bakeries and Milling Co., and find the same to be in accordance with the above balance-sheet, which shows the correct financial position of the company." The accounts were, in fact, examined and the balance-sheet prepared by a clerk of the firm, and he signed the name of the firm at the bottom of the certificate; but no reliance was placed by the appellants upon this circumstance. They admitted their clerk's authority to act for them, and they admitted their own liability for what their clerk did. A similar course had been pursued the year before, but the liquidator only proceeded against the appellants with reference to the accounts for 1889. Messrs. Parsons & Robjent were paid £12 12s. for their services in respect of the accounts of 1889 by a cheque of the company. Those are the whole of the facts.

Now if section 10 of the Winding-up Act, 1890, contained the word "auditor" it might well be that Messrs. Parsons & Robjent, having acted as they did, could not be heard to say that they were not auditors, and section 10 might well apply to them. I think this would be so, and the cases of Gibson v. Barton, 23 W. R. 858, L. R. 10 Q. B. 329, and Coventry & Dixon's case, 28 W. R. 775, 14 Ch. D. 660, are authorities to show that it would. But the word "auditor" is not in the section, and what has to be determined is whether Messrs. Parsons & Robjent are officers of the company, or have so acted that they cannot be heard to say that they were not. If all persons who did auditor's work for a company were officers of the company, the case would be easy; but no decision has yet gone this length; and if that were the law the careful examination of the Acts of Parliament and articles of association made in the cases of In re The London and General Bank, and In re The Kingston Cotton Mill Co., would have been quite unnecessary. An auditor may or may not be an officer of a company. So may anybody else—e.g., a banker or solicitor. Primâ facie such persons are not officers. See as to bankers, In re Imperial Land Co. of Marseilles, 19 W. R. 223, L. R. 11 Eq. 478; as to solicitors, In re Carter, 34 W. R. 516, 31 Ch. D. 496. But if appointed to an office under the company, and if they act in that office as officers of the company, they will be officers within section 10—In re Liberator Building Society, 71 L. T. N. S. 406, 43 W. R. Dig. 43 — and no irregularity in their appointment would, I conceive, avail them. But to be an officer there must be an office, and an office imports a recognized position with rights and duties annexed to it, and it would be an abuse of words to call a person an officer who fills no position either de jure or de facto, but who happens to do some of the work which he would have to do if he were an officer in the proper sense of the word.

Turning to the articles of association of this company, we find that the office of auditor is provided for; appointments to it are made, not by the directors, but by the shareholders in general meeting; the office is annual; the remuneration is fixed by the shareholders; they can re-elect him on his quitting office; his duties are expressly stated; and large powers are conferred upon him in order to enable him to perform those duties. Messrs. Parsons & Robjent performed the duties which an auditor would have had to perform; but it appears to me that they were no more de facto than they were de jure officers of the company. They were simply accountants, called in by the directors to do a piece of work, and they never were and never pretended to be or acted as if they were anything else. In my opinion Stirling, J., has regarded the decisions in the cases of In re The London and General Bank and In re The Kingston Cotton Mill Co. as going considerably further than they did. They decided two points only—viz., first, that auditors might be officers within section 10, a proposition which in the first case was very stoutly disputed; and, secondly, that the auditors in those cases were officers of the companies then in question; that is, that the persons there had within section 10 really filled the office of auditor in those cases respectively.

The appeal must be allowed with costs here and below, and all proceedings against the appellants under section 10 of the Winding-up Act, 1890, must be stayed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question raised in this appeal is whether the liquidator of the Western Counties Bakeries and Milling Co. (Limited) can take proceedings in a summary way by means of what is called a misfeasance summons under section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act against Messrs. Charles Edward Parsons and Frederick Pring Robjent, as being officers of that company. If they were officers of the company upon the 30th of January, 1890, when they certified the correctness of the company's balance-sheet for the year 1889, they may be proceeded against by means of such summons, otherwise they cannot be. Lindley, L.J., has stated the facts of the case, and I do not further allude to them.

It has been held by this court in the case of In re Kingston Cotton Mill Co., following the case also in this court of In re London and General Bank, that where a company, having articles of association similar to those in the present case, has appointed a person to the office of auditor of the company, such person is an "officer" within the meaning of section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up Act) of 1890, which runs thus: "Where any director, manager, liquidator, or other officer of the company" has done certain acts he may be proceeded against as in the section mentioned by means of a misfeasance summons. It having thus been held that a person appointed by a company to the office of auditor of the company is an officer within the meaning of the section, we are now asked to take a step further, and to hold that a person who has never been appointed to the office of auditor or to any other office in the company at all, is nevertheless an officer of the company if he has performed work which, if he had been appointed by the company to the office of auditor, he would have undertaken and performed. The argument of the liquidator is that the undertaking to perform and the performance of auditor's work upon any given occasion makes a person an officer of the company within section 10, although he has never been appointed to that or to any other office in the company; and it is said that decided cases show this to be so. The first case which is relied upon is that of Gibson v. Barton, where Blackburn and Lush, JJ., held, Quain, J., dissenting, that a man who performed the work of manager of a company became thereby the de facto manager, and consequently was within the terms of an Act, which enacted that every "manager" who should knowingly and wilfully authorize or permit a default being made in forwarding a list of members to the registrar of joint-stock companies, should incur a penalty. These two learned judges held that "manager" in the Act meant manager de facto, and that a person who performed manager's work became thereby manager; but how does this establish that a person who performs auditor's work becomes an officer of the company? If the words of the section had included the word "auditor" the case would have been applicable, but no such word is in the section. I agree that performing the work of an auditor shows the person to be a de facto, though he may not be a de jure auditor, but to succeed the liquidator must show that the person is a de facto "officer." Some auditors are officers of a company and some are not. Those who are officers are within the section, not those who are not officers. It is no good showing that a person performs auditor's work; it must be shown that he is a de facto officer of the company. The next case is Coventry and Dixon's case. There two directors did the work of directors without being qualified to be directors. Sir George Jessel held them to be de facto directors though they were not de jure directors, and as such were liable to be proceeded against summarily by way of a misfeasance summons as being directors of the company who are persons designated in the section to be proceeded against. When this case was under appeal (it was reversed upon another point) Bramwell, L.J., said if he (that is, the director) has done anything wrong as a de facto director no doubt he can be got at under the clause. In this I agree, and if Messrs. Parsons & Robjent had done anything wrong as de facto officers they could be got at; but they have done nothing of the sort, for the simple reason they have never become officers of the company at all. When examined Coventry and Dixon's case is only the case of Gibson v. Barton over again. I agree that doing the work of a director may make a person a de facto director, and the section enacts that a director may be proceeded against by summons. Doing the work of a manager may make a person a de facto manager, and the section enacts that a manager may be proceeded against by summons. So in the case of a liquidator. Doing the work of an auditor may make a person a de facto auditor, but the section does not make an auditor liable to be proceeded against; it is only when he is de facto or de jure an officer of the company that he can be proceeded against by summons under section 10. In this case Messrs. Parsons & Robjent were neither de facto nor de jure officers of the company; then how can they be said with truth to be officers of the company? All that this court has heretofore held is that an auditor may be proceeded against by summons if he is de facto an officer of the company. It has not held that a man may be proceeded against by summons when he is neither de facto nor de jure an officer of the company. For these reasons I think my brother Stirling went too far in holding these appellants liable. The question is not that which the learned judge put to himself—were the applicants de facto auditors? It is, were they de facto officers?

In my judgment the application to stay proceedings upon the summons should have been granted, and this appeal must be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J., said he had had an opportunity of reading the written judgment of Lindley, L.J., and concurred in it. He added that he could not see how from any point of view they could be officers of the company; they had no rights, and were simply servants who could be dismissed at any moment. If they had asked to be paid the directors could have said: "We dispense with your services." Officers must hold an office and could only be removed for just cause. Here they could be removed at the pleasure of the directors, who could have appointed any other man to do the work.

Appeal allowed.

Decision of North, J. (ante, p. 227), reversed.

Ex parte Harrison, 69 L. T. N. S. 204, distinguished.

Appeal by Messrs. Stark and Elliston from the decision of North, J. (reported ante, p. 227).

On the 29th of December, 1895, an application was made by Mr. Stark to have his name removed from off the register of shareholders in the Consort Deep Level Gold Mines Co. (Limited), upon which he has been placed as the holder of 9,000 £1 shares therein, upon the ground that neither he nor anyone authorized by him had ever applied for such shares; and consequently that he was entitled to have his name removed from the register.

In the month of September, 1895, a company called the Mines Acquisition and Development Co. (Limited) were promoting and bringing out, amongst other companies, the Consort Deep Level Co., and for this purpose the Mines Co. were obtaining signatures to underwriting letters from would-be underwriters of shares in the Consort Co. then about to be brought out. A Mr. Akerman at this time acted as secretary to the Mines Co.

Upon the 11th of September, 1895, Mr. Stark had this subject of underwriting shares in the Consort Co. brought before him by a Mr. Lambert, a financial agent, and who had had underwriting forms handed to him to get signed by underwriters in the proposed company, and Mr. Stark, after hearing what Mr. Lambert had to say upon the subject, upon the same day signed an underwriting letter in the following terms:

"The Consort Deep Level Gold Mines (Limited). Capital £120,000, in 120,000 shares of £1 each. To Mr. J. Akerman, secretary, Mines Acquisition and Development Co. (Limited), Bartholomew House, London, E.C. With reference to the prospectus of the above company offering 80,000 shares of the company for public subscription, and in consideration of your agreeing to pay to me a commission of 15 per cent., payable 5 per cent. in cash, 10 per cent. in shares, on the amount of shares for which you accept this contract as below, I hereby undertake to subscribe or find responsible subscribers to your satisfaction on or before the day after the day appointed for the closing of the list for subscriptions for shares, and on the terms stated in the same prospectus, or any reasonable modification thereof, for 10,000 shares of £1 each, or such less number as may be accepted by you, and to pay the instalments on the dates specified in the said prospectus, and I herewith hand you my cheque for 2s. 6d. per share deposit. It is a condition of this agreement that, in the event of 40,000 shares being subscribed for by the general public on the issue of the said prospectus at or before the closing of the list, my guarantee is to cease, but all subscriptions by the public after the prospectus is publicly advertised to the date of first allotment shall be applied pro rata in reductions of the amount so guaranteed. It is agreed I am to receive the said commission upon the amount guaranteed by me within fourteen days of the completion of the purchase. It is further agreed that this underwriting letter is irrevocable, provided always that 40,000 shares are underwritten or applied for prior to the public issue of the said prospectus and allotment made on or before the 20th day of September, 1895. In the event of my failing to comply with the terms herein stated I authorize you as my agent, on my behalf and in my name, to apply for the number of shares (full or reduced, as the case may be), guaranteed by me as above, and to hand such application, together with my cheque, to the company, which application and agency I hereby undertake not to withdraw. My liability under this agreement shall continue, notwithstanding any variations between the prospectus shown to me and the prospectus issued to the general public, so long as the nominal capital of the company and the amount fixed for the purchase consideration shall remain the same." (A blank was left here for the signature, description, and address of the underwriter, and the date.)

At the foot of this was a form of acceptance in the following terms: "The above contract is accepted by me to the extent of 10,000 shares underwritten."

Mr. Stark did not then hand over his cheque for the 2s. 6d. per share deposit, nor did he ever pay anything upon that or any other occasion to Mr. Akerman, or the Mines Co., or to Mr. Lambert by way of deposit or otherwise on account of these shares.

Upon the 12th of September, 1895, Akerman filled up and signed in his own name the form of acceptance of 10,000 shares at the foot of the above-mentioned underwriting letter, but no notice of the acceptance was given to Stark.

The list of subscriptions closed on the 20th of September.

On the 27th of September a meeting of the directors of the Consort Co. was held, and Akerman, who was the secretary of that company, laid Stark's letter before the board, and in his name applied for 10,000 shares; and the directors resolved to allot to him 9,000 shares.

On the 28th of September Akerman, as secretary of the Mines Co., wrote to Stark stating that in accordance with the underwriting letter they had applied for 9,000 shares in the Consort Co., and he demanded a cheque for £4,500, being 2s. 6d. per share on application and 7s. 6d. on allotment.

On the 30th of September, 1895, Mr. Stark forthwith, through his solicitor Mr. Payne, repudiated his liability, pointing out that his offer to underwrite had never been accepted.

On the 11th of October, 1895, the 9,000 shares were allotted to Stark, and he was required to pay the allotment money.

On the 29th of December, 1895, Stark applied to have his name removed from the register of shareholders, and on the 21st of December, 1896, his application was dismissed with costs by North, J. (see the report ante, p. 227).

Messrs. Stark and Elliston appealed.

The facts in Elliston's case were similar to those in Stark's case, and the two cases were argued together.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and W. F. Hamilton, for the appellants. — It is said against us that we are estopped by the letter, by words, and by the offer. The only representation as to authority was that there was a conditional authority, the condition being acceptance by Akerman. If there was no contract, there was no authority. It depends on the construction of the letter. It is clear that there was no authority until acceptance. No specific number of shares was mentioned. The arrangement was only to take a certain number not exceeding £10,000. Nothing could be recovered on such an agreement. The duty of the Consort Co. was to find out whether the condition had ever been fulfilled. There never was a contract — the offer was never accepted. We never waived our right to notice of acceptance. The distinction between this case and Ex parte Harrison, 69 L. T. N. S. 204, is that there the offer was absolute, and it was unnecessary that any notice of acceptance should be given. It does not appear in the present case that the date of the acceptance was written in when Akerman signed. Another point is that if the representation was contradicted before being acted upon, there was no estoppel. The letter of repudiation of the 30th of September came to the notice of the board of directors of the Consort Co. Assuming that the company knew, it brings the case within Freeman v. Cooke, 6 D. & L. 187, 2 Ex. 654, and that class of case. Thus, the authority was contradicted before being acted upon, and there is no estoppel. This concludes the argument as to estoppel. Again, the underwriting letter was obtained by a representation which was in fact untrue. It is said that there was a representation that when Lambert brought the letters for signature, 25,000 had been taken in Germany. Lambert had repudiated his own underwriting on the ground that he had been misled by Mellor. He said we could rely on Mellor. The company cannot hold us to a contract obtained by misrepresentation, and we are entitled to repudiate the shares altogether. The appellant Stark never had a chance of performing his agreement. The persons to accept were those to whom the offer was made. We question Akerman's authority to accept for them: Hindley's case, 44 W. R. 630, [1896] 2 Ch. 121, at p. 125. [Upjohn.—That was reversed in the Court of Appeal.] No, not on this point. Carmichael's case, [1896] 2 Ch. 643, only shows that where there is a completed contract a party is to be held to it. Harrison's case, according to us, goes to the verge of the law. It goes too far as to estoppel: see 69 L. T. N. S., foot of p. 206; also the end of A. L. Smith, L.J.'s, judgment: and per Lindley, L.J., at top of p. 207, 1st col.

They also referred to Jorden v. Money, 5 H. L. Cas. 185.

[LINDLEY, L.J., to Bigham, Q.C.—We do not intend to trouble you about the representation; but must about the other point. Assume that the decision in Carmichael's case is sound, even though some of my statements there may go too far. Akerman knew all the facts, and he knew notice of acceptance had not been given, and therefore the Consort Co. must have known. You must address yourself to that.]

Bigham, Q.C., and Upjohn, for the respondents.—Knowledge of the common secretary of the two companies acting for one of them is not knowledge of the other: Re Hampshire Land Co., ante, p. 136, [1896] 2 Ch. 743. We treat Akerman as the contracting party. [LINDLEY, L.J.—You may assume that. The question is, had he authority?] It was never intended by the contract that any notice should be given to Stark. He expressly authorizes Akerman to apply, as his agent, for the shares; and further, the company had nothing to do with the underwriting contract. Underwriters never contemplate that they themselves shall apply for shares. On the question of estoppel Harrison's case is precisely in point. [LINDLEY, L.J. —There there was no such condition as there is in this case. You have to make out that the event on which the authority was to arise has happened.]

LINDLEY, L.J., said: These two appeals depend substantially on the same considerations, and the determination of Stark's case will determine Elliston's. The substantial question is whether the company is entitled to retain these gentlemen on its register of members in respect of shares allotted to them under the terms of underwriting letters signed by them. I will refer to Stark's case only, and will state no more facts than are necessary in order to make my own judgment intelligible. The Consort Deep Level Gold Mines Co. (Limited) was registered on the 13th of September, 1895. It was promoted by the Mines Acquisition and Development Co., of which Mr. Akerman was the secretary. The company had some underwriting letters for shares in the Consort Co. prepared, and on the 11th of September Stark signed one of these. [His lordship read the underwriting letter, and continued:] No cheque for the 2s. 6d. deposit money was given by Stark. The day for closing the list of subscriptions was the 20th of September. The 21st of September, therefore, was the day on or before which Stark was to subscribe or find subscribers for shares. But until informed of the number of shares for which he was to subscribe or find subscribers for, he could not perform his part of the bargain. On the 12th of September Akerman filled up the form of acceptance printed at the foot of the letter. No notice of this acceptance was sent to Stark. On the 27th of September the directors of the Consort Co. met. Akerman was its secretary, and he laid Stark's letter before the board and applied for 10,000 shares in his name, and 9,000 were resolved to be allotted to him. On the 28th of September Akerman informed Stark of what had been done. On the 30th of September, Stark, by his solicitor, Payne, repudiated the transaction. These two letters were written from and to the Mines Co. On the 10th of October their solicitors, Lucas & Ward, wrote to Payne saying that the Mines Co. would hold Stark responsible under his underwriting letter. On the 11th of October the shares (9,000) were nevertheless allotted to Stark, and he was required to pay the allotment money. This he refused to pay by a letter written on the 12th of October from Payne to Akerman as secretary of the Consort Co. Stark then applied to have his name removed from the register of shareholders and his motion was dismissed with costs. From this decision he has appealed to this court. He rests his application on the following grounds—viz., (1) That Akerman had no authority to apply for shares in his name; (2) that if Akerman had such authority it was obtained by misrepresentation of which the company cannot take advantage; (3) that Stark has done nothing which estops him from denying Akerman's authority. I have not alluded to the misrepresentations made to Stark, and on the faith of which he says he was induced to sign the underwriting letter; and I pass this part of the case over for the present.

I will first consider Akerman's authority to apply for shares in Stark's name. The 9,000 shares having been allotted to Stark on Akerman's application, Stark's obligation to accept them depends on the answers to be given to the following questions—viz., first—Had Akerman authority to apply for them in Stark's name? If not, then secondly, Has Stark so conducted himself as to be estopped from denying such authority? In speaking of Akerman I speak of him as the secretary and agent of the Mines Acquisition and Development Co. (Limited), and I use his name for the sake of brevity only. First, as to Akerman's real authority to apply for shares in Stark's name. The underwriting letter signed by Stark was so worded that it cannot be regarded as an acceptance by him of an offer made to him by Akerman so as to be binding on either or both of them when Stark signed it. The terms of the letter show that it was an offer by Stark, which required acceptance by Akerman in order to convert the offer into a binding contract. Further, it is familiar law that the mere acceptance of an offer, unless it is brought to the knowledge of the person making it, does not, as a rule, convert the offer into a contract. There are exceptions to this rule, based in some cases on the ordinary course of business and in other cases on special circumstances, which render notice unnecessary. Notice of performance by the other side is often all the notice of the acceptance of the offer which the person making it can require: see Carlill v. Carbolic Smoke Ball Co., 41 W. R. 210, [1893] 1 Q. B. at p. 262. In my opinion this may often be the case with underwriting agreements. I do not accept the view that they are like bets and must be accepted before the event on which they are to become operative is known. Speaking generally, an underwriter of shares agrees to take so many not exceeding a certain number as a company may require in order to make up the total number, without which business cannot be commenced; and until the company knows how many it wants from the underwriter, I do not see how it can be in a position to accept his offer. Upon this point I concur with the view taken by Kay, L.J., in Hindley's case. But, of course, attention must be paid to the terms of the underwriting letter in each particular case. In the case of the Bultfontein Sun Diamond Mines (Limited), 13 Times L. R. 156, the terms were such that notice of acceptance was inferred from the retention of the letter by the person to whom it was addressed without more. But no such inference can be fairly drawn in this case, as the number of shares for which the letter was accepted had to be communicated to the underwriter. According to the terms of the letter signed by Stark it was essential that he should know on or before the 21st of September, 1895—i.e., "the day after the day appointed for the closing of the list for subscriptions for shares"—how many shares he was to subscribe or find subscribers for. This stipulation rendered it essential that his offer should be accepted, if at all, before that date, and that he should be informed of the number of shares for which it was accepted. Further, Akerman's authority to apply for shares in Stark's name only arose on his failure to apply for the shares which he was bound to take. But until Stark was informed that his offer had been accepted and the extent to which it had been accepted it is impossible to treat him as having failed to perform his obligation to apply for shares. Akerman's authority, therefore, to apply for them in his name never really arose.

We were asked to infer from what took place on the 19th of September, when Stark called at the office of the company, that Stark then learned that his offer had been accepted. But the evidence does not satisfy me that he did, and there is no statement by any one that he was told to what extent the offer had been accepted. He denies that he was told anything about it, and the utmost that can be said against him on this part of the case is that he went to learn how subscriptions were coming in, and that he was so far satisfied with the information which he obtained that he did not care to withdraw his offer. So far I agree with the view taken by North, J. He, however, decided that Stark was estopped from denying Akerman's authority to apply for shares in his name; and the learned judge came to that conclusion, on the authority of the decision of this court in Ex parte Harrison, which, however, was a very different case from the present. The facts in Ex parte Harrison may be shortly stated as follows: Harrison (who carried on business under the name of Pearson & Co.) had signed an underwriting letter which had been accepted by the person to whom it was addressed—i.e., Lakeman. By that letter Harrison agreed to subscribe, or find subscribers for, 300 shares (neither more or less) in a brewery company, and to apply for them on a particular day; and, in the event of his not applying for them on that day, he empowered Lakeman to apply for them in his name. So far as appeared by that letter, there was no condition whatever for the exercise of this power, except (1) the non-application by Harrison for 300 shares on the day named; and (2) the acceptance by Lakeman of the offer made by the letter to him. Harrison had not applied for the shares, and the acceptance of the offer appeared from Lakeman's signed acceptance on the document itself. In another document (of which the company had no knowledge or notice) Harrison had stipulated that the acceptance of his offer by Lakeman should be communicated to him by a particular day. This was not done, nor was Harrison ever in fact informed before shares were allotted to him, that Lakeman had accepted his offer. The court held that Harrison was estopped from denying that Lakeman had authority to apply for 300 shares in his name. That case turned entirely on the private letter. The case was fought and decided with reference to that, and what was said about estoppel was addressed to the controversy there raised. Whether what was said about estoppel would have been applicable if there had been no private letter, it is unnecessary to consider. The point can be reconsidered when it arises; and In re The Bultfontein Sun Diamond Mines (Limited) can be considered with it. In the present case, as I have already pointed out, the apparent, as well as the real, authority conferred by Stark on Akerman to apply for shares in Stark's name only arose on the happening of a very important event, which is thus expressed in the letter itself—"In the event of my failing to comply with the terms herein stated." In order, therefore, to render the principle of estoppel applicable to this case the company must show that Stark has so conducted himself as to be precluded from denying that he had failed to comply with those terms. In other words, he must have in some way represented to the company that he had failed to comply with the terms mentioned in the letter, and that, consequently, Akerman's authority to act for him had arisen. But there is absolutely no proof whatever of any conduct on the part of Stark which amounts to any such representation. The doctrine of estoppel, therefore, appears to me inapplicable to the facts with which we have now to deal. This view of the case renders it unnecessary to consider whether Akerman's knowledge that Stark had not been informed of the acceptance of his offer would have prevented the Consort Co. from holding Stark estopped from denying Akerman's authority.

I stated in the early part of this judgment that Stark contended that he was induced to sign the underwriting letter by misrepresentation, and that the Consort Co. could not hold him bound by the letter, even if it would otherwise have been binding upon him. This contention cannot, in my opinion, be supported. I agree with North, J., on this point. The alleged misrepresentation was far too loose in its terms, and its untruth far too insufficiently proved to afford Mr. Stark any right to relief against the Consort Co. on this ground.

Upon the ground, however, that the shares were allotted to him without authority, and that he is not estopped from insisting that they were so allotted, I am of opinion that the appeal ought to be allowed. Mr. Stark's name must be removed from the register, and the company must pay his costs here and below, except so far as they have been increased by his charge of misrepresentation. These he must bear himself, and he must further pay the company's costs occasioned by that charge, and there will be the usual set-off of costs. Elliston's appeal will also be allowed with costs as above, and his name must be taken off the register also. His case is like Stark's.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The first question which arises is whether the undertaking to subscribe or find responsible subscribers when signed by Stark upon the 11th of September, 1895, "for 10,000 shares of £1 each, or such less number as may be accepted by you," then became a binding contract upon Stark, or was only an offer by him to subscribe when notice was given to him as to how many shares had in fact been accepted by the Mines Co. for which he was to subscribe, in which event he was bound to apply for the amount accepted.

The construction of each underwriting letter must depend upon its individual terms; they differ exceedingly, and it appears to me clear upon the face of this underwriting letter that there was no binding agreement until Stark had notice of how much of his proposal to the Mines Co. had been accepted by them; and that to create a binding contract upon Stark, this notice had to be given to him before the 21st of September, 1895, for how otherwise was it possible for Stark to perform his part of the contract unless he knew before the 21st of September for what number of shares the Mines Co. had accepted. I have no doubt that North, J., arrived at the right conclusion when he held that upon the true construction of the letter of the 11th of September, 1895, there was no contract binding upon Stark until notice of acceptance had been communicated to him, and that such notice must be given before the 21st of September, 1895.

It is, however, said on behalf of the Consort Deep Level Co. that Stark is estopped from saying that he is not bound by the underwriting letter. Now, what has Stark done either by conduct or representation to induce the Consort Co. to alter its position so as to estop Stark from proving the truth? To read the underwriting letter shortly it is this: Stark writes to the Mines Co. that he would underwrite shares in the Consort Co. about to be brought out up to £10,000, or any less number they might agree to accept, provided the Mines Co. before the 21st of September, 1895, gave him notice as to how many of the 10,000 shares should be subscribed for by him, and that if they did this and he was afterwards in default, the Mines Co. as his agents and on his behalf and in his name, might then apply for the number of shares they agreed to accept. What representation is there by Stark that he had received the contemplated and necessary notice of acceptance of his offer, or that whether he had received the notice or not, the underwriting letter was an agreement binding upon him to take the 10,000 shares or any other number in the Consort Co.? I cannot find it, and I do not agree with the learned judge when he held that Stark was estopped from asserting that he was not in default in not subscribing for shares as against the Consort Co. I do not think that North, J., would have come to this conclusion had it not been for Harrison's case, which the learned judge felt himself bound by, and considered it governed this case, but the ground upon which that case was really decided, was very different.

The dispute before us in that case was this. Harrison, who traded under the name of Pearson & Co., had signed an underwriting letter, by which he had agreed with a Mr. Lakeman to subscribe or to find responsible subscribers for 300 ordinary shares of £10 each in a brewery company about to be brought out, in consideration of 7½ per cent. being paid to him in cash upon the nominal amount of the 300 shares then underwritten for by him, and had authorized Lakeman, in the event of his not applying for such shares, to apply for them in his name. It is true that at the foot of the agreement there was a clause: "This agreement is subject to your acceptance." On the same day Harrison (Pearson & Co.) wrote a letter to a Mr. Newberry, Lakeman's agent, as follows: "Dear Sir,—Herewith we beg to enclose you contract for underwriting 300 ordinary shares in Henry Bentley & Co. [i.e., the brewery company] on the distinct understanding that we receive an acceptance from you of the same before 11.30 a.m. to-morrow, otherwise our underwriting is not to hold good.—Yours faithfully, PEARSON & Co." This letter was not communicated to Lakeman nor to the brewery company, nor was an acceptance given to Harrison before 11.30 the following morning (see judgment of Stirling, J., 69 L. T. N. S., p. 206). Harrison failed to apply for shares in the brewery company, and Lakeman subsequently applied in Harrison's name for 246 shares in that company, and he was placed upon the register of the company as shareholder of that amount of shares, and 246 shares were allotted to him. Harrison contested the case before us upon the ground that he had not received acceptance of his offer by 11.30 that morning, and the effect of what I then called, and will call again, the secret agreement between Harrison and Newberry, uncommunicated to Lakeman or to the brewery company, was the point discussed, and we held (affirming Stirling, J., who also decided upon the same ground) that, as Harrison had signed the underwriting letter for 300 shares, which was unclogged with the condition contained in the secret agreement, with the intention that it should be acted upon by the brewery company should he (Harrison) not perform his part of the undertaking by subscribing, when the time came, for these 300 shares, he was estopped as against the brewery company from setting up the condition in the secret agreement. This was, in my recollection, the ground upon which the case was decided. The point now taken—viz., that the offer contained in the underwriting letter had never been accepted so as to create a binding agreement was not the point argued or insisted upon before us, and as it appears from the judgment of Stirling, J., was not the point taken before him. What Harrison insisted upon was that he was not bound by the underwriting letter because he had received no acceptance before 11.30 the next morning. We held that as he had not placed this condition upon the face of the underwriting letter, which he was told was the document to be acted upon, but upon a separate document which was not communicated either to Lakeman or the brewery company, he as against the brewery company was by his conduct estopped from setting up the condition in the secret agreement.

A further point was attempted to be set up that Stark in fact knew before the 21st of September, 1895, that his offer to underwrite the 10,000 shares in the Consort Co. had been accepted, but I agree with North, J., that the evidence wholly failed as to this, and not a tittle of evidence can be pointed to to show that Stark knew for how many shares the Mines Co. had accepted his offer or for how many he was to subscribe.

As to the defence set up by Stark that he was induced by misrepresentation to sign the letter of the 11th of September, 1895, I agree that this wholly fails. But upon the ground that there is an estoppel in this case, I disagree with North, J., and I think that Stark is entitled to have his name taken off the register of shareholders.

As to the application of Mr. Elliston, his case is governed by that of Mr. Stark, and his name must also be expunged from the register.

JENKS v. VISCOUNT CLIFDEN. (a.)

Limitation, Statute of—Light—Obstruction—Administrator—Injury committed by deceased person—Continuing injury—Statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 2.

Where a person more than six months before his death erected a building which obstructed the plaintiff's ancient lights, and the plaintiff within six months of the grant of administration of the deceased person's estate, but more than six months after the death, brought an action against the defendants as administrators of the estate,

Held, following Woodhouse v. Walker, 28 W. R. 765, 5 Q. B. D. 404, that the action might be maintained, and was not barred by section 2 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42.

Action.

The plaintiff in this case was the owner of two freehold houses, Nos. 10 and 11, Cleveland-row, St. James's, and brought this action against the defendants, the administrators with will annexed of Viscount Clifden, deceased, claiming (1) Damages for obstruction caused to the access of light and air to the plaintiff's ancient lights by new buildings erected by, and by the acts of, Viscount Clifden, deceased; (2) an injunction to restrain the erection of further buildings, so as to obstruct or diminish the access of light and air to the plaintiff's ancient lights, together with a mandatory injunction for the removal of any building causing such diminution or obstruction; and (3) all necessary and proper accounts, inquiries, and directions, including, in default of admission of assets, administration of the real and personal estate of Viscount Clifden.

The defendants, in addition to other defences, pleaded and relied on section 2 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, on the ground that the buildings complained of were erected more than six months previous to the death of Viscount Clifden.

The buildings complained of were erected opposite to the plaintiff's premises by Viscount Clifden between the month of April, 1894, and the 23rd of August,

(a.) Reported by C. C. HENSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1894, and were completed at the latter date. On the 28th of March, 1895, Viscount Clifden died. On the 5th of August, 1895, letters of administration with will annexed were granted to the defendants. On the 15th of January, 1896, the writ in the present action was issued.

Section 2 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42 provides that, inter alia: "An action of trespass, or trespass on the case, as the case may be, may be maintained against the executors or administrators of any person deceased for any wrong committed by him in his lifetime to another in respect of his property, real or personal, so as such injury shall have been committed within six calendar months before such person's death, and so as such action shall be brought within six calendar months after such executors or administrators shall have taken upon themselves the administration of the estate and effects of such person; and the damages to be recovered in such action shall be payable in like order of administration as the simple contract debts of such person."

Renshaw, Q.C., and Rowden, for the plaintiffs.—A fresh cause of action accrues by allowing the obstruction to remain: Shadwell v. Hutchinson, 2 Barn. & Ad. 97. A further question is, Can a man who dies injure through his executors? Jones v. Simes, 43 Ch. D. 607, 38 W. R. Dig. 158. In Woodhouse v. Walker, 28 W. R. 765, 5 Q. B. D. 404, permissive wrong was going on from day to day. Here the defendants are committing an injury from day to day, though the wrong was originally done seven months before the death of the testator: Kirk v. Todd, 31 W. R. 69, 21 Ch. D. 484.

Warrington, Q.C., and Lawrence, for the defendants.—This is purely a question of the construction of the statute. The damage was done when the building was erected: Moore v. Hall, 26 W. R. 401, 3 Q. B. D. 178; Pennington v. Brinsop Hall Coal Co., 25 W. R. 874, 5 Ch. D. 769; Battishill v. Reed, 4 W. R. 603, 18 C. B. 696. The statute creates and limits a right by fixing it in time. In Woodhouse v. Walker the cause of action was no doubt permissive waste, but damages, from the nature of the case, could only be obtained for what was done up to the issue of the writ. Kirk v. Todd is not in point; and as to Jones v. Simes, it is only a dictum that applies. We say that the statute creates a right of action previously non-existent, and limits it (1) by defining the wrong and fixing the injury in respect of which the action can be brought within a certain period; (2) by defining the injury as something to be committed within a certain period. In this case the erection of the building is the wrong, and the diminution in the value of the plaintiff's property is the injury contemplated by the statute.

KEKEWICH, J.—The first point urged by the defendants is that the right of action claimed by the plaintiff is a creature of the statute; that is to say, is in the nature of a statutory right, and that no such action as the present can be maintained under the common law, and that consequently the statute must be examined critically in order to see that no action is brought under its authority unless expressly sanctioned by it. That contention seems to me to be correct, and upon that footing the question arises, Is this present action maintainable? It is not possible to raise any question on the words of the statute in section 2, "for any wrong committed by him in his lifetime to another." The offending houses in the present case were completed more than six months before the death of Viscount Clifden, and there may possibly be a question as to how far any wrong was committed by him within that time, but nothing turns upon that.

The question really turns upon the following words in section 2: "So as such injury" (not the wrong) "shall have been committed within six calendar months before such person's death." It is not a question when the wrong was committed, but when the injury was committed. Now, the injury was committed, not by the wrongful erection only, but by the continuance of the wrong done from day to day. Each day that the wrong continued an injury was done and continued, as I have already said, from day to day. That seems to be exactly what was decided in Woodhouse v. Walker, as was explained by Lush, L.J., who, it is to be observed, in quoting the statute (at the bottom of p. 407 in 5 Q. B. D.), left out the words which I have stated to be not material, and began with the words "so as such injury," &c. That is a direct authority upon the construction of the statute that any injury which gives a right of action, whether a continuing injury or not, if committed within six calendar months of the death, accrues de die in diem.

The answer suggested to this is, that damages for injury by obstruction of light must be assessed according to modern procedure, not with reference to the date of the issue of the writ—i.e., damages up to that time—but with reference to the whole injury done, once for all, and that therefore no injury can be considered as being committed from day to day. In my opinion, however, that argument confuses damages with the injury which gives rise to the action. I put to Mr. Warrington the case of an action brought for obstruction to ancient lights, on the supposition that the offending house had been pulled down, and that there was a right to recover damages up to the time when the house was pulled down. Until the action is brought it is true that you cannot tell what the injury is, and when the action has been brought you can get at what the injury is by ascertaining the difference between the value of the house as it originally stood, and its present value as altered by the obstruction, and then you can get damages once for all. But that does not in the least interfere with the right of action in respect of a continuing injury.

Then Mr. Warrington says that this might lead to a great deal of trouble, because if there be delay in taking out letters of administration, the action may be brought long after the death of the deceased person. As long as it is not barred by the Statute of Limitations I see no reason why it may not be brought. The meaning of the statute is, that at common law this species of action fell within a class of actions which it was not permitted to bring against the representatives of a deceased person, and the statute was intended to correct that, subject to certain restrictions as to time, so that, for instance, a person whose light may be obstructed shall be entitled to bring his action against the representatives of the deceased as he might have done against the deceased himself had he been alive, and the executors and administrators are thus placed on the same platform as the deceased, subject always to restrictions, which are inserted in the statute in order to prevent the grievance of a want of right of action being succeeded by a grievance of an opposite character.

In my opinion, therefore, this action may be maintained.

In re MARLBOROUGH (DUKE OF) AND THE GOVERNORS OF QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY. (a.)

Settled land — Sale of heirlooms and investment of proceeds in land—Liability to charges—Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 24, sub-sections 2, 5; s. 37.

Where land is settled and heirlooms are also settled to devolve with the land, the settled land being charged with jointures and portions for younger children, on a sale of the heirlooms and the investment of the proceeds in the purchase of land, the land so purchased is not subject to the charges.

By an indenture of settlement dated the 14th day of July, 1866, and made between John Winston, seventh Duke of Marlborough (deceased), of the first part; George Charles, late Duke of Marlborough, then Marquis of Blandford, of the second part; and George Graham and the Earl Vane, of the third part, the Blenheim Estates, apart from those portions of them which were permanently settled by Act of Parliament of the reign of Queen Anne, were re-settled after the death of the said seventh Duke of Marlborough and subject to a jointure payable to his wife, Frances Emily Anne, Duchess of Marlborough, to the use of the late Duke of Marlborough during his life, with remainder to the use of his first and other sons successively in tail male. By the same indenture certain pictures and other works of art were settled in trust, that the trustees thereof should allow the same to be used and enjoyed so far as the rules of law and equity would permit by the person or persons who should for the time being be in the actual possession or in the receipt of the rents and profits of the said settled estates. The said indenture contained a power for the late Duke of Marlborough to charge the settled estates with a jointure in favour of any woman whom he might marry, and with portions for his younger children.

In the year 1884 several of the said pictures were, under the authority of an order of the High Court of Justice, sold to the trustees of the National Gallery, and the purchase-money of the same was received by the persons who were then the trustees of the said settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

In the year 1885 a portion of the said purchase-money was, by the direction of the said Duke of Marlborough, invested in the purchase of the two freehold messuages, 97 and 98, Leadenhall-street, in the City of London, which were conveyed unto and to the use of the trustees of the settlement in fee simple upon the trusts and subject to the provisoes, provisions, agreements, and declarations contained in the said indenture of settlement, upon, with, and subject to which the same ought to be held as proceeds of trust moneys under the Act.

The late Duke of Marlborough was married first in 1869 to Lady Albertha Frances Anne Hamilton, and she having in the year 1883 obtained against him a decree for dissolution of their marriage he afterwards married Lily Warren Hammersley (widow).

The late Duke of Marlborough on the occasion of his marriage with his first wife, generally called the Marchioness of Blandford, charged the said settled estates with a jointure payable after his death to the Marchioness of Blandford, and with portions for his children other than the eldest or only son.

The late Duke of Marlborough on the occasion of his marriage with his second wife executed a deed purporting to charge the said settled estates with a jointure for her also.

The late Duke of Marlborough had four children only born of his first marriage, Charles Richard John, present Duke of Marlborough, and three daughters.

The present Duke shortly after coming of age in 1892 barred the entail in the settled estates and in the premises purchased with the proceeds of sale of the pictures, and these were subsequently conveyed to him in fee simple.

He had recently contracted to sell the premises, 97 and 98, Leadenhall-street, to the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty, and the chief point raised by the summons was whether the family charges affected in equity or otherwise the land purchased with the proceeds of sale of the said pictures.

E. L. Levett, Q.C., and W. C. Druce, for the vendor.—The lands purchased with the proceeds of the sale of the heirlooms should be treated as land bought with the proceeds of sale of land free from charges. By section 24, sub-section 5, of the Settled Land Act, 1882 land so purchased is not subject to the charges affecting the charged land.

W. E. Capron, for the purchaser.—Under section 24, sub-section 2, the land is subject to the uses of the settlement, and must therefore be released from the charges.

ROMER, J.—The heirlooms that were settled were not subjected at the time they were sold to the charges that the settled land was subject to. The heirlooms were sold under the provisions of section 37 of the Settled Land Act, 1882. The proceeds of sale admittedly before they became invested were not subjected in any way to the charges that the settled land was subject to, but a portion of the proceeds of sale has been invested in the purchase of the freehold lands which have been conveyed to the trustees of the settlement. I have looked at that conveyance and it is what I may call an innocent conveyance. It certainly does not in terms purport to render the freeholds bought with the proceeds of the heirlooms subject to the charges affecting the settled land. The words of the conveyance so far as they deal with the trusts upon which the trustees were to hold the purchased lands are as follows: "Upon the trusts, and with and subject to the powers, provisoes, agreements, and declarations contained in the indenture of resettlement upon, with, and subject to which the same ought to be held, having regard to the source from which the said sum (that is to say, the proceeds invested) has arisen." Clearly there is nothing in the conveyance itself to subject these lands purchased to the charges in question. Am I, then, in any way compelled to say that, notwithstanding this, the purchased land must be treated or ought to be settled or held as subject to the charges affecting the settled land, although the chattels, the heirlooms, were not subject, nor were the proceeds of sale of these heirlooms before the investment. The result, I think, if I were obliged so to hold, would be an extraordinary one. It would be, I cannot help thinking, a most extraordinary result, that whether one wished it or not, if you once sold heirlooms that were in no way subject to a charge affecting the settled land and invested the proceeds of sale in buying other land, that land must, whether you wished it or not, ipso facto, from the purchase become subjected to the charges affecting settled land, although the money which went to buy that land was in no way subject to the charge. I do not believe that the Legislature intended such a result, and I am bound to say I do not see when I carefully consider the Act that I am driven to any such conclusion.

(a.) Reported by RALEGH B. PHILLPOTTS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The result would be the more extraordinary because when you look at section 24, sub-section 5, this is clear. If the settlement affected two estates, one subject to certain charges and the other free from them, though otherwise the two estates would be settled on the same uses and on the same trusts, if you sold the free estate and applied the proceeds in buying other land, that land would not have to be settled so as to be subjected to the charges affecting the charged estate. The Legislature has carefully prevented any difficulty arising with regard to such a case. It seems to me incredible to suppose that if when a settled estate is sold which is not subject to a charge the proceeds or the investment of those proceeds are free from any charges affecting another estate subject to the settlement or to the same uses, yet if it is heirlooms which are free from the charges which are sold, that then the proceeds, if invested in land, must be subject to the charges affecting the settled land. I do not think I am compelled to arrive at any such absurd conclusion, though section 37 declares that money arising from the sale of the heirlooms is to be regarded as capital money arising under this Act, and undoubtedly as capital money arising under the Act it can be invested in land which has to be settled. I turn to section 24, which determines upon what trusts and to what uses the purchased land is to be conveyed. Now, I find in section 24, sub-section 2, there is this provision: The freehold land purchased (and the land bought here was freehold land) "shall be conveyed to the uses on the trusts and subject to the powers and provisions which, under the settlement or by reason of the exercise of any power of charging therein contained, are subsisting with respect to the settled land, or as near thereto as circumstances permit." Then I will assume for the moment that the words settled land used there, in reference to the settlement now before me, do not refer in any way to the heirlooms, but only concern the settled land strictly speaking; but this sub-section does not compel a settlement abjectly, so to speak, on the trusts of the settled land, on the uses or according to the trusts on which the settled land is held. It very properly, and the circumstances of the case show how properly, added these words, "or as near thereto as circumstances permit." That is to say, you are to see all the circumstances of this case and only to settle the land purchased as nearly to the uses and upon the trusts of the settled land as the whole of the circumstances permit. Now, I think one of the circumstances which you have to bear in mind in the case before me is this, that this land is bought with the proceeds of the heirlooms which were not subject to charges at all, and in my opinion they ought not to be so settled as to subject the purchased land to charges to which the purchase-money was not subjected at all. I think that is a circumstance that has to be borne in mind, and that under the words "as near thereto as circumstances permit" you ought to settle the land bought, upon the uses and according to the trusts and subject to the powers and provisions affecting the settled land, bearing in mind this, that the purchased land is not to be subjected to these charges, seeing that the purchase money was free from them and that the purchased land therefore might be settled free from the charges.

I do not think, therefore, that there is anything in section 24, or indeed in any part of the Act, which compels me to say that this purchased land must be settled so as to make it subject to the charges affecting the settled land.

I need not again, perhaps, refer to sub-section 5 of the same section as showing what the Legislature intended, an intention which though in one sense according to the strict wording of the sub-section not covering the case immediately before me, yet does show the view the court takes of what ought to be done in an analogous case, and is a guide to what ought to be done in the case before me.

But there is another and a broader view that I think may fairly be taken of the case before me. Though this is a point of view about which there may be, I am bound to say, considerable doubt. It is by no means clear, especially having regard to what has been said by certain of the judges of the Court of Appeal, to which I shall refer. Section 37, which permitted the sale of the heirlooms, states that the money arising by the sale shall be capital money arising under the Act. Now, capital moneys arising under the Act, apart from section 37, were capital moneys arising from dealings with land, and, putting it shortly, I think that the meaning of section 37 was this, that the money arising from the sale of the heirlooms should be treated as capital money arising from the sale of land—that is to say, that for the purposes of this section the heirlooms are to be regarded as if they had been settled land. If that be a correct view then it will be found that the Act works well throughout.

There is no casus omissus. Take section 24, sub-section 5; that would in this case apply, because for the purposes of the Act regarding the lands that were settled and the heirlooms that were settled as being land constituting the whole of the settled land within the meaning of sub-section 5, it would follow that, having sold the heirlooms, which are to be regarded for this purpose as settled land, and seeing that the lands purchased with the proceeds of those heirlooms would be lands acquired by purchase with moneys arising from the sale of land which was not before the sale subject to the charges, the purchased land would not be affected by the charges affecting the property settled other than the heirlooms. I think that section 22, sub-section 5, can be dealt with on the same footing, and, indeed, I think that was the view of Lopes, L.J., in the case of the Duke of Marlborough's Settlement, 34 W. R. 377, 32 Ch. D. 1, at pp. 10, 13. I have not forgotten that Lindley, L.J., has not in his judgment taken that view, but I do not gather from his judgment that he intended to negative such a view conclusively. What he says with reference to section 22 is this: "It is true that money arising from the sale of heirlooms is not money arising from the sale of land; and that last part of the clause therefore seems to me to be inoperative; but the effect is plain enough." I gather that what he meant was this, though of course it is possible that I am mistaken, that it seemed to be inoperative so far as the language was concerned, but that the effect was plain enough that the section had the same effect as that given to it by Lopes, L.J. Lord Esher in his judgment does not deal precisely with the point. If this be the correct view, it seems to me one that makes the whole Act work easily with regard to the sale of heirlooms, and avoids difficulties; and then, as I have already pointed out, under section 24, sub-section 5, the question before me has been expressly provided for, and it could not possibly be contended that the land purchased in this case is subject to the charges in question.

On both these grounds, therefore, I hold that the land purchased, is not subjected and is not bound to be held subjected to the charges affecting the other settled land.

TADCASTER TOWER BREWERY CO. v. WILSON. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Public-house—Agreement for sale—Specific performance—Licence—Vendor's obligation in respect of—Licence indorsed or otherwise affected—Licensing Acts (9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 11; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 44, s. 1).

Unless the vendor of licensed premises specially contract that the licence shall be renewed at the general annual licensing meeting, or that he will obtain from the magistrates a transfer of the licence to the purchaser's nominee at the next special sessions, or interim authority for the nominee to use the licence between the date fixed for completion and the next special sessions, the vendor does not take upon himself any of the above risks. All that he is bound to do, in the absence of any such special provisions, is to have a valid and effectual licence existing at the date fixed for completion of the purchase, which he can indorse in the usual way, and upon or in respect of which the purchaser could apply at once for interim protection and without undue delay under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 11, at the next special sessions.

The statement in Dart's Vendors and Purchasers, 6th ed., vol. 1, p. 483, to the effect that if the vendor could not, by the day appointed for completion, procure a transfer of the licence, the purchaser might repudiate the contract, is not justified by the cases.

An option to determine a contract for the sale and purchase of licensed premises if the licence became affected, Held not to become operative, on the magistrates refusing an irregular application by the purchasers for a temporary authority under section 1 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 44.

By an agreement in writing dated the 31st of December, 1895, the defendants agreed to sell, and the plaintiffs agreed to purchase, a freehold house and shop with the off beer licence attached thereto, held by one of the defendants, being 28, Chapel-street, Eccleshill, together with two cottages, for the price of £725, the day of completion of the purchase being the 22nd of January, 1896, and it was agreed (clause 9) that if the licence or magistrates' certificate in respect of the said house and shop should be indorsed or otherwise affected prior to the completion, the said agreement should, at the option of the plaintiffs, be at an end.

It appeared that the plaintiffs postponed completion, and then—viz., on the 23rd of January, 1896, without previously consulting the vendors or obtaining any indorsement of the licence, or asking the vendors to attend or assist the plaintiffs, applied to the magistrates for a temporary authority until the next transfer day to carry on the licensed business in the name of a nominee of theirs; and that the application was adjourned, and refused on the 27th of January, 1896.

The plaintiffs stated that the application was refused on the ground that there was no necessity for the licence, and claimed to have the agreement set aside and the deposit money returned.

The defendants stated that upon payment of the purchase money they were willing to do everything that was usual to enable the plaintiffs to apply for the transfer of the licence or magistrates' certificate to the plaintiffs or their nominee, and counter-claimed for specific performance.

Farwell, Q.C., and Butcher, for the plaintiffs.—The licence has become affected within the meaning of clause 9 of the agreement, and the plaintiffs' option to determine has arisen. The principle of the decisions in Day v. Luhke, 16 W. R. 717, L. R. 5 Eq. 336, and Claydon v. Green, 16 W. R. 1126, L. R. 3 C. P. 511, applies here, and supports the contention that the defendants were bound to procure from the magistrates temporary authority for the carrying on of the business by the plaintiffs' nominee. The transfer of the right to carry on the business as the vendors carried it on is of the essence of the contract. The plaintiffs, having failed to obtain this, are entitled to rescind the contract and to have the deposit paid by them returned. The case is, at any rate, not one in which the court should decree specific performance.

Neville, Q.C., and R. J. Parker, for the defendants.—The application made to the magistrates was for temporary authority under section 1 of the Act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 44, and not for a transfer under section 11 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61. It ought to have been made by the holder of the licence, which has to be indorsed by the magistrates pursuant to the Act, but the applicants here had not got the licence for the magistrates to indorse. The magistrates' discretion is absolute. A vendor in a case like this does not warrant the magistrates exercising their discretion in a particular way. The cases referred to decide nothing contrary to the defendants. Nothing has occurred to affect the validity of the licence, and the option to rescind under clause 9 has never arisen. The plaintiffs' application to the magistrates was misconceived. There has never been a proper application. The plaintiffs' claim therefore fails. On the other hand, the defendants were and are ready to join with the plaintiffs in a proper application for interim authority or a transfer of the licence, and there is no ground for refusing the counter-claim for specific performance of the agreement.

Farwell, Q.C., in reply.—If the vendor cannot, by the time for completion, procure a transfer of the licence, the purchaser may repudiate the contract: 1 Dart's Vendors and Purchasers, 6th ed., p. 483. That is the result of the authorities, and the principle goes beyond the plaintiffs' contention here.

ROMER, J.—The defendants were on the day fixed for the completion of the purchase, and they have ever since continued to be, the owners of the licence referred to in the contract of sale. And it is admitted by the plaintiffs that throughout this time the licence has been what is commonly called a clean licence—that is to say, it has has never been indorsed—and the defendants have done nothing to render it liable to be indorsed, and the tenant has never been proceeded against or convicted of any offence against the licensing laws. But the plaintiffs say that under clause 9 of the contract the licence became "affected" within the meaning of that word as used in the clause, by reason of the circumstances hereinafter stated, and that consequently they were entitled to put an end to the contract. In my opinion this contention fails.

The circumstances are these. [His lordship stated them as above.] The plaintiffs allege that the magistrates declined to give this temporary authority on the ground that there was no necessity for the licence. Thereupon, without more advice, the plaintiffs tried to put an end to the contract.

Now it appears to me that the plaintiffs have no right to rely on the result of an application so made as being something which "affected" the licence. The defendants have done nothing whatever to prejudicially affect the licence, and indeed in fact the licence to this day remains perfectly clean and a unaffected as it was at the date of the contract. Moreover, I am not surprised that the magistrate should have refused the application, seeing the irregular way in which it was made. I see no sufficient reason for supposing that the magistrates would have refused it, if it had been made in the ordinary way under section 1 of the Act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 44, upon or immediately after completion, when the applicants could have made it clear to the magistrates that the application was the ordinary one by a purchaser merely asking for interim protection until the next transfer day. Having regard to the reasons said to have been given by the magistrates for refusing the application that was made, I cannot help thinking that they were under the impression that the application was one under section 14 of the Act 9 Geo. 4, c. 61. However, be this so or not, it appears to me that by what passed, the licence could not be said to be affected within the meaning of clause 9 of the contract. I ought to add, with reference to an argument that the words in clause 9 "or otherwise affected" would have no operation unless they extend to some such case as this, that those words were probably intended to cover cases where, though the licence had not in fact been indorsed, the vendors had done something which rendered it liable to be indorsed.

The plaintiffs next take up the position that under this contract the obligation rested on the vendors of procuring from the magistrates the temporary authority for the nominee of the purchasers to carry on the business until the next transfer day. Now in the first place, as already appears, even if this obligation had been cast on the vendors, the plaintiffs gave them no opportunity of discharging it. But, in my opinion, no such obligation rested on the vendors. The purchasers knew at the date of the contract that the licence was not like property of the ordinary kind, the full advantage of which could be assigned to them by the vendors without any other steps being taken, and doubtless it was this knowledge on the part of the purchasers which induced them to protect themselves by clause 9 of the contract, with which I have already dealt. For example, the purchasers knew that the licence might not be renewed at the annual brewster sessions (as, I believe, they are called), and, further, that the magistrates at the next special session after the completion of the purchase might not assent to the transfer of the licence to the purchasers' nominee when the ordinary application was made to them under section 11 of the Act 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, and, lastly, that if they wanted to use the licence by their nominee between the completion and the next special session, application would have to be made to the magistrates under section 1 of the Act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 44, and that that application might be refused.

Now, in the case of a contract of sale of a licensed house there may be special provisions showing that the vendor has taken upon himself the obligation of freeing the purchaser from all risks in respect of all or any of the above-mentioned matters—that is to say, the vendor may specially contract that the licence shall be renewed at the brewster sessions, or that he will obtain from the magistrates a transfer of the licence to the purchaser's nominee at the next special sessions, or interim authority for that nominee to use the licence between the date fixed for completion and the next special sessions. But in the absence of such special provisions (and there are none such in the case before me), in my judgment, the vendor does not take upon himself any of the above risks. All that he is bound to do is to have a valid and effectual licence existing at the date fixed for completion which he can indorse in the usual way, and upon or in respect of which the purchaser could apply at once for interim protection and without undue delay under section 11 of the Act of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, at the next special sessions. I think the vendor is not bound to do more, except that, if asked, he should join with the purchaser, or authorize the purchaser to use his name, in the application to the magistrates for the interim protection and transfer of licence. Indeed, in the case before me the counsel for the purchasers did not venture to argue (and I think rightly) that, if the purchase had been completed on the day fixed, and interim protection obtained, the vendors would have been bound to obtain a transfer of the licence to the purchaser's nominee at the next special sessions; but they did argue that the vendors were bound to get the interim protection for that nominee. I cannot see why the vendors should be so bound. Suppose the magistrates refused interim protection, giving as a reason that they did not approve of the nominee, or suppose they gave no reason—and in this case they were not bound to give reasons—but their real ground, if it could be ascertained, was disapproval of the nominee, would that free the purchasers from their contract? I think it clearly ought not to do so, and I cannot see, on principle, why I should hold that there is anything in the nature of a warranty by the vendors of interim protection, or any obligation on them beyond what I have already pointed out.

And certainly the cases do not support the plaintiffs' contention, or justify the too widely-phrased statement at the bottom of p. 483 of Dart's Vendors and Purchasers, vol. 1, 6th ed. What the cases do decide is, that upon the sale of a public-house as a going concern, time is of the essence of the contract. And in Day v. Luhke that principle was held fatal to the vendors, because they did not hold a licence in respect of which the ordinary application for a transfer could be made without delay under section 11 of the Act of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61. So in Claydon v. Green the principle was applied where the vendor had no valid licence at all, and where, moreover, there were special provisions in the contract as to the transfer of the licence. And, lastly, the case of Cowles v. Gale, 20 W. R. 70, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 12, was one where, at the time fixed for completion, the vendors had no licence to hand over to the purchaser. I may add that the statements in Day v. Luhke and Claydon v. Green as to the practice on transfers of public-houses, appear to me in no way to support the argument on behalf of the plaintiffs in the case before me.

The result is that the plaintiffs have failed, and their action must be dismissed, with costs.

It is, however, said on their behalf that at any rate I ought not to decree specific performance on the counter-claim. I do not see any sufficient reason why I should not do so. The vendors are not to blame for the delay in any way, and still have a perfectly clean and valid licence; and having in no way broken their contract, but being always able, ready, and willing to perform it, I think they are entitled to specific performance, even if it turns out that the purchasers may not get the full benefit from the licence that they hoped for. The purchasers bought the house and its licence with its risks attaching, and even if the bargain proves a bad one for them, that is no sufficient reason for letting them escape from the contract to the injury of the innocent vendors.

I therefore, on the counter-claim, decree specific performance of the contract.

MORRIS AND OTHERS (Petitioners) v. BEVES AND OTHERS (Respondents). (a.)

Election law—School Board—Ballot papers—Voting by crosses—Mode of counting—Ballot papers not officially stamped or cancelled—Elementary Education Acts—General Order of Privy Council on Education, 1st August, 1895—Ballot Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 33), s. 2.

In counting the numerical value of the crosses on the ballot papers at a school board election, at which voters can give all their votes to one candidate, or distribute them, and can vote by numbers in lieu of a cross, each cross must be counted as one vote and no more.

Ballot papers which bear no official mark, stamp, or perforation ought to be rejected under section 2 of the Ballot Act, 1872; and ballot papers which have not been cancelled ought to be rejected, as there is no evidence they were ever in the ballot boxes.

Case stated for the opinion of the court by order of Hawkins, J., made on the 16th of November, 1896, under section 93, sub-section 7, of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, in the matter of an election petition touching the election of members of the School Board for the United School District of Brighton and Preston, held on the 1st of October, 1896.

At the above election there were eighteen candidates for fifteen seats, and the returning officer declared the first fifteen candidates to be duly elected.

A petition was presented by the petitioners against the return of the last three successful candidates (the respondents, Beves, Stevens, and Roth), alleging that mistakes had been made by the returning officer and his assistants in the counting of the ballot papers and the votes recorded thereon, and that by reason of such errors and mistakes the result of the poll was not accurately ascertained and declared, and that the majority of votes declared for the respondents was only an apparent majority, and that the three unsuccessful candidates (Bartlett, Dodson, and Houghton) and each of them had a majority of lawful and valid votes. The petition asked for a recount of the votes, and that it might be declared that the respondents were not duly elected, and that the three unsuccessful candidates were duly elected, and ought to have been returned.

By order of Hawkins, J., the case raised by the petition was to be stated as a special case to be settled by Mr. Cooke, and the order directed that all the counted, tendered, and rejected ballot papers should be examined before him at the Election Petitions Office, and that the votes recorded thereon in favour of the three respondents and the three unsuccessful candidates should be recounted, and that he should state the result of such examination and recount in a special case, reserving for the consideration of the court such only of the ballot papers as might remain at the conclusion of the recount in dispute between the parties.

Such examination and recount took place accordingly before Mr. Cooke, who, so far as is now material, reported as follows:

There were seven ballot papers not bearing the official mark, stamp, or perforation. These papers contained fifty votes distributed among the parties to this petition; all these fifty votes Mr. Cooke disallowed in accordance with section 2 of the Ballot Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 33).

There were certain ballot papers upon which the voters had marked a cross or crosses; and in these cases a difficulty arose as to the numerical value to be attached to such cross or crosses.

For convenience these ballot papers may be classified as follows:

(a) Five ballot papers marked with a single cross opposite the name of a single candidate.

(b) Two ballot papers marked with a single cross opposite the name of each of three candidates.

(c) Ten ballot papers marked with a single cross opposite the name of each of five candidates.

(d) Eighteen ballot papers marked with a single cross opposite the names of two, four, six, seven, eight, nine, or ten candidates.

(e) Three ballot papers marked with more than one cross and for more than one candidate.

The returning officer counted the crosses described as follows:

In class	(a)	as	15	votes for each cross.
,,	(b)	,,	5	,,	,,
,,	(c)	,,	3	,,	,,
,,	(d)	,,	1	,,	,,
,,	(e)	,,	1	,,	,,

In dealing with the above classes, Mr. Cooke acted upon the principle laid down by Lord Coleridge, C.J., in Phillips v. Goff, 35 W. R. at p. 200; 17 Q. B. Div. at p. 815, "that a voter must be taken to vote up to the full extent of his voting power." If and in so far as the value of these votes was a question of fact for him to decide, Mr. Cooke found upon the evidence before him that the voters intended to vote as follows:

Class	(a)	as	15	votes for each cross.
,,	(b)	,,	5	,,	,,
,,	(c)	,,	3	,,	,,

In classes (d) and (e), as the crosses did not by any form of multiplication give a product of 15—that is, the full voting power, he therefore rejected them on the ground of uncertainty.

If Mr. Cooke were right in counting or rejecting the crosses as above described, then the totals were to be amended accordingly; but if he were wrong, then the additions or deductions consequent on the judgment of the court must be made.

In addition to the above-mentioned ballot papers there were ten ballot papers (class f) in dispute between the parties, under the following circumstances:

It was proposed at the recount to examine the contents of the packets which ought to have contained the unused and spoilt ballot papers; and which should have been sealed by each of the presiding officers at the twenty-two polling stations, and delivered by them to the returning officer (the mayor), and by that officer opened, verified, and resealed at the close of the poll.

No such packets were transmitted to Mr. Cooke by the town clerk; but he delivered together with the other documents a sealed envelope, which he had marked "Spoiled Ballot Papers," and which he stated (in a letter to Mr. Cooke) he had made up from the twenty-two above specified packets for the purpose of this re-count and special case.

This envelope contained certain ballot papers which had been duly cancelled and also contained the said ten ballot papers (class f) which bore a mark of cancellation. Of these ten, Mr. Cooke rejected one on the ground that the voter had marked an excess of votes. The remaining nine ballot papers appeared upon the face of them to be valid, and upon the evidence before him Mr. Cooke found as a fact that they were valid, and not spoilt ballot papers. Certain irregularities occurred at the said election; for instance, it appeared that some ballot papers issued to voters and presumably placed by them into the ballot boxes were lost.

If Mr. Cooke were right in allowing the votes on these nine ballot papers, then the tables were to be amended accordingly; but if he were wrong then the additions or deductions consequent on the judgment of the court were to be made.

Amongst the papers annexed to the case were the instructions to voters at the election, and parcels of ballot papers in dispute.

The questions for the opinion of the court were: (1) Whether the election of the respondents or any of them was void; (2) whether the three unsuccessful candidates (Messrs. Bartlett, Dodson, and Houghton) or any of them was duly elected, and ought to have been so returned.

In the 2nd Schedule to the Elementary Education Act (36 & 37 Vict. c. 86) it is enacted respecting the election of members of a school board that—

"(1.) The election of a school board shall be held at such time and in such manner and in accordance with such regulations as the Education Department may from time to time by order prescribe . . . and revoke or alter any previous order, whether confirmed by or made in pursuance of this Act."

Provided that—

"Any poll so far as circumstances admit, be conducted in like manner in which the poll at a contested municipal election is directed by the Ballot Act, 1872, to be conducted, and subject to any exceptions or modifications contained in any order of the Education Department made in pursuance of this Act, the Ballot Act, 1872, shall apply in the case of the election of a school board in like manner as if the provisions thereof were herein enacted with the substitution of 'School Board Election' for 'Municipal Election.'"

"An order made in pursuance of this schedule shall, save as otherwise provided by such order, apply to all School Boards."

On the 1st of August, 1895, the Lords of the Committee of the Privy Council on Education by virtue and in pursuance of the powers vested in them under the Elementary Education Acts, 1870-1893, published a "General Order regulating the Triennial Election 'of a school board in a borough,'" in which, inter alia, it was ordered—

"(16.) Subject to the provisions of this order, the poll shall be conducted in like manner as a poll at a contested municipal election is directed by the Ballot Act, 1872, to be conducted, and, subject as aforesaid the provisions of that Act shall apply to the election in like manner as if they were contained in this order, with the substitution of the term 'School Board Election' for the term 'Municipal Election.'"

Provided that—

"(a) Every voter shall be entitled to a number of votes equal to the number of members of the school board to be elected, and may give all such votes to one candidate, or may distribute them among the candidates as he thinks fit."

"(b) The voter may place against the name of any candidate for whom he votes the number of votes he gives to such candidates in lieu of a cross, and the rules of directions for the guidance of the voter in using contained in the Ballot Act, 1872, shall be altered accordingly."

S. H. Day (Kenrick with him), for the petitioners. The principle upon which these crosses ought to be counted is that laid down by Lord Coleridge, C.J., in Phillips v. Goff, 35 W. R. at p. 200, 17 Q. B. D. at p. 815, where he says that a voter must be taken to have intended to vote up to his whole voting power. Applying that to the present case, one cross opposite the name of one candidate must be counted as fifteen votes, against the names of each of three candidates as five votes, &c. This principle ought to be applied in all cases where it can be applied; but in those cases where it cannot be applied, then one cross ought to be counted as one vote. With regard to the lost ballot papers, they may have influenced the result of the election, and to invalidate the election at common law it is only necessary to show that the result might have been otherwise, not that it must have been so.

Corrie Grant (J. A. Johnston with him), for the respondents.—In counting the crosses the proper principle to go upon is to count one cross as one vote under any circumstances, and no more. Counting them in the mode adopted in this case, would lead to endless confusion and difficulty.

Day replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 17.—The judgment of the COURT (HAWKINS and KENNEDY, JJ.) was read by HAWKINS, J.—This case was argued before my brother Kennedy and myself on the 28th of January, when we took time to consider our judgment. At the triennial election of a school board for the United School District of Brighton and Preston, on the 1st of October, 1896, there were fifteen members to be elected and eighteen candidates. The respondents, Beves, Stevens, and Roth, against whom alone the petition was presented, were three of the successful candidates. As against their election it was alleged in the petition that the returning officer had erroneously counted the ballot papers and the votes recorded thereon, and that by reason of such errors the result of the poll at the election was not accurately ascertained, and that three other of the candidates—namely, Bartlett, Dodson, and Houghton, ought to have been returned. By an order made by me on the 16th of November it was directed that the questions involved in the petition should be raised by a special case to be settled by Mr. Edwin C. Cooke, and that there should be a recount by him of the votes recorded for the respondents and for the said Bartlett, Dodson, and Houghton. Such recount has accordingly been made, and this special case stated for our consideration. The facts found by Mr. Cooke are very clearly stated in it. As to seven ballot papers they did not bear the official mark, stamp, or perforation. The votes recorded in them were, therefore, rightly disallowed in accordance with the second section of the Ballot Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 33).

The most important question discussed before us was as to the principle upon which certain crosses upon some of the ballot papers should be counted. In the second schedule to the Elementary Education Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 86), it is enacted that "the election of a school board shall be held at such time, in such manner, and in accordance with such regulations as the Education Department may from time to time by order prescribe," provided that "any poll, so far as circumstances admit, be conducted in like manner in which the poll at a contested municipal election is directed by the Ballot Act, 1872, to be conducted." On the 1st of August, 1895, the Lords of the Committee of the Privy Council on Education, by virtue and in pursuance of the powers in them vested under the Elementary Education Acts, 1870-1893, published a general order regulating the triennial election of a school board in a borough, in which, amongst other things, it was ordered that, subject to the provisions of that order, the poll shall be conducted in like manner as a poll at a contested municipal election is directed by the Ballot Act, 1872, to be conducted. Provided that "(a) Every voter shall be entitled to a number of votes equal to the number of members of the school board to be elected, and may give all such votes to one candidate, or may distribute them among the candidates as he thinks fit." "(b) The voter may place against the name of any candidate for whom he votes the number of votes he gives to such candidate in lieu of of a cross; and the form of directions for the guidance of the voter in voting contained in the Ballot Act, 1872, shall be altered accordingly." By section 2 of the Ballot Act, 1872, "the ballot of each voter shall consist of a paper (called a ballot paper) showing the names and description of the candidates." The ballot paper marked with prescribed official mark is to be delivered to the voter within the polling station; and the voter, having secretly marked his vote on the paper and folded it up so as to conceal his vote, shall place it in a closed box, in the presence of the presiding officer, after having shown to him the official mark at the back. Schedule 2 of the Act provides for placarding outside any polling station and in every compartment thereof a form of directions for the guidance of the voter in voting. The form of directions adopted in the present election (so far as is material to the question before us) ran thus: "Every voter is entitled to fifteen votes, and may give all such votes to one candidate, or may distribute them among such of the candidates as he thinks fit. The voter will first obtain a ballot paper from the presiding officer. The voter will then go into one of the compartments, and with the pencil provided in the compartment place in the right hand side of the ballot paper against the name of any candidate for whom he votes the number of votes he gives to such candidate." Appended to these directions were examples of ballot papers with votes marked. In each example opposite the name of each of the several candidates in a column headed "Number of votes for each candidate" the number of votes intended to be given for such candidate is recorded in figures. In neither of the examples, however, is there any mention made of the option given to the voter to record his votes by crosses instead of figures, nor of the mode in which he can by crosses indicate the number of votes he desires to give to any particular candidate. It seems to us that this form of directions may be usefully amended in any future election.

Upon the recount of the votes it was found that a great number of the ballot papers were marked and the votes distributed by figures in the form above-mentioned. No question has arisen with regard to these. Many others, however, were marked with crosses only, some with a single cross against one name only, others with a single cross against several names, and others with several crosses opposite the names of particular candidates. As regards these, very important questions have arisen as to how they should have been counted by the returning officer. The seventh paragraph of the case very conveniently classifies them as follows: "(a) Five ballot papers marked with a single cross opposite the name of a single candidate." These were counted by the returning officer as fifteen votes for each cross. "(b) Two ballot papers marked with a single cross opposite the name of each of three candidates." These were each counted by the returning officer as five votes for each cross. "(c) Ten ballot papers marked with a single cross opposite the name of each of five candidates." These were each counted by the returning officer as three votes for each cross. "(d) Eighteen ballot papers marked with a single cross opposite the names of two, four, six, seven, eight, nine, or ten candidates." These were each counted by the returning officer as one vote for each cross. "(e) Three ballot papers marked with more than one cross and for more than one candidate." These were counted by the returning officer as one vote for each cross. Mr. Cooke, as regards (a), (b), and (c), finds that the returning officer was right, and that the voters intended to vote as he counted the votes; but as regards (d) and (e) he finds that the returning officer ought to have rejected them altogether upon the ground of uncertainty, inasmuch as these crosses do not by any form of multiplication give a product of fifteen—that is, the full voting power of the voters. It is right to mention that in dealing with these ballot papers and in finding as he has done in regard to the intentions of the voters, Mr. Cooke has not acted upon his own independent judgment, but in deference to the views of Lord Coleridge expressed in Phillips v. Goff as to the principle upon which the votes recorded upon them should be counted — viz., "that a voter must be taken to vote up to the full extent of his voting power." That was a school board election case similar to the present, with this difference only, that the number of members to be elected was eleven instead of fifteen. In some of the ballot papers a single cross appeared opposite the name of one candidate only. This cross the returning officer had counted as eleven votes for that candidate. In reference to these papers Lord Coleridge expressed himself thus: "It may be said that the voter, knowing that he might cumulate his votes, and desiring to do so, meant to plump for that candidate; or it may be said that this interpretation of his intention would be breaking into the principle that a single cross indicates a single vote, and therefore that the voter ought to be taken to have meant to give one vote only to the candidate, leaving his other ten votes undisposed of; or it may be said that, the putting a single cross opposite the name of one candidate being as consistent with the one of these views as the other, the commissioner ought to reject the voting paper as void for uncertainty. My own opinion is that the first view is the correct one. It seems to me exceedingly unlikely that a man who takes the trouble to vote at all should not vote up to the full extent of his voting power. I do not think that is the right inference to draw, and I should, therefore, myself arrive at the conclusion that the voter intended to give all his eleven votes to the one candidate opposite whose name he had put the cross. At the same time that view is not so clear to my brother Denman as it is to me, and no doubt either the second or the third of the views I have mentioned might not unreasonably be adopted by the commissioner. I think the question whether the single cross means one thing or another is a question not of law but of fact, which the commissioner is the proper authority to determine. We must leave it to him to say whether in his opinion the single cross meant one vote or eleven votes, and if he has a real doubt upon the matter, he must act upon it, and reject the voting paper as void for uncertainty." Denman, J., thought "the single cross put opposite the name of a single candidate indicated an intention to give one vote only," but he agreed with the Lord Chief Justice that the question was not wholly one of law, and he expressed an opinion that it could be better dealt with at the place by the commissioner, with his experience and knowledge of the habits and ways of the class of persons who vote at such elections.

We do not doubt that the actual intention of the person who performs any act, whether it be voting or anything else, is a question of fact, and if the duty of ascertaining it is by law cast upon any tribunal or official person, such tribunal or officer must endeavour to discharge that duty upon such evidence as is available, and, naturally, the best evidence—assuming it to be credible—would be that of the individual whose intention is in question. In order to determine the result of an election by ballot the returning officer has no duty cast upon him to inquire into or determine the real intentions of the voters whose ballot papers he is required to count. He has no machinery at his command for doing so. The ballot paper alone is all he has to do with. If, on the face of it, it is marked in the manner required by the Ballot Act and no ambiguity is apparent upon it, we consider it to be his duty to count the votes as they appear upon it, and it is beyond his duty or power to alter the effect of a mark or a figure upon it—even though, from circumstances outside the voting paper, he were sure in his own mind that the voter intended to vote differently. The voter is secretly himself to mark the vote or votes he intends to give, and deposit his paper in the sealed ballot box. The returning officer's duty is to count what he finds in that box after the poll is closed, and in doing so not to speculate on what the voter intended. "Counting" is the only thing he has to do, so far as relates to the ascertainment of the numbers of votes recorded for the several candidates (see section 31 et seq. of the Ballot Act, 1872), and we are of opinion that he cannot look beyond the face of the ballot paper. It must not be forgotten that in these school board elections the voter, having the option to use either crosses or figures, has every facility afforded him by the use of figures unmistakably to indicate on his ballot paper the number of votes he desires to give for any particular candidate, and if he chooses to use crosses instead of figures, it being common knowledge that ordinarily each cross means only one vote, he should take care to make as many crosses as he intends to give votes to his favoured candidates. The form of directions expressly points to his marking the number of votes he gives. It seems to us that to allow the returning officer, whose plain duty it is, simply to count the votes as they appear recorded before his eyes on the face of the ballot paper—acting upon a questionable presumption (admittedly not one of law) that the voter must be taken to have meant to exhaust his voting power—to multiply a single cross by the number of members to be elected, or to multiply two or three single crosses against the names of as many candidates by a proportionate number of such votes, would be to introduce an element of uncertainty in the value of the marks upon the ballot paper never contemplated by the Ballot Act itself. As well might it be said that if a voter placed opposite the name of a single candidate thirteen crosses only the returning officer ought to count two more to make up the full voting power of the voter. This multiplication, however, is what the returning officer did in classes (a), (b), and (c) abovementioned. In this particular case, the number of persons to be elected being fifteen, there would be no difficulty in applying the presumption to ballot papers where single crosses were marked against single names, nor where single crosses are marked against three or five names only, for fifteen is divisible by three or five. But with regard to ballot papers where single crosses were marked against two or four or six or seven names, inasmuch as fifteen is not divisible by any of those numbers, each cross could only be counted as a single vote. The same result would, of necessity, attend single crosses against every number of candidates between seven and fifteen. A moment's consideration will suffice to show that a single cross against two, four, six, seven, eight, nine, ten, eleven, twelve, thirteen, fourteen names would only make it absolutely impossible to exhaust the voting power among them, and wasted votes would be the inevitable result. To test this let us assume in this case a single cross against the names of four candidates. Fifteen cannot, for voting purposes, be divided by four so as to exhaust the voting power of the voter. It is true twelve of the fifteen votes might be exhausted if three votes were counted for each cross, but then there would be three wasted. As, however, according to our view, each ought to have been counted as a single vote eleven would be wasted. It is obvious that if the returning officer were, in such cases as above discussed, called upon to consider and determine the intent of the voter, and according to such intent to give to single crosses a value not ordinarily attributed to them, that would entail upon him the necessity of inquiries and calculations not involved in the mere duty of counting.

For the guidance of the returning officer in counting votes we feel it right to note that, subject to what we have said, we do not think a ballot paper ought to be altogether rejected, because it may be doubtful on the face of the paper whether the voter intended by it to give one vote or fifteen votes. In such cases, where the intention to give at least one vote is clear, such vote ought to be counted, and it would be wrong to reject it for uncertainty simply because it was doubtful whether the remaining fourteen votes ought not to be added to it. In our opinion it is far more in accordance with the spirit and object of the Ballot Act, and far more reasonable and practical to take the crosses made by the voter himself, whether one or more, according to the ordinary interpretation, "one vote for each cross," than that the value of a cross should be variable according to presumptions or inferences as to the voter's intentions, the accuracy of which must be always open to question, for the voter cannot himself be examined as to them, and may have had his own reasons for doing that which to others may seem strange, unwise, or unintelligible.

We think, therefore, that if there be nothing on the face of the ballot paper to indicate to the contrary, whether the voter gives his votes by crosses or by figures, that which he has marked upon his ballot paper shall be taken as absolute proof of his intention to do that which he has done and no more. Uniformity will at least be attained by this. By adopting one uniform rule facility will be given to the returning officer in discharging his duty of counting. This is a great deal when the votes of some 24,000 or 25,000 electors have to be dealt with, as in this case. This disposes of all the ballot papers comprised in classes (a), (b), (c), (d), and (e).

As to the ten ballot papers comprised in class (f) and referred to in paragraph 10 of the case, we are of opinion that, as to the one which has no mark of cancellation, but was marked with an excess of votes, the propriety of its rejection is not open to doubt. As to the remaining nine which on the faces of them were valid, and were found by Mr. Cooke to be so as a fact, we think they ought to be rejected, not because we are satisfied they were spoilt ballot papers, but because, being ballot papers which, to give the votes recorded in them any effect, ought to have been placed by the voter in the ballot box, there was nothing to show or raise a presumption that they were ever inside the ballot box at all. Irregularities, no doubt, occurred at the election, but they do not explain the matter by any facts, but merely suggest the possibility that they may have been placed in the box and have either accidentally escaped or been wilfully taken from it. We have no proof, however, that such was the case; it is a mere speculation; and we therefore think they ought to be rejected. We do not at this moment feel justified in declaring the election valid, nor could we declare it void altogether, for the petition only affects the three respondents; but there must be a recount of the votes on the principle we have enunciated, and our final judgment on the petition must be deferred until the result of such recount is made known to us.

WHITE v. SOUTHEND HOTEL CO. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Covenant running with land — Covenant by lessee to buy exciseable liquors only from lessor or his assigns—Assign of lessee not named—Assign whether bound—Proviso for abatement of rent on observance of covenant—Assign of lessee whether entitled to benefit of covenant after lessor has assigned his wine and spirit business.

A covenant by the lessee of a hotel (the assign of the lessee not being named) to buy exciseable liquors only of the lessor or his assigns runs with the land, and is binding upon the assign of the lessee. Such assign, therefore, if in fact he has bought exciseable liquors only of the assigns of the lessor's wine and spirit business, is entitled to the benefit of a proviso for an abatement of rent on due observance of the covenant.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

In 1882 Sir Thomas White, whose trustees and executors were the plaintiffs, granted to William Fuller a lease for thirty years, at a rent of £1,500 per annum, payable quarterly, of certain premises which were to be used as a hotel, the lessee covenanting with the lessor, his heirs and assigns "that he, the lessee, shall not nor will during the term hereby granted buy, receive, sell, or dispose of, either directly or indirectly, in, upon, out of, or about the said premises, or any part thereof, any foreign wines, or any spirits, except gin, or other exciseable liquors whatsoever, other than shall have been bonâ fide supplied by or through the lessor or his successors or successor, assigns or assign, provided the said person or persons shall be willing to supply the same of good and proper quality to the lessee at the fair current market prices thereof." The lease also contained the following proviso: "Provided also, and it is hereby agreed and declared, that so long as the lessee shall well and truly observe the covenant lastly hereinbefore contained [i.e., the covenant already set out], then the lessor will allow to the lessee an abatement of £75 from each quarterly payment of the rent hereinbefore reserved, but immediately upon any breach of the said covenant such abatement shall cease."

Sir Thomas White died in 1882, and in 1883 the plaintiffs assigned the goodwill of his business (which was that of a wine and spirit merchant) to persons who were still carrying it on.

It was admitted, for the purposes of this case, that the lessee, and the defendant company, who were his assigns, had in fact observed the covenant by buying liquors only of Sir Thomas White and his assigns.

On a summons taken out by the plaintiffs to have it determined whether the defendant company were in these circumstances entitled to the benefit of the proviso, Kekewich, J., without deciding whether or not they were bound by the covenant, held that they were so entitled.

The plaintiffs appealed.

LINDLEY, L.J., stated the facts, read the covenant, and continued: The object of that covenant is plain enough: indirectly to compel the lessee to get all his wines and spirits from the lessor or his successors. The plaintiffs, the executors of Sir Thomas White, have assigned the goodwill of his business to persons who are still carrying it on. The first question which appears to arise is whether the burden of this covenant runs with the tenant's interest under the lease; in short, whether it runs with the land, as distinguished from the reversion. We have now to deal with a claim for rent by the lessor's legal personal representatives, and the question is whether the burden of this covenant, which does not purport to bind the "assigns of the tenant," runs with the tenant's interest. Such questions are always a little troublesome and a little difficult; but, having regard to the authorities to which our attention has been called, and especially to Tatem v. Chaplin, Clegg v. Hands and Fleetwood v. Hull, it appears to me impossible to say that the assigns of the tenant are not bound by the covenant. I think this is clearly a covenant restraining the lessee and his assigns (though not named) from using any part of the property here designated in the manner which is forbidden. This is a covenant touching the land. That is plain, not only from what was said by this court in Clegg v. Hands, where, no doubt, we had a somewhat different problem to solve, but also from the decision of Charles, J., in Fleetwood v. Hull. On those authorities it is clear that this covenant does touch the land, and that the defendants are bound by it. Of course the defendants are being sued, not by the purchasers of the spirit business—who could not maintain any action of the kind—but by the executors of the lessor, who are in no worse position than the lessor himself would have been. I do not see that there could be any answer to an action brought by the executors for a breach of this covenant. What the damages might be in such an action I do not know; but I do not think it follows that they would be merely nominal, because the covenant says that the liquors are to be supplied "by or through" the lessor or his successors, and it might be worth while for him or them to have the purchase made "through" them. But the amount of damages is immaterial. What is material is to see whether an action would not lie against the assign of the lessee for a breach of the covenant. If that is so, another clause of the lease becomes important. [The lord justice read the proviso, and continued:] That is not a provision for a set-off against rent, it is an offer of an abatement of rent. It appears to me it is a provision which enures for the benefit of the assign, just as the covenant binds the assign. Mr. Farwell made a point which seemed plausible, that the covenant is a personal covenant only. I do not think it is. He also said that there was now no covenant which the assign could observe. If the tenant, simply for his own convenience, happened to buy spirits of the person who had acquired the lessor's business, I should have grave doubts whether that would entitle the tenant to an abatement. But the whole difficulty disappears when you come to the conclusion that in such a case the tenant is still bound by the covenant. Then the proviso applies in actual terms, without any difficulty at all. We are asked to say whether, inasmuch as the present tenants have bought their liquors from the assignees of the lessor's business, they are entitled to this abatement. I have come to the conclusion that they are, though they did not rest their case on the ground that they were bound by the covenant, but on the ground that they were entitled to the abatement, whether or not they were bound, if they had in fact bought of the lessor's successors. I am not inclined to go as far as that, but I think the result of the learned judge's decision was correct.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first question to be determined is whether the burden of this covenant by the lessee runs with the land. Many authorities have been cited to us, and particularly three cases: Tatem v. Chaplin, Clegg v. Hands, and Fleetwood v. Hull. On those cases I come to the conclusion that this is a covenant running with the land, and that it binds the assignee of the lessee. Once you arrive at that conclusion the case is over, so far as the appellant is concerned. Therefore I think that Kekewich, J., arrived at a right result when he held that the only rent which could be demanded, it being proved that the assignee of the lessee was willing to perform the covenant, was £1,200 a year.

RIGBY, L.J.—In my judgment Mr. Farwell has not succeeded in displacing the cases which have been cited against him as showing that a covenant of this sort does in ordinary circumstances run with the land, so as to impose a burden upon the assign of the covenantor. Here the question turns upon whether or not such a covenant runs with the land, far more than on whether or not the assign is mentioned. There are some intermediate cases, where, for instance, there is a covenant not to assign without licence, that, I think, is differently construed according as you do or do not mention assigns. Where the lessee only covenants not to assign without licence, if afterwards the licence is given, the assignee is not bound by the original covenant. Here, of course, the lessors have assigned the business, and their assigns or successors can have no right to sue, nor could such a right be given them. Though the benefit of the covenant had been assigned in the most express manner by the lessors, the lessees would not be bound. But that is not the point. The question is, Is it an existing covenant, which Sir T. White's executors could enforce against the present tenants of the premises under this lease? I think it is. I am rather inclined to think that they could enforce it; if for no other reason, because the covenant provides that the lessee is to sell the exciseable liquors therein mentioned only when supplied "by or through" the lessors, their successors or assigns.

Then it is provided that so long as the lessee shall truly observe the covenant there is to be a reduction of the rent. For the purpose of this argument it is admitted that he has duly observed that covenant, if it be an existing covenant, that he has taken his wines and spirits from the successors in business of Sir T. White. I think the declaration made by the learned judge in the court below is correct; and I feel the more satisfaction in so deciding because I think the rent of £1,500 was never intended to be the rent of the property. I think it is very likely that the rent really agreed upon was £1,200, and that it was put in the form of a rent of £1,500 with a conditional abatement of £300 in order to make more certain the observance of the terms about the wines and spirits.

FLOYD v. LYONS & CO. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Covenant by lessor to pay water rate—Water supplied for domestic use—Water supplied for trade purposes—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), s. 3—The New River Company's Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. clx.), ss. 35, 38, 40.

A covenant by the lessor of premises intended to be used as a café that he will pay all water rate "now or hereafter to be imposed or assessed upon the said premises, or on the lessor or lessees in respect thereof,"

Held, not to apply to a sum payable by the lessees, in virtue of a special contract under section 40 of the New River Company's Act, 1852, for the supply of water for trade purposes.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

The plaintiff was owner and lessor of certain premises in Walbrook, in the city of London, the ground floor and basement of which premises were let to the defendants, Lyons & Co. (Limited), refreshment contractors, for a term of thirty years. By the lease the defendants covenanted "not to carry on any noisome or obnoxious trade or business," but it was agreed that the sale of refreshments on the premises should not be considered a breach of their covenant. The lessor covenanted "to pay all rates, taxes, assessments, water rate, and other outgoings, except the gas and electric light, now or hereafter to be imposed or assessed upon the said premises, or on the lessor or lessees in respect thereof." The premises in question, together with the adjoining premises in Budge-row, were used by the defendants wholly as a café, for the sale and consumption thereon of tea, coffee, and other light refreshments; and the defendants annually paid the sum of £47 8s. to the New River Co. for water consumed in respect of the café. £16 10s., part of the £47 8s., was for water for domestic purposes, 18s. was a special item for two water-closets, and £30 was payable by virtue of a special contract under section 40 of the New River Co.'s Act, 1852, for the supply of water for trade purposes. The defendants, when they paid their rent, deducted half of the total sum of £47 8s. as being the proportion of water rates payable in respect of the Walbrook premises, and therefore, as they contended, payable by the plaintiff under her covenant. The plaintiff objected to being charged with any of the item of £30 for water for trade purposes; and took out a summons to have it determined whether she was liable to pay the sum charged by the New River Co. for the supply of water for the trade carried on upon the premises in question by the defendants.

Kekewich, J., decided that the plaintiff was so liable; and the plaintiff appealed.

Cutler, Q.C., and R. F. MacSwinney, for the appeal.

Alexander, Q.C., and Ribton, for the defendants.

Cutler, Q.C., replied.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question is whether the covenant which the plaintiff has entered into binds her to pay that part of the water rate which is charged for water supplied for trade purposes, as distinguished from domestic purposes. It has been contended that the plaintiff is liable for all water rate whatsoever; but the concluding words of her covenant are important as showing the real nature of the charge which the parties intended to create. [The lord justice read the concluding words of the covenant, and continued:] Now, it is not strictly correct to speak of any water rate as being imposed upon the premises, but it is reasonably clear that the water rate to which the covenant is intended to apply is the rate payable under section 35 of the New River Co.'s Act, 1852, and does not include a charge like this now in question for the supply of water for trade purposes. Kekewich, J., seems to me to have given too little attention to those important concluding words of the covenant, and for that reason he has gone wrong. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

A. L. SMITH and RIGBY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

(a.) Reported by G. B. HAMILTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Motion.

The defendants were the Urban District Council of Ravensthorpe, which was formerly part of the parish of Mirfield, in the West Riding of Yorkshire. Their predecessors were many years ago formed as a local board. In 1867 the Ravensthorpe District Board, under section 75 of the Public Health Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), contracted for a supply of water from the borough of Dewsbury, and laid mains so as to distribute it to customers in their own district.

The plaintiffs were the Huddersfield Municipal Corporation, suing as a water authority, and they were empowered by the Huddersfield Water Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. cx.), as extended by the Huddersfield Waterworks Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. xxiii.), to supply "the township of Mirfield, in the parish of Mirfield." In 1873 the portion of the parish of Mirfield which was not included in the Ravensthorpe Urban Sanitary District was formed into a local government district called the Mirfield Urban Sanitary District. Under the Local Government Act, 1894, the two divisions of Mirfield would become separate parishes unless the county council directed otherwise.

The West Riding Boundaries Committee (by delegation from the county council) made an order on the 11th of July, 1894, that—no special reason existing why each of the parts of the said parish should not be a separate parish—the part of the existing parish of Mirfield within the Mirfield local government district should be known as "Mirfield," and the part within the Ravensthorpe local government district should be known as "Ravensthorpe," and that the new parish of Mirfield should have the custody of the existing documents.

On the 13th of March, 1895, the committee made an order under section 57 of the Local Government Act, 1888 (duly confirmed by the Local Government Board), an area of about twenty acres was transferred from the urban district of Mirfield to the urban district of Ravensthorpe.

In January, 1897, the defendants began to extend their mains into the added area without giving notice to the plaintiffs under the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 52, and the plaintiffs now moved for an injunction to restrain the defendants from constructing any waterworks in the township of Mirfield or elsewhere within the limits of supply within which the plaintiffs were empowered to supply water by the Huddersfield Waterworks Acts, 1869 and 1871, without the consent of the plaintiffs, so long as the plaintiffs were able and willing to supply water proper and sufficient for all reasonable purposes for which it was required by the defendants.

Section 52 of the Public Health Act, 1875, is as follows: "Before commencing to construct waterworks within the limits of supply of any water company empowered by Act of Parliament, or by any order confirmed by Parliament to supply water, the local authority shall give written notice to every water company within whose limits of supply the local authority are desirous of supplying water, stating the purposes for which, and (as far as may be practicable) the extent to which, water is required by the local authority. It shall not be lawful for the local authority to construct any waterworks within such limits, if and so long as any such company are able and willing to supply water proper and sufficient for all reasonable purposes for which it is required by the local authority; and any difference as to whether the water which any such company are able and willing to lay on is proper and sufficient for the purposes for which it is required, or whether the purposes for which it is required are reasonable or (if and so far as the charges of the company are not regulated by Parliament) as to the terms of supply, shall be settled by arbitration in manner provided by this Act."

Balfour Browne, Q.C., Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and A. Glen, for the plaintiffs.—The limits of our area are definite, and are not altered by the division of the parish under the Local Government Act, 1894. The transfer of the area could only be made subject to our rights, and the defendants have no right to construct waterworks without giving us notice under section 52 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and R. C. Glen, for the defendants.—The plaintiffs' limits of supply are the township of Mirfield, in the parish of Mirfield. No part of our district is within the present parish of Mirfield. The plaintiffs had no exclusive rights over Mirfield: see the Halifax Water and Gas Extension Act, 1870 (35 & 36 Vict. c. xcv., s. 11). An addition to existing waterworks is not a construction of waterworks within section 52 of the Public Health Act, 1875: Cleveland Water Co. v. Redcar Local Board, 43 W. R. 90, [1895] 1 Ch. 168; West Surrey Water Co. v. Chertsey Union, 43 W. R. 6, [1894] 3 Ch. 513.

Browne, Q.C., replied.

NORTH, J.—The Huddersfield Water Acts, which fix the plaintiffs' limits of supply, do not give them an exclusive right of supply within those limits, but merely declare within what limits water may be supplied. The limits defined in the schedule include "the township of Mirfield, in the parish of Mirfield." That is merely a geographical description of a definite area, and cannot be considered as equivalent to "the township of Mirfield, in the parish of Mirfield, for the time being." The Local Government Act, 1888, s. 57, sub-section 1 (c), enables a county council to make an order for the transfer of the whole or any part of one urban or rural district to another, such order being subject to confirmation by the Local Government Board, and by section 59, sub-section 4 (a), the abolition, restriction, or establishment or extension of jurisdiction of any local authority in or over any part of the area affected by the order is provided for. Then the Local Government Act, 1894, known as the Parish Councils Act, was passed. Section 36, sub-section 2, provides that "where a parish is, at the passing of this Act, situate in more than one urban district, the parts of the parish in each such district shall, as from the appointed day, unless the county council for special reasons otherwise direct, . . . be separate parishes, in like manner as if they had been constituted separate parishes under the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, and the Acts amending the same."

The contention of the defendants is that the Local Government Act, 1894, s. 36, altered the limits of supply of the plaintiffs, and made them different from those fixed by the Huddersfield Waterworks Act, 1871. With that I do not agree, the limits remained exactly the same as before the Local Government Act, 1894, came into operation, and the Act effected no alteration in local area. The boundaries committee might have united the old parish of Mirfield to Dewsbury, and called it Dewsbury, and in that case the parish of Mirfield would have disappeared altogether. It cannot reasonably be supposed that such a course would have altered the plaintiffs' limits of supply. The order of the boundaries committee of the 13th of March, 1895, was confirmed by the Local Government Board on the 31st of August, 1895. The urban district of Ravensthorpe was increased by that order, which took away from the urban district of Mirfield a little plot of about twenty acres. The defendants are the local authority for the urban district of Ravensthorpe as it now stands. Their duties apply to the whole of such district, including the added area—that is to say, they have the same duties with respect to the added area as with respect to the rest of the district. They are now proceeding to extend their existing water system into their new district, and to lay down additional mains in order to provide such new district with water. The whole district is within the plaintiffs' limits of supply, and they now seek to restrain the defendants, upon the ground that they have not complied with section 52 of the Public Health Act, 1875. The point is absolutely covered by the authority cited, which is precisely in point. The judgment in Cleveland Water Co. v. Redcar Local Board, 43 W. R. 90, [1895] 1 Ch. 168, pp. 173-175, might be read as part of my judgment in this case. It draws a distinction between the extension of existing waterworks and the construction of new waterworks. In that case very much more had been done than has been done here. As a matter of construction I am not satisfied that section 52 applies to more than section 51 (1), but it is not necessary to go into that. The defendants have had a system of pipes through their district for many years, and are now extending that system. It does not matter whether the existing system constitutes "waterworks" or not, for if it does not, neither does the new system; if it does, the new system is only an extension of those waterworks. An attempt has been made to distinguish Cleveland Water Co. v. Redcar Local Board, upon the ground that in that case there was only one district from the first, whereas here the district has been increased in area, but I do not see that that makes any difference. The defendants' duties apply to their present district as it stands, the fact that it has been increased can make no difference. Is there any difference made by the terms of the order of the 13th of March, 1895?

It is argued that the defendants took the added area subject to the rights, liabilities, and obligations which were attaching to the Mirfield Urban District Council in respect thereof. But I cannot see that the Mirfield Urban District Council were under liability to take water from the plaintiffs, and if this is so, no liability passed to the defendants. But even supposing that the Mirfield Urban District Council were under an obligation not to construct waterworks without notice to the plaintiffs, and that liability passed to the defendants, the answer is that the defendants are not constructing waterworks.

The point raised by the evidence, whether the plaintiffs are in fact able and willing to supply pure water, does not arise. As there is nothing to compel the defendants to give notice under section 52, so it is unnecessary to consider whether, if such notice were given, it could be complied with. In any case it would be a matter for arbitration as provided by the Act.

The plaintiffs are apprehensive of a large loss of income, but in my opinion their fears are not justified. They have the advantage of possession of the present water supply; but even if they do suffer loss I cannot go behind the law as it stands. The plaintiffs have mistaken their rights and the application must be dismissed.

LEWIS v. POWELL. (a.)

Practice—Discovery—Production of documents—Documents in possession of former solicitor—Solicitor's lien—Dispute as to bill of costs—R. S. C., ord. 31, r. 14.

The principle that it is not a good defence on a summons for production of documents to say that the documents are in the possession of a former solicitor of the person called on to produce, who has a lien on them for his bill of costs, applies also to a case where it is alleged, in addition, that the bill of costs is disputed and that there is a good defence to it. An order for production will be made in such a case with liberty to apply, in order to prevent any hardship.

Rodick v. Gandell, 10 Beav. 270, and Vale v. Oppert, 23 W. R. 780, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 340, applied.

This was a summons by the defendant to compel production of documents, and was resisted by the plaintiff on the ground that the documents were in the possession of former solicitors of his, and were subject to their lien for a bill of costs which he disputed.

On the 1st of January, 1897, the plaintiff filed an affidavit of documents and stated that certain documents mentioned in the schedule thereto were in the possession of his former solicitors.

On the present summons being taken out for a further and better affidavit of documents and for discovery, the plaintiff on the 26th of February filed a second affidavit to the effect that he had applied to the solicitors for the documents, but his application had been refused. In paragraph 6 of this affidavit he stated that he was unwilling to discharge the lien of the solicitors, as he believed that he had a good claim against them for negligence in the conduct of his business, which claim could be more easily dealt with in an action for negligence after the hearing of the present action. He accordingly declined to take any further steps to recover possession of the documents in question.

Grosvenor Woods, Q.C., and Lacy Smith, for the summons.—The rule laid down in Ex parte Shaw, Jac. 270, that, in litigation between two parties when one of them resists discovery on the ground that the documents are in the hands of his former solicitors, it is no defence that the solicitors have a lien upon them and decline to hand them over until they are paid, has been recognized in Taylor v. Rundell, 1 Ph. 222. In Rodick v. Gandell, 10 Beav. 270, an order for production was made and leave was given to the defendant to apply if he found any difficulty in complying with the order. Liddell v. Norton, Kay, Appx. xi., 2 W. R. Ch. Dig. 71, and Hope v. Liddell, 3 W. R. 581, 7 De G. M. & G. 331, are also authorities. Goodchap v. Weaving, 16 Jur. 586, also applies. In Vale v. Oppert, 23 W. R. 780, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 340, an order for production was made, though there had been a change of solicitors during the litigation; and Ex parte Shaw was there cited by James, L.J.

They also referred to Seton, vol. 1, p. 68, Cordery on Solicitors, p. 301.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and E. Ford, for the respondent.—The documents are not in the plaintiff's power, and can only be obtained by paying a disputed claim. [STIRLING, J.—Is it enough for the plaintiff to say, "I have a claim for negligence against my solicitor?"] We submit that it is. Rodick v. Gandell has nothing to do with this case. Liddell v. Norton is in our favour because it shows the difference between the case of a mortgagee and the case of a solicitor. Hope v. Liddell and Goodchap v. Weaving only come to this, that where you have no defence to the bill of costs it ought to be paid. The order in Vale v. Oppert would never have been made if there had been a defence to the bill in that case: Wroughton v. Barclay, 11 Jur. 274, and Kettlewell v. Barstow, 20 W. R. 621. [STIRLING, J.—Kettlewell v. Barstow appears to me to be entirely contrary to Vale v. Oppert.] The court is asked to extend the doctrine of Ex parte Shaw to a case in which it has never yet been applied. The authorities simply come to this, that it is not sufficient to say there is a bill and it is unpaid, but they do not apply at all to the case of a disputed bill.

Grosvenor Woods, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

STIRLING, J., after stating the facts, continued:—In this state of facts what is the right of the defendant to production of the documents in question. It is not said that the plaintiff has not given full information as regards the documents now in his possession or power, but the question is how far the lien of the plaintiff's former solicitors precludes the court from making an order for discovery in the usual form. This question has been repeatedly before the courts. The case usually referred to as stating the rule which applies where documents are held by a solicitor subject to his lien for costs, is Ex parte Shaw. Lord Eldon there says: "Where a motion is made for a party to produce papers in his custody, possession, or power, the order made is for him to produce them, and if they are in the hands of his solicitor, and he cannot produce them without paying his bill of costs, he must pay it." This statement has been repeatedly cited in subsequent cases without a word of disapproval, and is expressly approved by Turner, L.J., in Goodchap v. Weaving; but questions have arisen from time to time as to how far the court would go in compelling discovery where documents were in possession of a former solicitor who insisted upon his lien. One of those cases was Rodick v. Gandell, where the defendants who became bankrupt after the filing of the bill put in an answer by which they admitted that there were in the possession of their solicitor two pass-books, but alleged that they had come into his possession before the bankruptcy, and that he had a lien thereon for costs incurred prior to that date, and the plaintiff moved for production of the pass-books. Lord Langdale there said: "The defendants are bound to produce these documents if they can; and if they find a difficulty they must come to the court to give them an opportunity of taking such proceedings against their solicitor as may be proper to compel the production. I cannot think that the solicitor will oppose any difficulty in allowing an inspection of the documents in his possession; and it is to be observed that the objection to production is now made, not by the solicitor, but by the clients," and he made the order, but left it open to the defendants to make any application to be relieved if they should be prevented from complying with it. In Vale v. Oppert a similar question arose. There the defendant shortly after filing an affidavit as to documents entered into liquidation of his affairs by arrangement. The plaintiff applied for production of the documents, and this was resisted by the defendant on the ground that they were in the possession of his former solicitors, who claimed a lien on them. Bacon, V.C., made an order for the production, and James, L.J., n affirming the order, said: "If an order for production were refused, we should be enabling defendants to resort to the device of delivering documents to their solicitor, changing him, and then refusing production on the ground that they were unable to pay his bill. That is a device which the court cannot encourage. The order of the Vice-Chancellor must stand, but the defendant must have liberty to apply if it turns out that he really cannot get the documents produced. He will not, however, be excused on the ground of his making a mere formal application to Messrs. Elmslie & Co., as if he did not care whether he got them or not; he must satisfy the court he has done his best to comply with the order; and the plaintiff must not issue attachment without the leave of the court." These cases show that the mere fact that documents are in possession of a former solicitor, who claims a lien upon them, is not a sufficient answer to the application in the usual mode for discovery; but the court takes care in applying the rule that the client shall not be subjected to oppression, and in former times the order for discovery was qualified by reserving liberty to apply, and by imposing a condition that attachment should not be issued without the leave of the court. That provision in the order is, however, not now necessary, because since the Judicature Act a writ of attachment cannot be issued without the leave of the court.

If there was nothing more in this case I should have thought that the order ought to be made. But the question which I have to consider is, whether the statement in paragraph 6 of the plaintiff's second affidavit makes any difference. In substance the plaintiff disputes the bill of costs which has been delivered, and says he has a good claim for negligence against the solicitors. Ought this to be allowed as an answer to an ordinary claim for production? It is said that in the former cases there was no dispute as to bill of costs, and no case of negligence made against the solicitors, and that the rule of the court is based upon the theory that it is desirable to discourage collusion between a solicitor and his client for the purpose of defeating an application for discovery, and therefore does not extend to a case where the client is disputing his solicitor's bill. I shall assume that that is the foundation of the rule as it was unquestionably the foundation of the judgment of James, L.J., in Vale v. Oppert. Now, I do not desire in the slightest degree to say that I in any way suspect the statements in the plaintiff's affidavits to be unfounded, but I must point out that nothing is more common than for a client who quarrels with his solicitor and leaves him, to be dissatisfied with the mode in which the solicitor has conducted his business. If I were to accede to this argument, that is an answer which would be resorted to in almost every case where there had been a change of solicitors, and it would throw upon the court the burden of considering whether an action for negligence against the solicitor would succeed. I decline to entertain any such question. The test in every case is whether the person called upon to make production has done his best to get possession of the documents claimed by his solicitor. The court has the means of judging that question; it has not the means of judging whether an action for negligence against the solicitor will succeed or not. Therefore I think that the mere statement by the client that he has a claim of negligence against the solicitor ought not to be accepted as releasing him from his obligation. But I must say that, at all times, and still more at the present time, the court is desirous that orders for production should not be made an instrument of oppression. Therefore the court, in making the order for production, gives liberty to apply, to provide for the contingency of the party called upon to produce the documents finding a difficulty in obtaining them. Of course it will form part of the order in the present case. I was desirous of ascertaining what view the plaintiff's solicitors took, and I therefore directed the matter to stand over for a fortnight. The plaintiff stated that he was perfectly willing that these documents should be produced if the solicitors were willing to give them up. An application has now been made to the solicitors, and it appears that they simply desire to adhere to their legal position until their lien is discharged. I cannot blame them for taking up the position. It is no part of my duty to say what can be done by the plaintiff to enable production to be obtained, but when a client is desirous of getting possession of documents in the hands of his solicitors, for his own purposes, it is usually not difficult to come to some arrangement by which a substantial guarantee may be substituted for the somewhat shadowy one of keeping the documents, which the solicitors happen to have in their possession. At all events, it does not appear to me to be impossible for the plaintiff to obtain production of the documents in question. I think, therefore, that the order, qualified in the way I have mentioned, ought to go.

HAYWARD v. HAYWARD. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Life interest—Forfeiture on bankruptcy—Colonial bankruptcy—English domicil—Property not "vested in or payable to" colonial trustee.

A colonial bankruptcy, where the debtor still retains his English domicil, will not of itself be sufficient to work a forfeiture of his life interest under an English will determinable on his becoming bankrupt or doing or suffering something whereby his interest, if belonging absolutely to him, would become vested in, or payable to, some other person or persons.

By her will made in 1882, Josephine Elizabeth Hayward bequeathed to her trustees the sum of £4,000 (reduced by codicil to £3,500) upon trust, to invest the same and pay the income to her son, Frederick Berger Hayward, the defendant, "during his life, or until he shall be outlawed, or become bankrupt, or file a petition for liquidation of his affairs, or shall assign, charge, or incumber, or attempt or affect to assign, charge, or incumber the said interest, dividends, or income, or some part thereof, or shall do or suffer something whereby the same or some part thereof would, through his own act or default, or by operation or process of law or otherwise, if belonging absolutely to him, become vested in or payable to some other person or persons." After the determination of this trust there was a gift over of the principal sum on trusts similar to those declared of the residuary estate of the testatrix.

The testatrix died in 1892. For some years subsequent to the testatrix's death, the defendant,

(a.) Reported by R. J. A. MORRISON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Frederick Berger Hayward, was temporarily resident in New Zealand, still retaining his English domicil. The trustees from time to time sent the income of the fund to him, and the last instalment was forwarded to him by them on the 13th of March, 1896.

On the 16th of March, 1896, the trustees received a letter from the official assignee in bankruptcy in Auckland, New Zealand, giving them notice that Frederick Berger Hayward had been adjudicated bankrupt at Auckland on a creditor's petition on the 16th of December, 1895, and claiming the funds belonging to him. In December, 1896, the bankruptcy was annulled, all the debts having been paid in full. The trustees of the will took out the present summons asking whether the defendant Frederick Berger Hayward's interest in the fund had been determined by his bankruptcy in New Zealand.

Section 55 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1892, of New Zealand enacts that "Upon adjudication the property of the bankrupt, whatsoever and wheresoever situate, shall vest in the official assignee of the court in which the order of adjudication was made, as such official assignee," and the word "property" as defined by the same Act, "means and includes land, money, goods, things in action, goodwill, and every description of property whether real or personal and whether situate in New Zealand or elsewhere, also obligations, easements, and every description of estate, interest, and profit, present or future, vested or contingent, arising out of or incident to property as above defined."

Mark L. Romer, for the defendant Frederick Berger Hayward. — This colonial bankruptcy does not work a forfeiture of this interest. The bankrupt had never lost his English domicil, and the bankruptcy did not vest ipso facto in the official assignee the debtor's property, but the assignee, in order to validate and perfect his title, would have had to come over to this country and obtain the help of the English court: In re Blithman, L. R. 2, Eq. 23, 14 W. R. Ch. Dig. 51. The case of In re Davidson's Settlement Trusts, 21 W. R. 452, L. R. 15 Eq. 383, does not apply, for in that case the debtor was made bankrupt on his own petition, and the assignee came over here and asked for payment. These cases are referred to in Mr. Westlake's book on Private International Law, par. 134.

Ball, for another defendant who was entitled to the next life interest in the fund in question, expectant on the determination of Frederick Berger Hayward's interest.—The clause in the will means any bankruptcy which is recognized: In re Aylwin's Trust, 21 W. R. 864, L. R. 16 Eq. 585, and a colonial bankruptcy will be recognized in England under section 118 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The question of domicil is not the true test to apply in a case like the present.

KEKEWICH, J.—Upon the proper construction of the clause in the will there is no determination of the defendant Frederick Berger Hayward's life estate until he has become subject to the bankruptcy laws, so that this interest would be payable to someone else.

Now, having regard to this colonial bankruptcy, could the New Zealand trustee in bankruptcy sue over here on a bill and get a declaration in his favour? I mean of course but for this forfeiture clause. That seems to me to depend upon the question whether this was a good New Zealand bankruptcy. By the law of that colony the personal property of the bankrupt became vested in the trustee in bankruptcy. I am dealing with the question of the ownership of the property, and I should have jumped to the conclusion that possessio bonorum in New Zealand was equivalent to a general assignment for value and passed to the trustee all that the bankrupt could pass himself. There is, however, authority on this point —namely, In re Blithman, where Lord Romilly puts his judgment on the ground of domicil, and says: "I am of opinion upon examining all the cases which have been cited to me, and considering it as carefully as I can, that this is a question of domicil and depends upon domicil alone; and that if Henwood was a domiciled Australian at the time, then that this property passed to the assignees, but that if he was not, then it passes to his legal personal representative, and she is the person entitled to receive it." So that there can be no question that Lord Romilly would have held in the present case that this interest did not become payable to the trustee in bankruptcy, but continued payable to the defendant himself. That case was commented on by James, L.J., sitting for Wickens, V.C., in In re Davidson's Settlement Trusts, and the learned judge there said it was not necessary to consider In re Blithman, for in the former case the debtor had been adjudicated bankrupt on his own petition. In the present instance that is not the case, for the defendant was made bankrupt behind his back, he was domiciled in England, and In re Davidson's Settlement Trusts is not adverse so as to overrule In re Blithman. I found in my reports a note referring to the recent case of In re Lawson's Trusts, 44 W. R. 280, [1896] 1 Ch. 175, and I looked at that case, but it does not help us. North, J., there followed In re Davidson's Settlement Trusts.

In paragraph 134 of his book on Private International Law, Mr. Westlake gives the general rule with regard to the personal property in England of bankrupts domiciled abroad; and then in the note to that paragraph the author goes on to point out the decisions in In re Blithman and In re Davidson's Settlement Trusts.

I have before me Story on the Conflict of Laws, and so far as I can see, the domicil question was never really discussed. There seems to have been a foreign domicile in all the cases of foreign bankruptcies, and an English domicil in all cases of English bankruptcies.

I think I must decide this case according to In re Blithman. If that case is wrong it must be overruled. It was not open to James, L.J., sitting as a judge of first instance, to overrule it. I think, therefore, that this adjudication did not make the property payable to the trustee in bankruptcy.

man, the expenditure of capital money upon works not coming within the scope of those Acts, but such expenditure will not be sanctioned unless a case of salvage is clearly proved.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons by the trustees of a settlement comprising certain freehold estates at Longparish and Bullington, Hants, and Spitalfields, London, made by the will of the late Colonel Peter Hawker, deceased, and dated the 21st of November, 1843, for the determination of (inter alia) the following questions—namely, whether the applicants as trustees of the above-mentioned settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts could apply the capital moneys in their hands or under their control, consisting of a sum of £2,442 3s. Consols, or any part thereof, in or towards the carrying out on the above-mentioned Spitalfields and Longparish and Bullington estates of certain works and improvements enumerated in specifications and reports prepared by the surveyors therein named, and recommended by them to be done.

The specifications and reports included improvements which fell within the scope of the Settled Land Acts, and also certain repairs which avowedly did not fall within the purview of those Acts, but which, as the evidence showed, were required to be executed in order to keep the property advantageously let.

Upon inquiry in chambers the expenditure of £652 on the Spitalfields property, and £800 on the Hampshire property was allowed in respect of those improvements which fell within the Settled Land Acts, and the summons was adjourned into court for the argument of counsel upon the question whether the court had jurisdiction to sanction the further expenditure of capital money upon the repairs and works not coming within the scope of the Settled Land Acts.

The defendant was the infant tenant in tail in possession of the settled estates. The remainderman had not been made a party to the summons.

S. Dickinson, for the trustees.—The jurisdiction of the court has often been exercised in sanctioning expenditure similar to that now asked. The court exercised its general jurisdiction and allowed expenditure of money on settled property in the interests of infants in Frith v. Cameron, 19 W. R. 886, L. R. 12 Eq. 169, and In re Jackson, 21 Ch. D. 786, 31 W. R. Dig. 204, and your lordship sanctioned the outlay of settled money under the original jurisdiction of the court in Conway v. Fenton, 37 W. R. 156, 40 Ch. D. 512. An advance of settled money was allowed in In re Household, 27 Ch. D. 553, 33 W. R. Dig. 105, on evidence that the outlay would be to the advantage of the infant remaindermen. The jurisdiction was recognized in In re Hotchkys, 34 W. R. 569, 32 Ch. D. 408; and in In re De Teissier's Settled Estates, 41 W. R. 186, [1893] 1 Ch. 153, the question of jurisdiction was left open; Chitty, J., did not decide it.

T. Arnold Herbert, for the infant tenant in tail.—Whatever jurisdiction the court may have had to expend capital money prior to the Settled Land Acts, the effect of those Acts is to confine the jurisdiction of the court to the expenditure within those Acts. In re De Teissier and In re Lord Gerard's Settled Estates, [1893] 3 Ch. 252, 42 W. R. Dig. 63, are in favour of that contention. The general jurisdiction of the court was not recognized in In re Ormrod's Settled Estates, 40 W. R. 490, [1892] 2 Ch. 318, nor in In re The Twyford Abbey Settled Estates, 30 W. R. 268, nor in Brunskill v. Caird, 21 W. R. 943, L. R. 16 Eq. 493. Even assuming that I am wrong on the question of jurisdiction, there is no case where the court made such an order, where there was a tenant in tail in remainder, without his consent, and there is no case where the court sanctioned the expenditure except where the infant was living on the land.

KEKEWICH, J.—This summons was adjourned into court so that I could hear the argument of counsel upon the question of the jurisdiction of the court and its extent and limit in cases like the present. In chambers it was said on the one hand that this case was within Conway v. Fenton, 37 W. R. 156, 40 Ch. D. 512, and on the other hand that it fell within In re De Teissier's Settled Estates, but I was not then satisfied with either contention.

I have before me the infant tenant in tail in possession; there is no contingency, he is the actual tenant in tail now, and the trustees have powers of management over the settled estates. There are several remainders over, and I am told that I can have the next tenant in tail in remainder added as a party if necessary. [His lordship then referred to the various other questions in the summons which had been determined in chambers, and continued:] Then comes the question of the repairs to the agricultural estate in Hampshire and to the urban property at Spitalfields. I was prepared to direct the application of a competent part of the money in hand towards any improvements which fell within the Settled Land Acts, and I directed an inquiry for that purpose. The result of that inquiry shows that it is proposed to spend in respect of those improvements £652 on the Spitalfields property and £800 on the Hampshire estates. In addition to these sums, the evidence goes to show that there is need of a considerable expenditure upon repairs which avowedly do not fall within the Settled Land Acts, not even within sub-section 2 of section 13 of the Settled Land Act, 1890, because as these properties are already let to tenants they do not fall within the description there given.

It was, however, said that independently of the Settled Land Acts, I could, under the general jurisdiction of the court, direct the outlay of capital money, and Conway v. Fenton was referred to. That was an extremely peculiar case, and I did not decide such a question as arises here, it was impossible in that case to deal with the land without first of all incurring some expenditure.

The case of Conway v. Fenton does not touch the question with which I have now to deal, but the other cases cited to me are in point, and the summary of cases compiled by Mr. Kenyon Parker in In re Jackson, 21 Ch. D. at pp. 787-8, 31 W. R. Dig. 204, is also extremely useful. I am asked to sanction under the general jurisdiction of the court the expenditure of capital money upon these repairs which are outside what the Settled Land Acts allow. My impression is that if I were satisfied that the repairs were necessary and for the benefit of the infant, then, with the assent of the tenant in tail in remainder, I might assent to an application of capital money in a manner which otherwise would not be strictly right or permissible. I do not intend so to decide, but such is my impression.

It has been argued that I have no jurisdiction under the Act to sanction this outlay; to that proposition I do not accede. Nothing short of express words will suffice to take away the general jurisdiction of the court, and I ought not to infer that it has been taken away unless I find express words to that effect. It is said that the words of section 21 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, are imperative, but I think the words of that section refer only to the Act itself and are not sufficient to take away the general jurisdiction which existed prior to the Act.

I do not comment upon the decision of Chitty, J., in In re De Teissier's Settled Estates, but I do concur entirely with what he says concerning the operation of the Settled Land Acts, as summed up in the last paragraph to the head-note [1893] 1 Ch. on p. 153, "that whether the Settled Land Acts did or did not exclude or fetter the general jurisdiction of the court—as to which no opinion was expressed—they were of great assistance in guiding the court to a proper conclusion as to what repairs and improvements should be allowed." I find the provisions of the Act a great assistance in the present case. It was open to the Legislature in its subsequent enactments to have provided for the decision in Conway v. Fenton if it had thought fit, but it did not do so, and the Act of 1890, in sub-section 2 of section 13, limits the application of capital money to "additions to or alterations in buildings," as Chitty, J., points out in In re De Teissier.

The court looks with jealousy upon repairs done for a tenant for life. The repairs should be done by the tenant for life. The court does not regard with so much jealousy the case of a tenant in tail, but still I am not in a hurry to spend capital money in repairs. I do not think I can go beyond this; Chitty, J., would not go so far. For this to be a proper case for such expenditure it should be one of salvage, and one in which the land would be lost unless the expenditure were made. If the trustees had spent their own money, they would have a strong case upon which to come to the court and ask to be repaid, or if they had spent trust money they would have got an inquiry as to how far the trust money had been properly expended.

I think it is a simple step to say that the court might, with the concurrence of the tenant in tail in remainder, sanction the expenditure of an infant's money when it was a case of saving the estate—that is, a case of salvage. Salvage cases are always extremely difficult to determine, because one does not know what would happen if the money was not expended. Cases which arise under sanitary authorities, or cases of premiums on policies, do not admit of doubt, but other cases do; as, for instance, the case of a farm which it was impossible to let to a particular tenant at a particular rent without the execution of repairs, but it does not follow that the same farm could not be let to another tenant without any previous expenditure on repairs. I should want very clear evidence that the money expended would bring in its equivalent, either in the improved value of the estate or in increased income, so as to bring the case within the principle of salvage. If I had proper evidence I should be inclined to say that the court had jurisdiction to sanction the expenditure of the infant's money so as to debar the infant from hereafter calling on the trustees to replace it. In a case where the infant was absolutely entitled I think the expenditure might be sanctioned, and also in the case of an infant tenant in tail with the consent of the remainderman.

In the present case, however, I have not sufficient evidence and I am not satisfied that, after the sums of £800 and £652 already allowed have been spent, any further sums would come within the salvage rule. I accordingly shall only make an order sanctioning the expenditure certified by the chief clerk as coming within the scope of the Settled Land Acts.

PRIESTLEY v. ELLIS. (a.)

Settlement—Trust for payment of debts—Deed of family arrangement—No notice to creditors—Death of settlor—Binding trust—Liability of estate.

Where a father and son by deed appoint property to trustees upon trust (subject to the father's life interest therein) to sell the same or any part thereof with the consent of the father and son during their joint lives and of the survivor of them during his life, and after the survivor's death at the discretion of the trustees, and out of the proceeds of sale and out of the rents and profits until sale to pay the father's debts owing during his life or at his decease, and to pay the surplus proceeds and convey the unsold property to the trustees of a settlement of even date under which the father was tenant for life and the son tenant in tail in remainder, a binding trust in favour of the father's creditors will arise upon his death although the purport of the deed has not been communicated to them, and the unsold part of the property comprised in the deed will remain charged with the unsatisfied debts of the father notwithstanding the fact that it has been conveyed to the settlement trustees.

Synnot v. Simpson, 5 H. L. Cas. 121, and Garrard v. Lord Lauderdale, 2 Russ. & M. 451, distinguished.

At the date of the deed of family arrangement hereinafter set out, Richard Lloyd-Edwards was indebted to his sister, Catherine Wynne-Edwards, in a sum of £2,266 13s. 4d., and continued so indebted to her until his death. By the said deed of family arrangement dated the 16th of October, 1867, Richard Lloyd-Edwards and Francis William Lloyd-Edwards, as part of a family arrangement and in exercise of a joint power of appointment by deed vested in them by virtue of a disentailing assurance dated the 15th of October, 1867, appointed that the hereditaments described in the schedule thereto, forming part of the hereditaments comprised in the said disentailing assurance and containing forty-nine different lots, should, immediately after the execution thereof, but subject and without prejudice to such charges and incumbrances as were then subsisting upon the said hereditaments, remain to the use of Richard during his life, and after his decease to the use of the said John Griffith Wynn Griffith and Hugh John Ellis Nanney their heirs and assigns upon trust that they and their assigns or other the trustees or trustee thereof (thereinafter called the trustees or trustee) should, with the concurrence of Richard and the consent in writing of Francis William during their joint lives and with the concurrence or like consent (as the case might be) of the survivor of them during his life, and after the death of the survivor at the discretion of the trustees or trustee sell the said hereditaments or any part thereof respectively in manner therein mentioned and should stand possessed of the moneys to arise from any such sale (including in case any such sale should be made in the lifetime of Richard such part of the said moneys as should represent his life estate) and also of the rents and profits thereof until such sale (and which said moneys, rents, and profits were thereinafter referred to as "the trust funds") in trust in payment in such order and in such manner as the trustees or trustee should (with the concurrence of Richard during his lifetime) order and determine, of all debts or sums of money which should from time to time during the lifetime of Richard or at the time of his decease be due and owing from Richard upon specialty, simple contract, or otherwise to any person or persons whomsoever and all interest and arrears of interest due in respect thereof; and after satisfying all the trusts aforesaid should stand possessed of the surplus which should remain of the trust funds and also of so much of the said hereditaments as should then remain unsold, as to such surplus trust funds upon trust to pay over the same to the trustees for the time being of the next thereinafter mentioned indenture of settlement to be held by such trustees upon the trusts upon which such surplus trust funds would be held in case the same were moneys arising from any exercise of the powers of sale and exchange contained in the said indenture of settlement which bore even date with the said deed of family arrangement and was made between the said Richard Lloyd-Edwards of the first part, the said Francis William Lloyd-Edwards of the second part, and the defendant Benjamin Thomas Ellis and Richard Edwards Priestley of the third part, and as to such unsold hereditaments and premises upon trust to convey the same to the last-mentioned trustees, to the uses and upon the trusts in and by the said indenture of settlement expressed and declared concerning the several hereditaments thereby appointed or such of them as should then be subsisting or capable of taking effect, but not so as to increase or multiply charges or powers of charging. And it was thereby provided that in case the said hereditaments or any part thereof should be sold in the lifetime of Richard under the aforesaid trust the same should be sold as an estate in possession, and it was thereby provided that the trustees or trustee should stand possessed of the said hereditaments upon trust to permit the rents and profits thereof or of any portion thereof for the time being remaining unsold (after providing for the payment of the interest upon any mortgages) to be received by the person or persons for the time being entitled to the receipt of the rents and profits of the hereditaments comprised in the said indenture of settlement as tenant for life or in tail under the limitations of the said settlement.

Under the limitations of the said indenture of settlement Richard was legal tenant for life, with remainder to the use of Francis William for life, with remainder to the use of his first and other sons in tail, with remainders over.

The contents of the deed of family arrangement were never communicated to Catherine Wynne-Edwards or to any other creditor of Richard.

None of the lands comprised in the deed of family arrangement were sold in the lifetime of Richard, and he died on the 18th of January, 1876, having by his will, dated the 22nd of December, 1875, devised all his real estate (subject to certain annuities charged thereon) to Francis William in fee simple, and bequeathed the residue of his personal estate (subject to the payment of his just debts) to Francis William absolutely, and appointed him and Robert Carreg and the defendant, Benjamin Thomas Ellis, executors thereof. The said will was proved by Francis William alone. At the time of his death Richard was indebted in a considerable amount to creditors.

Interest on the said sum of £2,266 13s. 4d. had been duly paid to Catherine Wynne-Edwards by Richard during his life.

On the 29th of August, 1888, the said trustees of the deed of family arrangement exercised their power of sale under that deed and sold some of the lands comprised therein, and out of the proceeds of sale paid all the debts of Richard, except the debt of £2,266 13s. 4d. owing to Catherine Wynne-Edwards, of which debt, as they alleged, they were then unaware, and by an indenture of conveyance dated the 12th of November, 1889, and made between the said trustees of the first part, the said Francis William Lloyd-Edwards of the second part, and the defendants, Benjamin Thomas Ellis and Owen Lloyd Jones Evans (who were then the duly-appointed trustees of the said indenture of settlement) of the third part, and indorsed on the deed of family arrangement, the said trustees of the deed of family arrangement thereby conveyed the lands specified in the schedule thereto, comprising forty-two out of the original forty-nine lots, and all other, if any, the hereditaments comprised in the deed of family arrangement and then remaining unsold, but subject and without prejudice to such charges and incumbrances as were subsisting upon the same, unto the said defendants, to be held by them upon the then subsisting trusts of the said indenture of settlement.

Francis William died on the 20th of January, 1890, having by his will, dated the 16th of February, 1876, and codicil thereto, dated the 29th of June, 1889, appointed his wife, Georgina Sarah Lloyd-Edwards, Blanch Helen Trench, the plaintiff, William Thomas Trench, and the defendant, Benjamin Thomas Ellis, his executors, but without having disposed of his real estates otherwise than by charging the same with the payment of four annuities.

The plaintiff, William Thomas Trench, alone proved the said will on the 21st of July, 1890. The infant defendant, Claude Henry Lloyd-Edwards, was the only son and heir-at-law of Francis William, and became tenant in tail of the said settled estates.

Catherine Wynne-Edwards died on the 13th of February, 1890, having by her will, dated the 8th of February, 1890, appointed the plaintiffs, Henry Samuel Priestley and Christopher Fearne Priestley, her executors and trustees, who proved her said will on the 3rd of September, 1890. At the time of her death the sum of £2,302 3s. 7d. was due to her in respect of Richard's debt, interest on the same having been paid by Francis William since his father's death.

Actions were subsequently commenced for the administration of the estates of Richard and Francis William and (so far as concerns this present report) resulted in the reduction of the said debt from £2,302 3s. 7d. to £1,719 17s. 1d. by payments made to the plaintiffs, Henry Samuel Priestley and Christopher Fearne Priestley, by the plaintiff, William Thomas Trench, out of the personal estate of Richard.

The plaintiffs, Henry Samuel Priestley and Christopher Fearne Priestley, by this action claimed that the residue of the said debt should be raised and paid out of such parts of the hereditaments comprised in the deed of family arrangement as were conveyed to the defendants by the indenture of conveyance of the 12th of November, 1889; and the plaintiff, William Thomas Trench, claimed that the whole of such debt of £2,302 3s. 2d. was expressly charged upon such hereditaments in exoneration of the real and personal estate of Richard, and was payable to him as legal personal representative of Richard for the purpose of paying the whole of the said debt.

Renshaw, Q.C., and F. T. Procter, for the plaintiffs.—This case is quite distinguishable from that class of cases the principle of which is to be found in Garrard v. Lord Lauderdale, 2 Russ. & M. 451. The facts of this case are similar to those in Synnot v Simpson, 5 H. L. C. 121, and the case falls rather within the principles laid down in Synnot v. Simpson, and acted upon in the subsequent cases of In re Fitzgerald's Settlement, 36 W. R. 385, 37 Ch. D. 18; Godfrey v. Poole, 13 App. Cas. 502; 36 W. R. Dig. 65, and Frewen v. Law Life Assurance Society, 44 W. R. 682, [1896] 2 Ch. 511, than within the principle of Garrard v. Lord Lauderdale.

Warrington, Q.C., and Robertson-Macdonald, for the defendant trustees.—This was an arrangement for the resettlement of the family estates by Richard and Francis. It was an arrangement for the benefit of Richard, and as the trust was not acted on nor communicated to the creditors, a binding trust in their favour was not created (Garrard v. Lord Lauderdale). The remaindermen take by virtue of the settlement and not by the bounty of Richard. It was in the power of Francis to prevent the sale during his life. The creditors were not specified in a schedule to the deed. In all these respects this case differs from that of Synnot v. Simpson. Richard and Francis could have revoked the deed of family arrangement.

W. B. Heath, for infant defendant, adopted a similar argument.

Procter in reply.

KEKEWICH, J.—The question which I have to decide may be stated thus: Is this case within the principle of Garrard v. Lord Lauderdale or of Synnot v. Simpson? I refer to Garrard v. Lord Lauderdale, though it by no means stands alone, and it was not the first case which affirmed the principle which was laid down by Lord Eldon in Walwyn v. Coutts, 3 Sim. 14, and again in Acton v. Woodgate, 2 My. & K. 492.

Even if Synnot v. Simpson stood alone it might be treated as constituting a class by itself illustrating Garrard v. Lord Lauderdale, as it shows what are the limits of that principle and the cases to which it does not extend. I have to consider those principles; what are they? I am not dealing with the question whether by specifying the creditors or communicating to them the trusts declared in their favour, a binding trust is created or not.

The broad principles are found in Garrard v. Lord Lauderdale, and they are to be found in other cases—for instance, in Walwyn v. Coutts and in Synnot v. Simpson. Without pretending to enunciate these principles so well as they are there laid down, I will, nevertheless, state them in my own way: A debtor minded to provide for his creditors, and with that intent vesting property in another for payment of those debts does not thereby constitute an irrevocable trust in favour of his creditors during his life; the trustee is only the debtor's agent and the creditors are not in consequence cestuis que trustent; in such a case the arrangement is merely for the benefit of the debtor and is revocable by him at will. Where, however, the trust for creditors is followed by a further settlement for the benefit of the settlor or on objects of the settlor's bounty, then at any rate after the death of the settlor there is a binding trust in favour of the creditors. It was so decided by the House of Lords in Synnot v. Simpson and in Montefiore v. Browne, 7 H. L. Cas. 241. In giving judgment in the latter case Lord Cranworth says on p. 266: "My lords, this case can hardly be distinguished in principle or, indeed, in the very facts upon which the principle rests from that of Synnot v. Simpson in this House. There, as here, a conveyance was made of estates creating, in terms at least, a trust for creditors who were not in that case parties to the deed, and subject to this trust there was a settlement for the mutual benefit of the father and the son. And what your lordships then held was this, that at all events after the death of one of the parties to that arrangement that trust became an absolute trust, which the creditor, in whose favour it was made, might insist upon being enforced." This present case differs from Synnot v. Simpson in some respects, but even so, does it fall within the principle of that case? In Synnot v. Simpson there was a settlement by the father and the son, and that is so here. It seems to me that it cannot be of importance whether the settlement was made between one or more settlors or for their mutual interest or not. On the question whether they were tenants in common with a power of appointment over this property, or successive owners, I think that the two were owners and could dispose of it as they chose. As regards the creditors it makes no difference whether there was a bargain or not, for in Synnot v. Simpson, on p. 141, Lord Cranworth says: "I doubt whether the doctrine acted on in Garrard v. Lord Lauderdale and in the other authorities which I have adverted to applies to a case where the trust is to come into operation only on the death of its author, and where, subject to the trust for payment of debts, the lands charged are conveyed by way of bounty to a third person. I think it at all events open to argument that in such a case the settlor must primâ facie be understood to be dealing with his property as if he was disposing of it by will, and therefore as contemplating bounty throughout; or if it be contract, so far as the party taking the estate is concerned, I think it must still be construed as bounty in favour of the plaintiffs named as incumbrancers." Therefore I think it makes no difference whether the bargain was between two or one. The creditors are equally strangers in either case.

Having now shown the difference between the principles of Garrard v. Lord Lauderdale and Synnot v. Simpson, I will apply that to the facts before me. Here there were two gentlemen who had a power of appointment over an estate by virtue of a disentailing assurance; they were father and son, Richard Lloyd-Edwards and Francis William Lloyd-Edwards. The trust is to sell either immediately or after the death of Richard, or with his consent during his lifetime, and out of the proceeds to pay his debts. These debts are not only charged (if there is a charge at all) on the proceeds of sale, but there is an express provision for their payment out of the rents and profits until sale, so that there is a charge upon the corpus as much as there is upon the proceeds of sale. Subject thereto there is another settlement on Francis, with remainders over, under which the infant defendant now claims. Therefore, I think this case comes within the principle of Synnot v. Simpson, subject, however, to the two following observations—namely, that the deed of family arrangement might have been put an end to by the father and son, and that the creditors here described were not necessarily creditors to be ascertained at the death of Richard Lloyd-Edwards, but creditors who were such during his life, or became such subsequently. In this latter respect there is a distinction between this case and In re Fitzgerald's Settlement, for in that case the creditors were to be ascertained after the death of the settlor; but this is a distinction which I do not think is material in the present case. Here you have a trust for creditors before the settlor's decease.

But the other point seems to me to deserve more consideration. The two settlors were Richard and Francis William, and it is quite possible that they may have had power to have cancelled the provision for payment of debts, and so oust and defeat the creditors, and to have assured the estate to the uses coming in subsequent to the provision for creditors. That point I must leave open, because it does not arise, owing to the fact that Richard died before any attempt was made to satisfy the creditors, and Francis William took the estate. In this way I think that, according to Synnot v. Simpson, the defendants and Francis William took the estate subject to the rights of the creditors, unless it can be said that the provision for creditors has been revoked by the later deed of 1889. On his father's death Francis William became tenant of the estate and executor of his father, and so it is said that, acting in both characters, he could have done what both Richard and Francis could have done in their joint lives. I do not think so. They could have concurred in revoking the provision during their joint lives; but such power of revocation did not become vested in the executor of one of the parties. As soon as Richard died, Francis's estate became an estate in possession, but he could not exercise as executor the power vested in Richard while alive. Therefore, I do not think the arguments of the defendants can be upheld, and I must hold the present case to be within the principle of Synnot v. Simpson, and I think the creditors must be paid. I will not now decide the question of the exoneration of Richard's real and personal estate, that matter will have to be determined in the administration actions.

Settlement—Covenant to settle after-acquired property—Investments of income and of accumulations of income of such investments.

By a covenant in a marriage settlement it was agreed and declared that if during the coverture the intended wife or the intended husband in her right should become entitled to property above a certain value, then and in every such case the intended husband and wife should assure the property to or otherwise cause the same to be vested in the trustees upon the trusts of the settlement. The trustees claimed certain investments of more than the specified value admittedly purchased by the wife out of income derived by her under the settlement.

Held, on the construction of the above covenant, that it was not intended to bind the married woman's income arising from the settled property, and that the investments ought to be regarded as accumulated income, and therefore were not bound by the covenant.

Lewis v. Madocks, 8 Ves. 150, 17 Ves. 48, distinguished.

Special case.

By an indenture of marriage settlement dated the 20th of September, 1872, and made between J. Finlay of the first part, the defendant C. Darling (then C. Finlay, spinster), who shortly afterwards became the wife of J. Darling, of the second part, J. Darling of the third part, and trustees of the fourth part, personal property was settled or covenanted to be settled upon the usual trusts for the wife, husband, and issue of the marriage, the first life interest being to the wife for her separate use. And in the same indenture was contained a covenant for the settlement of the said defendant's after-acquired property in the following terms: "And it is hereby agreed and declared that if during the said intended coverture the said C. Finlay or the said J. Darling in her right shall become seized, possessed of, or entitled to any real or personal property of the value of £200 or upwards for any estate or interest whatsoever (except jewels, trinkets, ornaments, plate, pictures, prints, and books, and other articles of the like nature, as to which it is hereby declared that the same shall belong to the said C. Finlay for her separate use), then and in every such case the said J. Darling and C. Finlay, and all other necessary parties shall, as soon as circumstances will admit, and to the satisfaction of the settlement trustees or trustee for the time being, convey, assign, and assure the said real and personal property to, or otherwise cause the same to be vested in the settlement trustees or trustee upon trust," the trusts being in effect for sale and conversion of the said property, with the usual exception from the covenant, of annuities for life or other life interests of the said defendant.

The plaintiffs were the present trustees of the settlement.

There were now living (besides the defendant) her husband and seven children of the said marriage.

The defendant from time to time invested in her own name income derived by her under the settlement and accumulations of the income derived by her from such investments, and there were standing in her name divers stocks, shares, and securities representing such investments largely exceeding £200 in value.

H. Terrell, for the plaintiffs, relied on In re Bendy, Wallis v. Bendy, 43 W. R. 345, [1895] 1 Ch. 109, and Lewis v. Madocks, 8 Ves. 150, 17 Ves. 48.

J. Dixon, for the defendant.

ROMER, J.—The question is whether these investments are subject to the covenant for the settlement of after-acquired property contained in the settlement?

It is reasonably clear on the words of the covenant that it was not intended to bind the income of the married woman from the settled property, or that the covenant should apply to capital coming to her after the date of the settlement to an amount not exceeding £200.

If the income would not be bound, it does not seem right on principle to hold that, because the married woman accumulates it and does not spend it, she thereby makes that bound which was not bound before. Why should the accumulations pass from her? If accumulations of income in her hands or in the hands of her bankers are not bound, why should they become bound when invested? I fail to see the reason.

That being my view—viz., that the covenant and principle clearly point to the property not being bound, am I obliged by the authorities to give a decision in the contrary sense?

There are two cases in point. The first is Lewis v. Madocks. That was a decision on a covenant by a man on marriage to settle all the personal estate of which he should at any time be possessed. Such a covenant is of an entirely different character from the covenant here, and different considerations might well apply in construing it. Lord Eldon appears to have thought in that case that income would not be bound by the covenant as income, but that it might be so dealt with as to become capital, in which case, having acquired the character of capital, it would be bound as capital: see 17 Ves. at pp. 55, 56. But I think that his observations must be limited to the circumstances of the case before him. I doubt if Lord Eldon meant more than this, that capital so held as to indicate an intention that it should be bound would be bound. Even if Lord Eldon's observations bound me at all in a case like this, I should require evidence of the circumstances here in order to see if his observations applied to them. All I know is that the married woman invested the income and did not spend it, and I decline on that alone to regard it as ceasing to be her income, or to hold, as I must on the contrary view, that she parted with her right to deal with the moneys as accumulated income.

With regard to Kekewich, J.'s, decision in In re Bendy, Wallis v. Bendy, I should ordinarily follow the decision of a judge of co-ordinate jurisdiction. But, if the report in the Law Reports is complete and correct, with deference to Kekewich, J., I cannot follow his decision in that case. But I think that there must have been other circumstances there, material to the decision which are not in the report. However that may be, having a clear opinion on the question of principle and on the covenant in this case, I ought to give effect to my view, and I decide accordingly that the investments of income are not bound by the covenant.

Q. B. Div.
Vaughan Williams and Kennedy, JJ. — April 12.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. BROWN. (a.)

Inland revenue—Succession duty—Partnership deed—Contract for valuable consideration in money or money's worth—Succession Duty Act, 1851 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), s. 2.

A father admitted his son into partnership for a term of five years. The assets of the business were then valued at about £62,000, of which two-thirds was to be deemed the father's share, and one-third the son's; and one condition of the partnership was that in the event of the father dying within five years the son was to take the whole of the business and pay to the father's executors or administrators £10,000. By a contemporaneous deed the son agreed to pay to the father and his executors a rent-charge of £139 per annum in respect of the freehold property of the partnership.

The son brought no capital into the business, and the father died before the term of the partnership had expired.

The Inland Revenue Commissioners claimed succession duty from the son in respect of the then estimated value of the business, less the £10,000 to be paid to the father's representatives, and less the son's one-third share of the business, on the ground that although in form the partnership arrangement was a sale of part of the business to the son, it was substantially a settlement by the father under which at his death the son benefited, the property being admitted worth more than £10,000 at that date.

Held, that, taking all the circumstances in consideration, the £10,000 to be paid by the son was a fair commercial value to place upon the business for the purposes of the partnership. The transaction could not be regarded, therefore, as in substance a "settlement," and the son was not liable to pay succession duty on acquiring the whole of the business on the death of his father.

Information by the Attorney-General.

The following were the facts of the case as stated in the information:

The defendant, Thomas Brown, had for many years managed the cotton spinning business of his father, George Brown. For certain reasons the father considered it desirable that the son should become a partner with him in the business; and, on the 31st of March, 1881, they entered into a contract of partnership for a term of five years. At that time the business was valued by them at £62,445. The son, on being made a partner, brought no capital into the business. Of the then estimated value of the business it was arranged that the sum of £41,630 should be considered as having been brought into the partnership by George Brown, and the remaining £20,815 by the defendant Thomas Brown.

The material terms of the deed, in the events which happened, were contained in paragraph 29, which ran thus: "If the said George Brown shall die during the partnership, the said Thomas Brown shall be absolutely entitled, for his own use and benefit, to the whole or entirety of the capital of the partnership. . . . And the said Thomas Brown shall, within six calendar months next after such death, duly execute and deliver unto the executors or administrators of the said George Brown a bond . . . for the payment to them of the principal sum of £10,000, with interest after the rate of 4 per cent. per annum. . . . But if the said Thomas Brown shall die during the partnership, the said George Brown shall be absolutely entitled, for his own use and benefit, to the whole of the capital of the partnership, and the said George Brown shall, within six calendar months next after such death, duly execute and deliver unto the executors or administrators of the said Thomas Brown a bond . . . for the payment to them of the principal sum of £15,000."

There was also another contract of even date, drawn up and executed in relation to the freehold property of the firm, in which it was provided that £139 per annum was to be paid by the son to the father.

The contract of partnership was carried into effect, and the two carried on business together until October, 1884, when George Brown died.

According to the partnership books, the assets of the business at the death of George Brown were of the value of £67,810, of which sum £45,894 was the share of George Brown in the same, and the whole of that amount passed on his death (less the sum of £10,000) to the defendant Thomas Brown absolutely.

The commissioners, on these facts, considered that the provisions of clause 29 did not constitute a "sale and purchase," but were in effect a family arrangement by which the defendant, on his father's death, succeeded to the whole of the deceased partner's interests in the business (less the sum of £10,000) in the same way as if the father had left them to his son by will.

A claim for succession duty was then put in by the Crown in respect of the capital of the partnership passing to the defendant, less his original share therein and the sum of £10,000 payable to the estate of the deceased.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G. (with him Vaughan Hawkins), for the Crown.—The question is whether the transaction as disclosed by the partnership deed itself is in fact a sale or a settlement by which the father desired to benefit his son. If, as the Crown contends, it was the latter, then to the amount which the son has benefited therefrom, succession duty is payable: Crossman v. The Queen, 35 W. R. 303, 18 Q. B. D. 256; Fryer v. Morland, 25 W. R. 21, 3 Ch. D. 675; Floyer v. Banks, 12 W. R. 28, 3 De G. J. & S. 306; The Attorney-General v. Baron Wolverton, ante, p. 236, [1896] 2 Q. B. 389, [1897] 1

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Q. B. 231. The fact that there may have been some consideration moving from the son to the father is not of itself evidence that the transaction is a "contract for valuable consideration in money or money's worth" of such a kind as would exempt the son from the payment of succession duty: Lord Advocate v. Sidgwick, 14 Scot. L. R. 543. See report also in Hanson's Death Duties, last ed., p. 548.

Haldane, Q.C. (with him Danckwerts), for the defendant.—The arrangement does not come within section 2, and if it does it is exempted from succession duty by the proviso in section 17 of the Act of 1851. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—If the transaction falls within section 2, then section 17 does not help you. If it does not fall within section 2 you do not require section 17 at all.] Under the deed of even date with the partnership deed, the freehold property of the business was sold to the partnership, which was to pay to the father and his executors a rent-charge of £139 a year. If the father survived the son that was practically inoperative, but if the son survived the father it created a heavy burden on the business, and the undertaking of that liability constituted a valuable consideration, and probably accounted for the fact that the son was only to pay £10,000 for the share of his father in the event of the latter dying during the partnership. If both partners survived the period of five years fixed for the continuance of the partnership under the deed, the business was then to be divided equally.

Oldfield v. Preston, 10 W. R. 257, 3 De J. F. & J. 398, and Attorney-General v. Dowling, 28 W. R. 673, (1880) 5 Ex. D. 139, were referred to.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—Shortly the question we have here to decide is whether the right which the defendant, as the surviving partner, has to the money, property, stock-in-trade, and assets of the business is a right which has accrued to him by way of succession from his father or whether it is a right which accrues to him by reason of his having purchased this interest for some money consideration. It is admitted that if it is the former—that is, if the transaction is in substance a gratuity by the father to the son—then the contention of the Crown is right. If, on the other hand, the son has bought this interest, paying a full and fair commercial value for it, then there is no succession within the meaning of section 2 of the statute of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51. That section defines a "succession" as follows: "Every past or future disposition of property by reason whereof any person has or shall become beneficially entitled to any property or the income thereof upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, shall be deemed to have conferred or to confer on the person entitled by reason of any such disposition or devolution a succession." Now, I agree with the contention of the Solicitor-General that one must look at the substance of the transaction, and it is not because a deed on the face of it appears to be treating of a commercial transaction, or that it contains stipulations for a gratuity or stipulations that upon the father's death the son shall be entitled to a certain property, that, therefore, the possibility of a "succession" is excluded. One must not only look at the bargain as a whole, but one must also look at each part of it and see and inquire as to each portion, if it is a commercial bargain or whether it is merely a stipulation outside such a bargain altogether. I have come to the conclusion that this particular clause 29, like the rest of the deed, is part and parcel of an honest commercial transaction. I should have assumed that for myself looking at the partnership deed as such, with the provision of the sort there is here, setting out what is to take place in the case of the death of the father and of the son respectively, during the continuance of the partnership, unless there was something in the deed to negative the presumption that it was to be a purely commercial transaction between the parties. What do we find? In clause 29 there is a proviso which is certainly a very remarkable one, and which was the foundation of the Solicitor-General's contention for the Crown that this was never intended to be by the parties themselves a commerical bargain at all. It is this—that we now know that whereas the father took two-thirds of the business and the son only one-third, we find that in the case of the death of the father—that is, in the event of his two-thirds accruing to the son by reason of the provisions of the partnership deed—the son is only to pay to the representatives of the father the sum of £10,000; whereas, in the event of the son dying during the lifetime of the father, then the father is to pay £15,000 for the one-third of the son. That is a larger sum than that payable by the son. If that were all, it would make me conclude that the arrangement under which the father's two-thirds so passing to the son was in the nature of a gratuity to the son to the extent of the excess of the value of this two-thirds over and above the £10,000 which was payable by the son, and was in substance a settlement of that amount on the son, and as such, duty would be payable as on succession. Mr. Haldane pointed out, however, that these figures were fixed in the deed in a purely commercial spirit, and that the son in certain events might have found he had made a very bad bargain and yet would be compelled to stand by it. He also drew our attention to the terms of the deed of even date, under which there are provisions practically inoperative in the event of the father surviving the son, but which would be a very serious incumbrance on the estate if the son survived. Moreover, whichever of the two survived, the obligation to take the business, even if it were at that time being carried on at a loss, was certain and absolute. It was an unconditional obligation to take the business with all its liabilities. From the returns of the profits of the last few years it is obvious that this was a business of a speculative character. There was also a binding undertaking that the surviving partner should indemnify the estate of the deceased partner in respect of the debts and liabilities of the business. Taking all these circumstances into consideration, which have only come to light during the argument, I think the partners were right in fixing the amount to be paid at a less sum than the then estimated value of the property which at first sight seemed to be its fair commercial value. I prefer entirely to discard the estimated value of £62,000 as the true figure at which the property ought then to have been returned at. I consider, for the reasons above stated, that very possibly, in the case of the father succeeding to the son, the one-third interest of the son would have been worth to him £15,000. In the event of the son surviving the father then that the father's two-thirds would be worth to the son £10,000. The fact, as I have before said, that these figures were fixed and payable under any circumstances gave rise, primâ facie, to the contention of the Crown that on the transfer of the father's interest to the son, the amount so passing to the son under clause 29 was liable to succession duty. For the reasons I have mentioned, I have satisfied myself that these figures may be regarded as having been properly arrived at as the real commercial value of the partners' respective shares in the business. It is so stated in answers to the information and in the affidavits of the defendant, and although the defendant's witnesses were present and ready to be examined on this point they were not cross-examined by the Crown. I think, therefore, the Crown has failed to establish its contention that this was not a commercial transaction.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree. The transaction, in my opinion, was nothing more than a genuine commercial bargain, and was not in substance, any more than in form, a settlement of so much made by the father on his son. For the Crown it was admitted that if it was the former no duty would be payable, nor would the question be raised that the valuation placed on the property was not a fair and reasonable one.

THE MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

Inland revenue—Stamp duty—Annuity secured by bond —"Conveyance on sale"—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), ss. 54, 60, 87 (2), schedule 1—Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act, 1858.

A dock company had statutory powers to borrow money for certain purposes, and "all money so borrowed by the board of directors was to be secured either by bonds or by annuities." The company having by deed granted a large number of annuities, the question was raised by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue at what rate the instruments by which they were secured to the annuitants should be charged with stamp duty under section 87 (2) of the Stamp Act, 1891, the annuity deeds having been presented to the Commissioners stamped as securities on an ad valorem duty of 2*s.* 6*d. per cent. under the head "Mortgage, Bond, Debenture Covenant, &c."*

Held, that, as the annuities were payable for an indefinite period, and could only be redeemed or extinguished by the board purchasing them at the then market price, the deed securing such an annuity was in the nature of a "conveyance on sale" and not a bond to secure the repayment of an advance or loan to the company, and was therefore chargeable at the rate of 10*s. per cent. as a contract of sale and purchase.*

Case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

The appellants the Mersey Docks Co. had power given them by the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act, 1858, to borrow money. This the company was empowered to do in one of two ways—either as loans repayable with interest within a fixed period, or by the granting of annuities.

The question for the decision of the court was whether the bonds given by the company to secure these annuities should under section 87 (2) of the Stamp Act, 1891, be stamped as contracts of sale and purchase at 10s. per cent. or as securities for sums advanced at 2s. 6d. per cent.

The Commissioners were of opinion that the contract between the appellants and the annuitants was one of sale and purchase, and that the annuity was not granted by way of repayment of any loan intended to be so repaid as to render the instrument chargeable with the lesser stamp duty under the above-mentioned section of the Stamp Act, 1891, and that, therefore, the instrument was chargeable with duty at the rate of 10s. per cent. as "a conveyance or transfer on sale."

The material facts stated in the case were shortly these: The deed out of which the question arose contained this clause: "This indenture witnesseth that on consideration of £300 the board do hereby . . . covenant and grant with and to the annuitants that the board and their successors will pay to the annuitants an annuity or yearly sum of £8 5s. . . . and the annuitants do hereby agree to accept the said annuity or yearly payment in full satisfaction and discharge of the said sum of £300 advanced and lent as aforesaid, provided always that the said annuity shall in all respects be subject to the provisions of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act, 1858, in relation to Mersey Dock annuities."

The annuity was payable for an indefinite period—i.e., until purchase or extinguishment or redemption under the Acts.

By section 308 of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act, 1858, if at any time there should not be any bonds or other securities granted by the board, or for the payment whereof they might be liable, and if there should not be an annuitant willing to sell to the board the amount of the annuity so held by him, it should in that case—but in such case only—be lawful for the board to redeem so much of the Mersey Dock annuities as the amount of the surplus [of the specially set apart fund] thereinbefore directed to be so applied might permit at a rate equal to the average market price of such annuities during the six months immediately preceding.

Section 309 directed that the order in which the board shall be entitled to redeem such annuities should from time to time be decided by a ballot.

The following sections of the Stamp Act, 1891, are material:—

Section 54.—"For the purposes of this Act the expression 'conveyance on sale' shall include every instrument . . . whereby any property, or any estate or interest in any property, upon the sale thereof, is transferred to or vested in a purchaser."

Section 60.—"Where, upon the sale of an annuity or other right not before in existence, such annuity or other right is not created by actual grant or conveyance, but is only secured by bond, . . . the bond or other instrument is to be charged with the same duty as an actual grant or conveyance, and is for the purposes of this Act to be deemed an instrument of conveyance on sale."

Section 87.—"(2) A security for the payment of any rent-charge, annuity, or periodical payments by way of repayment or satisfaction or discharge of any loan, advance, or payment intended to be so repaid, satisfied, or discharged, is to be charged with the same duty as a similar security for the payment of money so lent.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. (Carver with him), for the Mersey Docks Co.—The instrument was not a conveyance or transfer on sale of any property within the meaning of schedule 1 of the Stamp Act, 1891, for the £300 was paid to the appellants as a loan or advance, and received by them under their borrowing powers, to be repaid, satisfied, and discharged by the annuity granted. It was therefore chargeable under section 87 (2) of the Stamp Act, 1891, with the lower duty as a covenant for the payment of the loan of £300.

Sir R. Webster, A.G. (Danckwerts and Peacock with him), for the Crown.—The transaction was that of the sale of an annuity, the instrument was a conveyance on sale, and ought to be stamped at the higher rate.

WILLS, J.—I admit that this case is not free from difficulty, but I feel no hesitation in giving judgment for the Crown. It seems to me that we must look in the first place at the Mersey Dock Acts and see, if we can, what the true nature of the transaction is by which these annuities are created. The foundation of the appellants' argument is that by clause 286 of the company's private Act of 1858, all money borrowed by the board shall be secured either by bonds under their common seal, or by annuities, and, therefore, that this is in fact money borrowed. That is accurate to a certain extent, but when one comes to look into the various sections of the Act, it is clear that the annuities are treated as annuities granted for money paid. It is unnecessary to go into the different sections at length, but there are some in which these annuities are contrasted (section 290 for example) with the case of money borrowed on bonds. Further on we find that the deed is described as a deed of grant. Moreover, the statutory form of the model certificate speaks of the purchaser as the "proprietor" of the annuity. The particular language of the particular instrument in this case cannot alter the power given to it by the Act of Parliament.

We have been frankly told that the certificate was not drawn up in the exact form given by the statute and was expressly framed to meet the point now at issue and to make the transaction, if it could be made so, one of mortgage and not sale. [His lordship having read section 54 of the Stamp Act, 1891, continued:] The deed in this case vests in the person who made the payment the property in the annuity. It makes him the proprietor, and therefore there must have been within the meaning of this 54th section "a conveyance on sale," and the grantee becomes the purchaser. He is also, I think, the purchaser within the words of section 60. If there is any real inconsistency between the language used in those two sections and that of section 87 it must be dealt with, but it is not for the court to raise an inconsistency if none exist. In my opinion section 87 really relates to terminable annuities, which, in the ordinary sense of that expression, this kind of annuity we are now considering is not. This loan was really never meant to be repaid. It was in very much the same position as consols. Except by redeeming the loan it could never be paid off by the Dock Co., no matter how long the company continued to pay the annuity. It is therefore wrong to say that the £8 5s. a year paid the annuitant by the company was paid in "satisfaction and discharge of the loan." For these reasons I think the contention of the Crown ought to be upheld and duty paid on the higher scale.

BLOOMENTHAL v. FORD. (a.)

Company — Winding up — Shares — Contributory — Estoppel—Certificate—Fully paid-up shares.

A company borrowed money from the appellant on the security of certain fully paid-up shares, and delivered to him certificates under their common seal to the effect that on each of these shares the full amount had been paid, and this was believed to be so by the appellant. As a matter of fact these shares were not paid up at all, neither had any contract been registered under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867.

Held, that the company were estopped from alleging that the shares were not fully paid up, although upon inquiry and investigation the appellant would have discovered otherwise; and, consequently, that he was not liable to be put on the list of contributories.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 44 W. R. 577, [1896] 2 Ch. 525, reversed.

This was an appeal by F. Bloomenthal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.), reported under the name In re Monnier (Veuve) et ses Fils (Limited), Ex parte Bloomenthal, 44 W. R. 577, [1896] 2 Ch. 525, which affirmed an order of Vaughan Williams, J.

The facts are given in the report below, and are shortly these.

Bloomenthal lent money to the Company Monnier (Veuve & Fils) and received as security for his loan 16,000 shares; he was registered as holder and received certificates that these shares were fully paid up. No cash had ever been paid for the shares, nor had any contract been registered under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. The company went into liquidation, and Bloomenthal took proceedings to have his name removed from the register. The circumstances attending the loan are discussed at length in the judgments.

The Court of Appeal came to the conclusion that the appellant must have known that nothing had been paid for the shares, and that he was liable to be put on the list of contributories for the full amount.

Bloomenthal appealed.

Lord HALSBURY, C.—In this case I should have felt very great regret indeed if I had been compelled to affirm the judgments which have been appealed against. I think that I can hardly imagine a greater scandal to the administration of justice than would be involved in affirming that a person could be treated with such grievous injustice as would have been inflicted upon the appellant here if those judgments had been affirmed. With the greatest possible respect to all the learned judges who have taken part in this discussion, it appears to me that they have all been affected by the circumstances of the case, which they describe as circumstances of great hardship. For my own part I am unable quite to follow that view. It seems to me that it is a somewhat illogical view. If the appellant here was, as some of their lordships seem to think, put upon an inquiry, or, as some others of them seem to think, actually knew the true condition of things, he is not an object of sympathy at all; he has simply entered into an adventure in which he has been unfortunate, and he must take the consequences of his own rashness. I should sympathise with him very much if I thought this judgment could be affirmed, because I should regard him as being a person who had been "entrapped," which I think is the phrase which is used in one of the judgments, or had "fallen into a pitfall," which is the phrase used in another judgment, by those persons who have got his money by a misrepresentation (whether a wilful misrepresentation or not it is immaterial to inquire), and they having got his money, he is called upon not only to lose the money, but to incur an enormous liability which to most persons (I am sure I do not know whether to him or not) would be absolute ruin. The narrative is a very short one. A company, of which he is the stationer, is in want of money, and they apply to him to lend the money, and they promise to give him, as security for the money he lends, "fully paid-up shares." I shall say a word in a minute as to what that phrase means. That is what they promise to give him, and relying upon that promise he lends them £1,000. Afterwards the same process is renewed (I do not think anything really turns upon any difference in the terms), and he lends £600 more. Then the company is wound-up, and he finds himself made responsible for £16,000. I cannot imagine a more pitiable narrative, if it were possible in point of law to establish the claim against him to that extent. I am of opinion that no such claim can be established against him; because it appears to me that the company who obtained his money upon the distinct representation that what they were about to give him were "fully paid-up shares," obtained it by a misrepresentation of a fact which he had a right to believe and act upon, and in my view did believe and did act upon, and he parted with his money upon the belief that he had got that security. It appears to me that it is hopeless to contend that after a representation made by the company for the purpose of inducing a man to act upon it by parting with his money, it is competent for them to turn round and say, "You should have inquired, you should have observed certain circumstances, and if you had done that, you would have been better advised than to advance the money, because you would have known that fully paid-up shares did not mean what the words themselves signify, but meant that no further liability should be insisted upon in respect of them." I suppose if one is to expand the meaning of these words in the sense which the respondent now insists upon, one must say that that is what they substantially mean—namely, that there was to be no liability upon the shares, and that the respondent would not be called upon to supply anything further to the funds of the company upon them.

Now, the ground upon which that is suggested appears to be partly a question of law, and partly a question of fact. As to the question of law, I confess for myself I entertain a doubt whether it is ever true, in a case where one person has been induced to act by the misrepresentation of another, that you can go beyond the fact whether it is so or not. In arriving at a conclusion upon this question of fact, like every other question of fact, all the circumstances must be considered. A statement may be made so preposterous in its nature that nobody could believe that anyone was misled, and in considering these questions, as in Freeman v. Cooke, 2 Ex. 654, and other cases which might be cited on the subject, the learned judges discussing questions of fact together with questions of law, not unnaturally sometimes point to this or that circumstance as being a circumstance from which people would naturally infer that a man did not believe what he professed to believe; but when once the conclusion is arrived at that the belief was induced, and intentionally induced, by a misstatement of fact intended to operate upon the mind of another, upon which the man has acted, then I do not think any case can be found in the books in which it has been suggested that the legal consequence does not follow—namely, that there is estoppel, and that it is not open to the person who has made the representation to say, "I told you so and so, but you ought not to have believed me—you were too great a fool—I had a right to mislead you because you were too great a fool." I do not believe that any such case can be brought forward, or that there is any authority for such a proposition.

Now, dealing with it as a question of fact, and there being no other question of law to be disposed of, I come to an exactly opposite conclusion from that which the learned judges in the court below have arrived at. The circumstances are simple; they speak for themselves—res ipsa loquitur. Here is a company, which is not too flush of money, applying to their stationer and printer for a loan of money. Can anybody believe that if the appellant had known the true state of the facts—namely, that instead of getting a security he was getting a liability to the extent of £16,000, he would have acted as he did? Then, why am I to go out of the natural and ordinary meaning of those phrases which were used between the parties? He agrees to give a loan if he gets "fully paid-up shares." Now, what is the meaning of "fully paid-up shares"? I admit, though I am not at all certain that the admission does not go a good deal beyond what has been proved as a fact, that occasionally the phrase "fully paid-up shares" may be used somewhat colloquially and loosely as meaning shares upon which no further liability can be enforced by the company. I will take that to be so for the sake of argument. But what then? Why am I to cut down and override the natural meaning of the words by suggesting that there were fresh facts in this case which would have led this gentleman to take them in the narrower sense which I have indicated? When I look at what was the original contract between the parties, what they were doing, and what they were discussing, and when I look at the language used, it seems to me that it certainly lies upon the persons insisting upon giving an unnatural meaning to the words "fully paid-up shares" to prove that they can bear no other meaning. I confess that for myself I am unable to see one single particle of evidence which suggests such an interpretation of the words. The words used in the original contract are, as I have said, "fully paid-up shares." The language of the certificate is this, that Mr. Frederick Bloomenthal "is the registered proprietor," and so on, of such and such shares, "and that on each of such shares the full amount has been paid." Upon what possible ground can they suggest "You ought not to have believed that statement, you ought to have believed that it was only an arrangement that the company were issuing their own shares"?

The argument in the courts below appears to have turned upon what, I venture to suggest, is a mistake. It was said, "That could not be true"; but it could be true. It cannot be denied that there are circumstances under which shares, although in the possession and under the dominion and control of the company itself, are fully paid up either by means of actual money or by means of such matters registered under the Companies Acts, as would have made them fully paid-up shares. And I am asked to assume that because the appellant was the stationer of the company (for that appears to be the argument on this part of the case) he must have known that these were not fully paid-up shares in that sense, and that they could not be. There are one or two hypotheses on which they could be. One is the suggestion of vendor's shares. Another is that a shareholder who had taken shares in the company might be desirous of helping the company to borrow money upon the shares he had taken. One need not go into any other hypothesis, because the logical force of the argument must go to this extent, that they could not be fully paid up; if they could be, it fails. So far, therefore, as the proposition which was insisted upon in the Court of Appeal is concerned, my answer is, I am bound to take the language of the parties unless the facts show that it was not used in its proper and natural sense, in the sense it would bear to any ordinary mind.

Now, that being the state of facts, what is the evidence of the gentleman himself, as to whom it may be truly said that all the judges—perhaps Vaughan Williams, J., may be an exception, but certainly all the judges in the Court of Appeal—seemed to assume that he was not juggling with the facts, but that he was intending to tell the truth? His statement is unequivocal—he thought that they were fully paid-up shares. I know the sort of gloss that has been put upon that statement. It is said that he must have understood something different from what the words signify. I have already dealt with the logical argument upon that subject, but speaking of it as a popular phrase, I do not know why people should not mean what they say when they speak of fully paid-up shares. People who know anything about limited liability companies know that there is a certain liability upon their shares, and that from time to time the company calls up such and such a proportion of the money due upon those shares, and I should have thought that without being a lawyer or discussing questions which have been raised in the courts, a person would ordinarily understand that fully paid-up shares mean shares upon which the whole amount that could be called had been called up. That is the meaning of "fully paid-up shares," and in strictness it is the only meaning. Then, this case appears to have been started by the liquidator under the impression that the appellant had received express notice of the actual state of things, and I think that one of the learned judges says in terms, that it was not a question of constructive notice, but that he had received express notice. All I can say is, that the appellant himself absolutely denies it—and he is not cross-examined in any sense which, in my opinion, ought to shake his evidence—his bonâ fides has at least been affirmed by three judges. And then, when one looks at the other side, how is he contradicted? I think that there is no real contradiction at all. The first witness who was called says that he assumed that he knew what was meant, but that he will not undertake to say that he ever said a word about it. With that exception the evidence of the appellant goes uncontradicted, that he did not know, and had no reason to think that the representation made to him was not perfectly true. If that is the state of the facts at which one arrives in considering the evidence in this case the legal conclusion cannot be doubted. There is a long series of cases, no one of which is important to quote, because the proposition of law has never been doubted, so far as I am aware, to prove that if a man is induced to act upon a statement, and acts upon it because he believes it, and that statement is untrue, it is not competent for the person who has made the representation to say afterwards: "I will show another state of facts than that which I represented, and you ought not to have believed what I said." I believe no such proposition can be affirmed upon any authority, and it would be a very lamentable thing indeed for the course of business—and indeed for the course of human life—if the law did not recognize the responsibility of persons who make statements and induce others to act upon them so that they should not afterwards be permitted to turn round and say that what they stated was untrue, having altered the position of those whom they deceived by the statements they made.

This being the state of facts established in this case, I move your lordships that the appeal be allowed, and that the respondent do pay to the appellant the costs both here and below.

Lord HERSCHELL.—I am of the same opinion. In differing, as I do with all respect, from the learned judges in the court below, I do not think I am differing from them upon any question of law. The doctrine of estoppel to which my noble and learned friend has referred appears to me entirely admitted by the learned judges in the Court of Appeal. The decision against the appellant has arisen from the conclusion that the doctrine of estoppel does not apply in the present case so as to preclude the company, or the liquidator representing the company, from contending that the liability upon these shares exists. Now, the transaction is not one of an application to a company by a member of the public for an allotment of shares and the acceptance of an allotment under the impression that it created no liability, when in truth according to law it did create a liability. The transaction was one of loan to the company, and for that loan the company were to give as security "fully paid-up shares." I do not think that it can be doubted that the company represented to the appellant that the shares which they were handing to him by means of the certificates in return for his loan, and which he was to receive as security, were fully paid-up shares. On the meaning of those words I shall have something to say in a moment. That he acted upon that representation there can equally be no doubt. He was not content to lend his money without security. The security, which he bargained for and was to receive, was the security of "fully paid-up shares." The money was lent; and under those circumstances if the representation in the sense in which it would be naturally understood and was understood by the appellant, was untrue, then there appears to me to be all the elements of an estoppel.

In more than one of the judgments in the court below it was said that the question was, whether the appellant was a bonâ fide purchaser or transferee of those shares for value without notice of the state of things which existed. I do not myself think that that is an element which it is necessary at all to consider. The doctrine of estoppel is a common law doctrine, and needs no assistance from the equitable doctrine of bonâ fide purchasers for value without notice. And more than that, I think there is a tendency perhaps to mislead — to draw the consideration away from the true questions at issue—when we begin to talk of "purchasers for value without notice." It is not to my mind a question of notice at all.

Now, the statement having been made that he was to receive "fully paid-up shares" in exchange for his money, he gets a certificate, on the face of which it is stated that on each of such shares the full amount has been paid. It was argued by counsel for the liquidator that the money was parted with by the appellant on the faith of the statement that the shares were fully paid up, and that he could not rely upon the form of words to be found in the certificate, which it is said is more explicit and unequivocal. I do not think that in any case such a contention could be maintained; because, although it is quite true that he parted with his money in exchange for this certificate and lent the money before he actually got the certificate, yet the loan in the first instance was only for a limited period. A bill was given which fell due in the month of August, and that bill was renewed, and he most assuredly acted upon representations which he had received prior to that time or the effect produced by them, by leaving his money, as he was not bound to do, for a considerable time after that, as a loan to the company. This bill was renewed in the month of November. I suppose it had been renewed at an earlier date for the first time; but at all events it is stated in the affidavit that both bills were renewed in the month of November. Therefore, I do not think there is anything in the point sought to be made that you are not entitled to look at the certificate as part of the inducement by the company to let them have or retain his money; at all events, the certificate can be looked at for the purpose of seeing what was the meaning, or what was regarded as the meaning of "fully paid-up shares," because the representation to him having been that the shares he was to get were fully paid up, the certificate distinctly and unequivocally represents that on each of them the full amount had been paid. Now, in point of fact they were not fully paid up, they were not paid up at all, and it is sought to make him liable for the whole amount. It is said that he is under this liability, and that the law of estoppel does not apply, because, if he had thought the matter out, if he had put two and two together, if he had reflected on the circumstances he would have seen, and must have seen that the shares were not fully paid up. I cannot myself think that where an unequivocal statement is made by one party to another of a particular fact, the party who made that statement can get rid of the estoppel which arises from another man's acting upon it by saying that if the person to whom he made the statement had reflected and thought all about it he would have come to see that it could not be true. Of course, if the person to whom the statement was made did not believe it, and did not act on the belief induced by it, no doubt there is no estoppel. But supposing he did believe it, and did act on the belief induced by it, then it seems to me you do not get rid of the estoppel by saying, "If you had thought more about it you would have seen it was not true." The very person who makes a statement of that sort has put the other party off making further inquiry. He has produced on his mind the impression that further inquiry would be unnecessary or useless. Therefore, I confess that I do not think it legitimate to speculate what is the conclusion at which a man would have arrived, if he had put together—pieced together—all the considerations that might have occurred to a reflective mind cogitating on the whole subject, and then to say that, because he would have come to the conclusion that the statement made to him could not have been true, he is not entitled to act upon it as if it had been true, when in point of fact he did not enter into those considerations, but did believe it and did act upon it. Now, on what grounds is it said that he could not have believed this, or ought not to have believed it? The case is put, as I understand it, in this way. It is said "fully paid-up shares" is a term frequently used when the shares have not been fully paid up, as meaning shares which are to be treated as being fully paid up, and on which there is to be no further liability. Now I very much doubt whether those words baldly used, without anything further from one party to another, would convey that meaning. No doubt under certain circumstances people may talk of shares on which nothing has been paid as "fully paid-up shares," because they are to be treated as such where there has been neither money nor money's worth given for them. I think that certainly would be a rare case, but whether people might so speak of it or not, that is not the actual ordinary meaning of "fully paid-up shares." It is not the primary idea that would be conveyed to anybody who was told he was to get fully paid-up shares.

But then it is said that in this case the appellant must have known that he was getting these shares from the company; that, if he got them from the company he was getting them as allottee from the company; that if he got them as allottee from the company he must have known that nobody could have paid the company, because they were then being for the first time allotted; and that as he had not paid upon them, nothing had been paid upon them; and under those circumstances he must have understood, if he had thought about it at all, that when they were spoken of as "fully paid-up" the expression was used in the sense to which I have just referred, and not as representing that they had really been paid up. It seems to me that the learned judges in the court below have overlooked the fact that a company might deal just as this company dealt with these shares, and in a manner consistent with every fact that exists in the present case, and that those shares might have been fully paid up. I will not go through all the cases that might be put—many cases might be put. For example, the case, which is a very common one, of shares which are allotted to the vendors or their nominees; very often the names of the nominees of some of these vendors' shares are not given for a considerable time afterwards. It is not an uncommon thing to see a provision that the vendors shall not put their shares upon the market for a certain time. There is nothing impossible in a vendor coming to the assistance of a company which is in necessity, and on whose prosperity so much for him depends, if he is the holder of a large number of shares, by allowing a certain number of his shares to be used for the purpose of raising a loan. Or again, persons who are allottees of the company of shares already issued, may find it to their interest to assist the company if it is in necessity by transferring their shares so as to enable the company to raise money upon them as security. Although they have executed a transfer it does not follow that the transferee under such circumstances as these would be asked to execute it. They might execute transfers and hand them to the company, and the company might issue certificates to the transferees for this purpose as collateral security; and it is quite conceivable that those who allowed such use to be made of their shares might even desire that their names should not appear in the transaction. I put those instances, but other instances might be put. It is said the appellant did not think of all this. I daresay he did not think of it, he did not think anything about it; it was enough for him to be told they were fully paid up and he believed it. I only put these cases for the purpose of showing that it is not correct to say that, knowing the fact as he did, that these shares had come from the company, he must, if he had thought of it, have known that they were not fully paid up. He might have thought about it, and if he had the knowledge which seems to me to be somewhat unreasonably attributed to him, he might very well have come to the conclusion that there was nothing inconsistent with those shares being fully paid up in the fact that he got the shares from the company, and was at the request of the company, if he got paid part of the mortgage money, to retransfer a proportionate part of them to the company. That appears to me to be the answer to a good deal of the reasoning that is found in the judgments in the court below.

One of the learned lords justices comes to the conclusion that he did in point of fact think that these were shares issued by the company; that he did in point of fact think that nothing had been paid upon them, but at the same time he thought, erroneously in point of law, that, although nothing had been paid upon them, they might be treated as fully paid up. I do not see anything to justify those conclusions in point of fact. What the appellant in effect says is quite satisfactory to my mind: that he did not think about it at all; he was told that these shares were fully paid up; he believed it, and that was enough for him; he did not care to inquire or to think; on that belief he acted; that belief was a false belief; that false belief was induced by the company. If so, there is every element necessary to make an estoppel and justify the appellant in this appeal.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Bloomenthal accepted the position of a registered proprietor of certain shares upon the faith of the statement of the company under its common seal that on each of those shares the full amount had been paid. The whole of the evidence on the subject has been read to your lordships, and has been commented upon very ably by the learned counsel for the respondent, but there is nothing in the evidence, or in the circumstances of the case, which leads me to suppose that Mr. Bloomenthal did not honestly believe and rely upon that statement. And I quite agree that if he had thought the matter out, as it is said he ought to have thought the matter out, and if he had been qualified to think the matter out, it might have occurred to him, as it has occurred to many of your lordships, that it is quite conceivable that persons who were shareholders in the company, and were entitled to shares in the company, and were interested in the company and were desirous of preserving it might for the benefit of the company, and their own benefit, have placed at the disposal of the company shares which had been to all intents and purposes actually paid up.

For these reasons, and the reasons which have been so fully explained by the noble and learned lords who have preceded me, I agree in thinking that the appeal ought to be allowed.

ROBINSON v. MAYOR, &c., OF WORKINGTON. (a.)

Local government — Sewers — Sewers not sufficient to drain district—Special damage—Action against local authority—Statutory remedy — Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 15, 19, 299.

Where a local authority has neglected to make such sewers as are necessary for effectually draining their district, and special damage is thereby caused to an individual, no action will lie against them, the sole remedy being by complaint to the Local Government Board as provided by section 299 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Application by the plaintiff for a new trial.

The plaintiff was the owner of certain houses in a street in the defendants' district. When the houses were built a sewer was made along the street to carry the sewage from them into a main sewer. Subsequently, owing to new houses being built in the locality and new sewers made by the builders to connect with the main sewer, the latter became inadequate to carry off all the water and sewage sent into it, and in consequence the water overflowed into the plaintiff's houses, which were at the bottom of a dip.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for the injury so caused.

At the trial before Cave, J., and a jury the learned judge held that there was no evidence of misfeasance, but only of nonfeasance, and that the defendants were not liable, the only remedy being by application to the Local Government Board, under section 299 of the Public Health Act, 1875, or by prerogative writ of mandamus. He accordingly directed a verdict for the defendants.

A. Henry (Shee, Q.C., with him), for the plaintiff.—The doctrine that no action will lie against a public body for nonfeasance applies only to local authorities in their capacity as surveyors of highways. The defendants are sued here as the owners of the sewers in their district, and they have committed a breach of a statutory duty in not keeping the sewers in proper order, as required by sections 15 and 19 of the Public Health Act, 1875. They are therefore liable in that capacity where their negligence causes special damage to an individual: White v. Hindley Local Board, 23 W. R. 651, L. R. 10 Q. B. 219; Blackmore v. Vestry of Mile End Old Town, 30 W. R. 740, 9 Q. B. D. 451; Borough of Bathurst v. Macpherson, 4 App. Cas. 256, 27 W. R. Dig. 139; Sanitary Commissioners of Gibraltar v. Orfila, 15 App. Cas. 400, 39 W. R. Dig. 233; Touzeau v. Slough Urban District Board, 60 J. P. 103. In Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth Local Board, 28 W. R. 111, 12 Ch. D. 102, the action was for an injunction to restrain the defendants from permitting sewage to flow into a stream. Section 299 of the Public Health Act, 1875, was intended to apply where the local authority neglected to provide sufficient sewers for the district, and did not affect the case of special damage to an individual. The remedy provided by that section is not applicable.

Bigham, Q.C. (Mattinson, Q.C., and S. Mayer with him), for the defendants.—This is admittedly a case of nonfeasance. The only duties alleged to have been neglected by this public body are those which are imposed upon them by the Public Health Act, 1875, and that Act, in section 299, specifies the means for enforcing those duties. That, therefore, is the only remedy. Sections 15 and 19 do not create any duty towards an individual; the duty is, so to speak, towards the community. The duty suggested is to make new sewers to meet the altered nature of the locality. That comes within section 299. An action will not lie for mere nonfeasance: Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth Local Board; Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board, [1892] A. C. 345, 41 W. R. Dig. 85.

He also referred to Thompson v. Mayor, &c., of Brighton, 42 W. R. 161, [1894] 1 Q. B. 332.

Henry replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In my opinion this appeal fails. It is important to consider, first of all, what is the complaint. An endeavour was made to show that what was complained of was the non-repair of the sewers. It is clear, however, that the sewers were properly built at the time when they were laid, and there is no evidence that they were out of repair. Therefore there is no evidence that the sewers were out of repair. The real complaint is that the defendants have not caused such sewers to be made as are necessary for effectually draining the district. Whether or not any application could be based upon that complaint I express no opinion. I will assume that the case is brought within section 15 of the Public Health Act, 1875. If so, the defendants are in default for not doing something which they ought to have done. That is mere nonfeasance. If it had not been for the statute there would have been no duty upon the defendants to do anything. There would have been no obligation at common law to drain the district. That duty is imposed by statute alone. If, then, the Act creating the duty gives a remedy for that default, that is the only remedy. The complaint, as I have said, is for not providing sufficient sewers for the district, and that complaint is provided for specifically by section 299, and the remedy there given applies to section 15. The remedy there provided is the only remedy. There is no remedy by way of an action for damages.

In my opinion, if the Act had specified a particular remedy for acts of misfeasance, that would have been the only remedy. But the Act gives no remedy for acts of misfeasance. It follows that there is a remedy for that outside the Act. The decision in Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth Local Board, and Lord Herschell's opinion in Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board, bear out my view of the matter.

The application must therefore be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiff's complaint arises under section 15 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and it is to the effect that the defendants have not made such sewers as are necessary for effectually draining the district. That is a mere case of nonfeasance. There is no duty upon the defendants except such as is imposed by the statute. There is no duty imposed by the statute towards an individual; there is a duty towards the locality. The law is clear that no right of action is given against a public body for an act of mere nonfeasance. I think that that is so independently of any Act of Parliament. But when I find a special remedy given in the Act, then I can have no hesitation in saying that the remedy so given is the only remedy, though the remedy so given is applicable more for the benefit of the locality than for the benefit of the individual. Section 299 provides a remedy where there has been default in providing sufficient sewers for a district. If an action for damages were allowed at the suit of an individual the local authority would have to pay heavy damages, but the necessary works might remain unexecuted. In my opinion this case is not distinguishable from Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth Local Board, and Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board supports the same view. The liability of a public body in case of nonfeasance is laid down in Sanitary Commissioners of Gibraltar v. Orfila to the effect that no claim for reparation will lie except at the instance of a person who can show that the statute under which the public body act has imposed a duty towards himself which they have negligently failed to perform.

In the present case the duty is not imposed towards any individual. The judgment, therefore, is right.

CHITTY, L.J.—I also think that the appeal fails. The complaint is the non-performance of a statutory duty. Two sections were relied upon—sections 15 and 19 of the Public Health Act, 1875. There was no evidence that this sewer was out of repair; the complaint was as to its capacity. The remedy for that is provided for in section 299. The execution of new works for the purpose of providing such sewers as will effectually drain the district, as required by section 15, may involve the necessity of purchasing lands, which the local authority have no power to do, except by going through certain formalities.

It was then said that the sewers were not kept so as not to be a nuisance, as required by section 19. But that does not help the plaintiff, because there was no reasonable cause of complaint as to the "keeping" of the sewers which were vested in the defendants.

Application dismissed.

PEEBLES v. OSWALDTWISTLE URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Sewers—Duty of local authority to drain district—Remedy for default—Mandamus—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 15, 299.

The obligation imposed on a local authority by section 15 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to make such sewers as may be necessary for draining their district cannot be enforced by mandamus, the only remedy being that provided by section 299—viz., by complaint to the Local Government Board.

Robinson v. Mayor, &c., of Workington, ante, p. 453, followed.

Appeal from the judgment of Charles, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was for a mandamus to compel the defendants to perform certain statutory duties.

The original plaintiff was Philip Cadell Peebles, a paper manufacturer, who was owner and occupier of a factory called the Whiteash Paper Mill, within the district for which the defendants were the local authority. After the commencement of the action Mr. Peebles died, and his executors were substituted as plaintiffs (see 44 W. R. 513). Subsequently the executors sold the mill and business to a company, who were added as plaintiffs, with their consent, at the hearing.

The plaintiffs alleged that they desired to cause their drains to empty into the sewers of the defendants, and to carry into such sewers the liquids proceeding from their factory or manufacturing processes, but the sewers within the district were not such as were necessary for effectually draining the district for the purposes of the Public Health Act, 1875, and in particular were not such as were necessary for effectually draining the plaintiffs' premises, whereby the plaintiffs were unable to cause their drains to empty into the sewers or to carry into them the liquids proceeding from their factory or manufacturing processes. The plaintiffs further alleged that they had required the defendants, pursuant to the Public Health Act, 1875, and the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, to cause to be made such sewers as might be necessary for effectually draining their said district, and in particular for effectually draining the plaintiffs' premises, and to give facilities for enabling the plaintiffs to carry into such sewers the liquids proceeding from their factory or manufacturing processes; but the defendants had refused to comply with such requirements.

The plaintiffs claimed a mandamus commanding the defendants to cause to be made such sewers as might be necessary for effectually draining their district for the purposes of the Public Health Act, 1875, and to give facilities for enabling the plaintiffs to carry the liquid proceeding from their factories or manufacturing processes into the sewers under the defendants' control.

By section 15 of the Public Health Act, 1875, "every local authority shall keep in repair all sewers belonging to them, and shall cause to be made such sewers as may be necessary for effectually draining their district for the purposes of this Act."

Section 21 gives power to owners and occupiers of premises within the district of a local authority to drain into the sewers of that authority.

By section 299 "where complaint is made to the Local Government Board that a local authority has made default in providing their district with sufficient sewers . . . the Local Government Board, if satisfied, after due inquiry, that the authority has been guilty of the alleged default, shall make an order limiting a time for the performance of their duty in the matter of such complaint. If such duty is not performed by the time limited in the order, such order may be enforced by a writ of mandamus, or the Local Government Board may appoint some person to perform such duty."

By section 7 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, "every sanitary or other local authority having sewers under their control shall give facilities for enabling manufacturers within their district to carry the liquids proceeding from their factories or manufacturing processes into such sewers."

By section 10 the county court is constituted the proper tribunal to enforce the performance of duties created by the Act.

Charles, J., granted a mandamus commanding the defendants to make such sewers as might be necessary for effectually draining their district for the purposes of the Public Health Act, and in particular the plaintiffs' premises, being of opinion that the remedy by complaint to the Local Government Board, under section 299, was not an exclusive remedy precluding the issue of a mandamus, but he refused to grant a mandamus compelling the defendants to give facilities under the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, being of opinion that the remedy by application to the county court, under section 10, was an exclusive remedy.

The defendants appealed from the first part of this judgment.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Danckwerts, for the defendants.—The obligation which the plaintiffs seek to enforce against the defendants is created by section 15 of the Public Health Act, 1875; and section 299 of the same statute gives a means of enforcing that obligation. Therefore, in accordance with well-settled law, the remedy so given is the exclusive remedy. The most recent authority on the subject, which is also a decision on this same statute, is Robinson v. Mayor, &c., of Workington, ante, p. 453.

Bigham, Q.C., and C. A. Russell, Q.C., for the plaintiffs.—Section 299 does not provide an appropriate remedy. That section applies where the local authority admit their liability, and the question is whether they are properly performing their duty—e.g., whether the existing sewers are fit for the purpose for which they exist. It applies to questions of disputed fact, not to questions of law. Here the only question is a question of law—viz., are the defendants bound to carry away the plaintiffs' effluents? We admit that the defendants' sewers are sufficient if they are not bound to take our effluents; they admit that their sewers are insufficient if they are bound to take our effluents. Therefore the only question is whether they are bound to take them, and there is no question of fact for the Local Government Board. The section therefore does not preclude this action.

They cited Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth Local Board, 28 W. R. 111, 12 Ch. D. 102, and Eccles v. Guardians of Wirrall Union, 34 W. R. 412, 17 Q. B. D. 107.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiffs, having allowed to flow from their factory a large quantity of dirty water, which has spread over a part of the defendants' district, have called upon the defendants to make their sewers larger so that they may be sufficient to carry off the overflow which is doing mischief to the district generally. No doubt the plaintiffs desire also on their own account to be relieved from the inundation which they have caused. They have brought an action asking for a mandamus, which they have obtained by the judgment of Charles, J. The defendants say that no action at all can be maintained against them. The answer which they suggest to the action is this—that a liability is imposed upon them by a particular statute to see their district clear from inundations, no such obligation having existed before the statute, and by the same statute a remedy is given in case the duty so imposed is not properly performed by them—viz., by complaint to the Local Government Board. The canon of construction is that, if in a statute a new obligation is created and in the same statute a remedy is provided for the non-fulfilment of that obligation, that remedy is the only remedy. In obedience to that rule this court held, in Robinson v. Mayor, &c., of Workington, that, as section 15 of the Public Health Act, 1875, imposed on the local authority an obligation which was not known to the common law, and section 299 enacted a remedy to meet the case of that obligation not being fulfilled, that remedy was the only remedy which an individual living in the district could follow. It is true that there the action was for damages, whereas this action is for a mandamus. But neither damages nor mandamus is the remedy provided by section 299, and it follows from the reasoning of that case that an action for mandamus cannot be maintained.

It is argued that in this case an action for mandamus is maintainable because the only question in dispute is a question of law. But this action has not been brought merely for the purpose of having a point of law settled; it goes beyond that, and the judgment which has been given is an order on the local authority to carry out large and expensive works. If on the hearing of a complaint brought before the Local Government Board a question of law arises to be determined, they must decide it. It is of course possible that they may decide wrongly, and their wrong decision may impose serious consequences on individuals or corporate bodies. But I think we must not determine the extent of the power of the Local Government Board. In my opinion it was intended to give them a very large discretion, and I do not desire to put any limit on their power. I cannot agree with the judgment of Charles, J. I think that the action does not lie and that the appeal must be allowed.

Settlement—Appointment of stock sufficient to raise net sum—Duty.

Under a power in a settlement an appointment was made of sufficient stock to raise a net sum of £2,000.

Held, that the appointee was not entitled to receive the said sum free from deductions in respect of duty, but that he must pay duty.

Banks v. Braithwaite, 32 L. J. Ch. 35, followed.

Summons.

This case raised the question whether the appointee of a sufficient sum of stock to raise a net sum of cash was entitled to have the cash paid him without any deduction for stamp duty or other charges.

Under a settlement dated the 15th of January, 1855, made upon the marriage which was afterwards solemnized between Hugh Ward Saunders and Ellen Ann Saunders, then Ellen Ann Bannerman, Mrs. Saunders was tenant for life of part of certain funds thereby settled, and upon the death of her husband, which took place in 1877, became tenant for life of the whole thereof.

The settlement gave to the husband and wife a joint power of appointment to the children or issue of the marriage. Such joint power was not exercised. In default of such joint appointment it gave to the survivor of them a power to appoint the settled funds amongst the children or issue.

Pursuant to her power as such survivor Mrs. Saunders made three several appointments of £2,000, £3,000, and £4,000 respectively to her son Edward George Saunders.

By deed-poll dated the 9th of February, 1894, she appointed that so much of the settled funds as should be sufficient to raise the net sum of £2,000 should, subject to her life interest therein, thenceforth belong to the said E. G. Saunders.

By a deed-poll dated the 11th of August, 1896, she assigned to the said E. G. Saunders her life interest in the funds appointed by the preceding deed-poll, to the intent that he might thenceforth be absolutely and beneficially entitled in possession to so much of the funds as should be sufficient to raise the net sum of £2,000.

The 8th of August, 1894, and the 18th of April, 1896, similar deed-polls as to £3,000.

The 27th of December, 1894, similar deed-poll as to £4,000.

On the 27th of July, 1896, the defendants, the present trustees of the settlement sold £3,563 G. W. R. Guaranteed Stock, part of the settled funds for £7,036 18s. 6d., from which £35 3s. 7d. for brokers' commission and 1s. for stamp duty was deducted, and they received £7,001 13s. 11d.

This sale was in respect of the said appointments of £3,000 and £4,000, which the said E. G. Saunders had requested the trustees to raise and pay to him.

On the 8th of September, 1896, the defendant trustees sold £1,018 G. W. R. like stock for £2,010 11s., from which £10 1s. for commission and 1s. stamp duty was deducted, and they received £2,000 9s.

This was in respect of the £2,000 appointment.

The said E. G. Saunders took out the present summons for the determination of the question whether by virtue of the said deed-poll the defendants ought not to pay all duty in respect of the sums so appointed as also all costs of raising the same out of the remaining trust funds not comprised in the second deeds-poll, and so as to enable the plaintiff to receive the net sums of £2,000, £3,000, and £4,000 respectively, free of duty, brokerage, and all other charges.

Medd, for E. G. Saunders.—The appointment is of a net sum. The word "net" would be frittered away if it were not to cover the duty.

Petersen, contra.—The word "net" refers to the necessary expenses of raising the sum, and the question of debt does not arise till the sum is raised. All the cases cited are cases of directions to pay a clear sum. Sanders v. Kiddell, 7 Sim. 536, and Pridie v. Field, 2 W. R. 632, 19 Beav. 497, show that the word "clear" is not in itself sufficient. You must look at the will as a whole.

Medd, in reply, referred to Jarman on Wills, 5th ed., p. 151. [STIRLING, J., referred to Banks* v. Braithwaite, 32 L. J. Ch. 35.]

STIRLING, J.—The substantial question which I have to decide is whether under certain appointments made in pursuance of a power the appointees are entitled to take the appointments duty free—in other words, whether the amount of duty payable by them in respect of the appointments has been given to them by the appointor as well as the sums themselves.

The appointor was a lady entitled for life who made several appointments in the same form. I will read one of them: [His lordship read as follows: "Now these presents witness that in exercise of the power to the said Ellen Ann Saunders, for this purpose given to her by the said indenture of settlement, and of every other power enabling her in this behalf, the said Ellen Ann Saunders doth hereby irrevocably appoint that so much of the stocks, funds, shares, and securities now held by the present trustees of the said indenture of settlement upon and subject to the trusts thereof as shall be sufficient to raise the net sum of £2,000 shall, subject to the life interest of the said Ellen Ann Saunders, henceforth belong to and be vested in the said Edward George Saunders, his executors, administrators, and assigns."] That is not an appointment of a net sum of £2,000, but of such an amount of stock as is sufficient to raise £2,000. It has been decided on the part of many judges with much difficulty that a direction to pay a clear legacy or annuity means a legacy or annuity free from all deductions. A series of cases have so decided, and by these I should be bound. But those are cases under wills. This is a case of an appointment made under a settlement. Even in the case of a will a distinction has been taken, and it was established in Banks v. Braithwaite, before Kindersley, V.C., that there is a difference between the case of a gift of a clear annuity or legacy and the case of the gift of a sum of stock sufficient to produce the legacy, or the income of which, would be sufficient to pay an annuity. In that case a testator gave the residue of his personal estate to trustees upon trust to set apart £10,000 Consols and pay the dividends to his sister for life, and after her decease to retain so much of the said sum of £10,000 as should be sufficient to realize the clear yearly income of £150; and he directed his trustees to pay the dividends and other income of the sum so directed to be retained by them to his nephew. It was held that the nephew took the annuity subject to legacy duty, and the Vice-Chancellor refers to the authorities which decided that an annuity is given clear of legacy duty if a testator gives a clear annuity of a definite amount, but he is of opinion that that is a different case. He says: "That principle does not touch the present question; for in those cases the word "clear" was annexed to the gift of the annuity. In this case there is no gift of an annuity, but what is given is the dividend of a sum of stock. It is not said that the legatee is to have the dividends clear, but the sum of stock is to be thus ascertained. It is such a sum of stock as would produce a clear income of £150 per annum. The particular sum is £5,000 Consols; and that amount having been arrived at, the dividends are then directed to be paid to the petitioner." In applying that reasoning here what is given is not a clear sum of £2,000, but stock sufficient to pay a clear sum of £2,000; and when that is ascertained by proper calculation that particular sum would belong to the appointee. It seems to me this case is governed by Banks v. Braithwaite, and that the gift is not given free of duty, and the appointee has to pay duty.

THOMPSON v. RIDDING. (a.)

Will—Tenant for life and remainderman—Leaseholds—Repairs.

Where a testator directed that the income derived from certain leasehold houses should be paid to his widow for her life,

Held, that the words "income derived" meant net income, and not gross income, and that, consequently, the tenant for life must bear the expense of all outgoings incurred after the testator's death.

In re Courtier, 35 W. R. 85, 34 Ch. D. 136, discussed.

In re Baring, Jeune v. Baring, 41 W. R. 87, [1893] 1 Ch. 61, dissented from.

This summons raised (inter alia) the question whether the tenant for life was entitled from the death of the testator to receive the rents and profits of the leasehold property of the testator, which she held at ground-rents, without making any deduction therefrom in respect of ground-rents, rates, taxes, repairs, insurance, and other outgoings.

By his will the testator appointed his wife, S. Ridding, and S. Thompson and G. W. Fry executors and trustees to arrange his affairs, manage his estate, and carry out his wishes and desires. Then he directed that all his just debts, funeral and testamentary and other expenses, be paid and satisfied as soon as conveniently might be after his decease; and immediately after his decease he requested his executors and trustees to take in hand the various businesses carried on by him and manage the same until they could advantageously be put in the market, and to obtain the highest possible price for them.

He directed his executors and trustees to sell the various premises he held at rack rentals as early as practicable and to the highest advantage; and then certain premises (naming them) held at ground-rents he wished to be retained by his trustees and let on lease or otherwise at fair rentals, together with all other property which he might hold at nominal ground-rents which might be acquired by him at any time, and the income derived therefrom to be devoted as thereinafter described. He then generally "directed and devised" that, after the collection of and getting together of all outstanding assets, the proceeds of the sales of the various premises, &c., and of all sums to which he might be entitled, or which might become due to him at the time of his decease, and, after due payment of all his just debts, liabilities, testamentary and other expenses, legacies, and other sums incidental to the settling up of his estate, the surplus remaining in their hands should be invested in Consols, Government securities, ground-rents, or freehold cottage property, and the whole of such income from such investment should be paid over to his said wife quarterly or at other suitable periods for her benefit and that of his children, and to be enjoyed by her and them during the term of her natural life, and at her decease the whole of his estate to be equally divided among his children as therein mentioned.

A question having been raised whether the cost of current repairs and outgoings of the retained leaseholds were payable out of income or corpus, this summons was taken out.

Whinney, for the children.—I submit that the liability imposed by In re Courtier, 35 W. R. 85, 34 Ch. D. 136, only applies to the liability to put premises in repair which have got out of order during the lifetime of the testator.

He referred to In re Baring, 41 W. R. 87, [1893] 1 Ch. 61; Debney v. Eckett, 43 W. R. 54.

Cozens-Hardy, for the tenant for life.—The word "manage" in the will does not apply to the leaseholds, and I ask that In re Baring should be followed, and I submit that that case was rightly decided. The case in the WEEKLY REPORTER (Debney v. Eckett) is not clear, and I submit that the facts there were different.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 3.—STIRLING, J. [having stated the facts and read the question on the summons above set out, continued:] The question is whether the accruing income derived from these leaseholds is to be paid over to the widow without making any deductions for payments which may be made for ground-rent or for satisfying repairs, by which, of course, are meant those occurring after the death of the testator, or otherwise in performance of the covenants in the leases. It is to be observed that first the testator directs the trustees to arrange his affairs, manage his estate, and carry out his wishes and desires. So far he imposes on them the management of his estate. No doubt he repeats the word "management" in a subsequent clause as to his businesses in the interval between his death and the sale, but he does not thereby give up the direction which exists in the prior portion of the will as to the management of his estate. With reference to the retained leaseholds, he directs them to be let on lease at fair rentals, and then says that the income to be derived from them is to be devoted as thereinafter described—that is, paid to the widow. What is income? It appears to me that it is not the whole income which would be derived from these rentals without any deduction, but the income after making proper deductions in respect of these charges. That seems to me the very meaning of the language used. "Income derived" in ordinary parlance is understood to mean not the gross rents, but the rents after deducting the proper outgoings. In that view I am corroborated in the language used in giving the income of the residuary estate. He there says "the whole of such income shall be paid over to my wife." He does not say that in respect of the leaseholds. There, however, it is said that he directs the liabilities to be paid out of his estate. No doubt he does, but if I am right in holding that income directed to be paid to the widow derived from leaseholds means net income, I cannot see that that construction can be effected by a direction to discharge liabilities out of corpus. And, therefore, according to the language used the widow must bear the expense of the proper outgoings in respect of ground-rent, rates, taxes, insurance, and other outgoings on the property.

On behalf of the widow the case of In re Baring was relied on. That case was decided partly on the language of the particular will and partly with reference to the case In re Courtier. As far as it depended on the language of the particular will, I shall not enter into consideration of it. But as regards In re Courtier, I feel bound to say that having read it carefully I am unable to put the construction on the language used by the various members of the Court of Appeal, which seems to have been put on it in In re Baring. Certainly in point of decision In re Courtier did not decide the present case, because it was exclusively directed to the question whether the tenant for life was bound to discharge the liabilities in respect of repairs to property which had accrued at the death of the testator. The decision of the Court of Appeal was given with reference to that and nothing else, and it seems to me that when one looks at the judgments, that was the sole question which the judges of the Court of Appeal dealt with. It is sufficient to refer to the judgment of Cotton, L.J., after stating that the leaseholds were at the death of the testator in a condition requiring repair, he says: "The widow has kept them in the same state as they were in at the testator's death, but declines to put them in such a state of repair as to satisfy the covenants in the leases. With respect to that question, it is admitted that the words of the will are such that it cannot be contended that there is a trust for immediate conversion." Then he goes on. He is dealing entirely with the question whether the widow is bound to put the leaseholds in such a state of repair as will satisfy the covenants in the leases at that time. I do not think, therefore, that In re Courtier can be relied on as a decision adverse to that which I think ought to be given in the present case.

In re BATTAMS & HUTCHINSON (SOLICITORS). (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Taxation—Joint application of mortgagee-solicitor and his bankrupt client—Submission of solicitor to pay.

A solicitor, who is mortgagee of the moneys coming to his client on the cash account and taxation of the bills of costs of his client's former solicitors, and who makes a joint application with his client for delivery of such cash account and bills of costs and for taxation, must join with his client in the usual submission to pay, and the fact that his client has been adjudicated bankrupt while such proceedings were pending will not relieve the solicitor from making such submission.

Motion.

On the 30th of October, 1896, Mr. Alexander de Schwertchkoff took out a summons against his former solicitors, Messrs. Battams & Hutchinson, for delivery within seven days of certain bills of costs, a cash account, and for taxation. At the time a receiving order had been made against Schwertchkoff but he had not been yet adjudicated a bankrupt. Schwertchkoff's present solicitor, Mr. Harker, claimed to be a mortgagee of all moneys coming to his client from Messrs. Battams & Hutchinson on the taxation. In the circumstances the court required Mr. Harker to join in the application then before the court, and this was accordingly done. On the 21st of January, 1897, the court made an order upon the above-mentioned summons for delivery of the bills of costs and cash account, and directed the rest of the summons to stand over, with liberty to apply. Certain bills of costs and a cash account were delivered in pursuance of this order, but being considered inconsistent, the applicants, Schwertchkoff and Harker, moved on the 19th of February, 1897, for an order directing the respondents to deliver within four days proper bills of costs and disbursements, and a cash account. All the bills were, by order made upon that motion, referred to taxation, the costs being reserved. In the meantime Schwertchkoff was adjudicated bankrupt. In drawing the order upon the motion, the registrar inserted the usual submission to pay by both applicants whatever should be found due to Messrs. Battams & Co. Schwertchkoff consented, but Harker objected, to make this submission. The respondents required that the order for taxation should go upon a submission to pay by both parties—i.e., the original applicant and his solicitor, and they objected to allow the order to go for taxation of the bills upon the submission to pay of Schwertchkoff alone, he being at the time a bankrupt.

Harker now moved to vary the minutes of the order and to be relieved from the submission to pay.

Eustace Smith, for the applicant Harker.

Stephen Lynch, for the respondents.

KEKEWICH, J., sated the facts of the case, and continued: The question which I have to decide is whether the order can go on the submission of one, or whether it must not be on the submission of both applicants. It is the established practice that the order for taxation on the application of a client is never made without the submission of the client to pay. That of course rests upon the relation of solicitor and client. The client admits the retainer for the purpose of the business under consideration, he therefore admits the relation and the liability to pay what is properly due; and if he puts the solicitor to the expense and trouble of taxation he is bound to pay what is eventually due: that is perfectly right. Mr. Eustace Smith says that in an order for taxation you are dealing with the jurisdiction of the court arising out of the relation between the parties of solicitor and client, and that, therefore, the submission to pay is that of the client only, and flows from the relation of solicitor and client and nothing else, and that the other applicant, the solicitor, who comes here as an assignee of whatever is due, if anything, is under no liability to submit, as the submission does not arise out of that relation. That, to my mind, is not the proper way of putting it. It does arise out of the relation of solicitor and client, and it is something evoked from that relation and the person who makes the application, if he is entitled to make it at all, must also submit to pay. He cannot have it both ways. If he is entitled to the order he must have it in the proper form. I think he is entitled at any time before the order is passed to say, "I never intended to submit, not being the client." He is entitled to raise that objection; this is therefore quite a proper matter to have tried before me. The applicant must take his choice, either he takes the order or he does not. If he takes it, it must be by submitting to pay. If he does not submit he cannot have the order, and his motion fails, because he has not complied with the order of the court. I understand in this case that Mr. Harker is now willing to join in the submission to pay, and the order will therefore go in that form, all costs being reserved.

DAVIS v. INGRAM. (a.)

Partition action—Practice—Infant plaintiffs—Sale in lieu of partition—Sale depending upon result of inquiries—Form of judgment.

Form of judgment in an action for sale in lieu of partition where the plaintiffs are infants entitled to one undivided one-third share, and where the execution of the sale depends upon the result of the inquiries directed by the order, the infants, in the event of a sale, being declared trustees of their shares for the purchaser and their next friend being appointed to convey the infants' shares.

By his will dated the 10th of December, 1873, Thomas James Bayliss, after providing for payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, gave, devised, and bequeathed all the rest, residue, and remainder of his real and personal estate, subject to his wife's life interest therein, unto and among all and every his children who should be living at the decease of his said wife in equal shares and proportions, and the issue of such of them as should be dead (such issue nevertheless taking only the share to which their deceased parent would have been entitled in the event of such parent surviving the testator's said wife), to and for his, her, or their own use and benefit absolutely.

The testator died on the 11th of December, 1873, and his will was duly proved on the 18th of July, 1874.

The testator's widow died on the 9th of January 1895.

The testator left three children surviving him—namely, (1) Mary Jane Bayliss, who married Samuel Samson Davis, and died in 1891, having had three children. These children were infants, and were the plaintiffs in this action, suing by James Ingram, their next friend. (2) Elizabeth Anne Bayliss, who married Charles Ingram in or about the year 1870, and was one of the defendants. Charles Ingram had not been heard of for several years, and it was not known whether he was living or dead; and (3) Charles Jenkins Bayliss, who mortgaged his share under the will to the defendant James Frederick Townend, in whom the same was now vested. Charles Jenkins Bayliss was adjudicated a bankrupt in 1893, and his trustee in bankruptcy was joined as a defendant.

The testator died seized of certain freehold property in Essex.

The plaintiffs alleged that it would be for the benefit of all the persons interested in the property that the same should be sold and not partitioned, and they claimed all necessary inquiries and a sale in lieu of partition.

Percy F. Wheeler, for the plaintiffs, asked the court to direct the necessary inquiries, and also to direct that in the event of a sale the infant plaintiffs might be declared to be trustees, and the plaintiff James Ingram, their next friend, appointed to convey on their behalf, according to the form in Seton's Judgments and Orders, 5th ed., vol. 2, p. 1542-3, No. 21.

KEKEWICH, J.—Is it usual to give directions in an order before it is certain that there will be a sale—i.e., while the sale is still hypothetical? I am not at present disposed to alter the practice. I will refer the matter to the registrar to be gone into by him.

Gore-Browne and E. A. Jelf, for the various defendants.

The order, as subsequently drawn up, directed the usual inquiries and also an inquiry whether it would be for the benefit of such of the persons interested in the said hereditaments as were infants that the same should be sold, and proceeded as follows: And if it shall be certified that all the persons interested are parties to this action and either (1) that the parties desiring a sale, other than the infants, are interested to the extent of one moiety or upwards in the said hereditaments, or (2) that it will be for the benefit of the said infants that the said hereditaments should be sold, and that the parties desiring a sale, including the said infants, are interested to the extent aforesaid—it is ordered that the said hereditaments be sold with the approbation of the judge. And it is ordered that the money to arise from such sale be paid into court to the credit of this action. But if it shall appear that any of the persons interested are not parties to this action, then it is ordered that any of the persons interested, collectively or individually, to the extent of one moiety or upwards in the said hereditaments, be at liberty, when it shall have been certified that the persons who ought to be served with notice of this judgment have been so served, to apply at chambers for a sale of the said hereditaments, the said infants not to be at liberty to apply hereunder unless and until it shall have been certified that it will be for their benefit that the said hereditaments should be sold. And this court doth declare that upon any such sale being made, such of the parties interested in the said hereditament as are infants will be trustees for the purchaser or purchasers of their undivided share or shares of the said hereditaments within the meaning of the Trustee Act, 1893. And it is ordered that James Ingram, of &c., the next friend of the plaintiffs, be appointed to convey such share or shares to the purchaser or purchasers of the said hereditaments. And it is ordered that the said James Ingram, upon payment into court by any purchaser of the amount of his purchase-money, convey to such purchaser accordingly the property bought by him. And any of the parties interested in the said hereditaments other than the party having the conduct of the sale are to be at liberty to bid at such sale and become the purchaser of the said hereditaments or any part thereof without payment of any deposit in respect thereof. And it is ordered that the purchase-money of any portion so purchased by any of the parties be set off against the shares to which they may be respectively entitled.

Further consideration adjourned, with liberty to apply.

RAFFETY v. SCHOFIELD. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Building agreement—Power of landlord to determine—Option to tenant to purchase—Interest of tenant after exercise of option.

A. entered into an agreement with B. by which B. was to build upon A.'s land, and A. was, upon the works being carried out, to demise the land to B. for ninety-nine years, and the agreement contained an option to B. to purchase the freehold. It was thereby provided (inter alia) that B. should forthwith proceed with the works, and completely finish on or before a certain day, and if B. should not perform the several agreements on his part, A. might determine the agreement and re-enter. A., being dissatisfied with B.'s progress, gave notice to B. to determine the agreement, B. having shortly before given notice to A. of B.'s intention to purchase.

Held, (1) that B. had made default in performing his part of the agreement; (2) that the option of purchase was, notwithstanding, well exercised; (3) that the contract so made did not in itself before completion put an end to the leasing parts of the agreement, but created fresh rights and liabilities between the parties, and the new relation of vendor and purchaser between them; (4) that assuming that A.'s notice to determine had put an end to B.'s rights so far as they arose directly from the building agreement, A. had not thereby put an end to the contract for sale or to B.'s rights thereunder; but (5) that after the exercise of the option, and pending completion, A.'s power, if any, to determine B.'s occupation, and B.'s rights and liabilities under the building agreement, became, as between A. and B., superseded and not enforceable.

Action.

It appeared that the plaintiff, who was the freeholder of certain land and premises situate on the west side of Pembridge-villas and west side of Chepstow-place, in the parish of St. Mary Abbotts, Kensington (which premises were formerly the site of two messuages and tenements), also of a certain other piece of land situate on the west side of Chepstow-place aforesaid (which premises were formerly the site of a messuage or dwelling-house), on the 12th of August, 1895, entered into an agreement in writing with the defendant, whereby it was agreed that the defendant should carry out upon the said land certain building operations, and the plaintiff should, upon the buildings being erected and covered in, and the works carried out as mentioned in the agreement, demise the said premises to the defendant for ninety-nine years from the 29th of September, 1895, at a rent, after the first year, of £675; and in the agreement there was an option to the defendant to purchase the said premises upon the terms which are set out below.

By clause 3 of the said agreement it was provided that the defendant should forthwith proceed with such works, and should, on or before the 1st of May, 1896, erect and cover in shops with residential flats upon the said pieces of land and lay the drains and fix the gutters and rain-water pipes thereto, and connect the same with the sewers, and should completely finish the same fit for occupation, with the fence, walls, iron fence, gates, and other buildings, on or before the 1st day of June, 1896, and should, on or before that day, lay out, pave, plant, and complete for use the yard and garden where the land was not built upon, and should expend not less than the sum of £20,000 in and about such works.

There was a dispute between the parties whether the above dates were filled in on the 12th of August, when the agreement was signed, or some time later, and also whether there was a contemporaneous agreement that, if an extension of the time for the completion of the said buildings beyond those dates could be obtained by the defendant from the London County Council, those dates should be postponed by the amount of such extension.

By clause 13 of the said agreement it was provided that until the said premises should have been actually demised, the defendant should pay the said rent and perform and observe the stipulations and agreements on his part thereinbefore referred to, which were provisions of a usual character in agreements of this kind.

By clause 15 of the said agreement it was provided that in case the defendant should not at the respective times and in manner thereinbefore expressed have built and fully completed the said shops and flats thereinbefore agreed to be built on the land thereby agreed to be demised, or in case the defendant should for the space of twenty-eight days next after the rent payable in respect of the said pieces of land or any portion of such rent should have become payable make default in the payment thereof, or if the defendant should not perform or observe the several stipulations or agreements on his part therein contained then, and in any or either of the said cases, it should be lawful for the plaintiff by such writing as was therein mentioned to determine and put an end to the said agreement and thereupon, into and upon the said land and premises and all buildings thereon to re-enter, and the same to have again, repossess, and enjoy as in his former estate.

By clause 17 of the said agreement it was provided that if the defendant should be desirous of purchasing the fee simple free from incumbrances (except the said agreement of the 12th of August, 1895) of the said piece of land and premises at the price of £16,000, and should at any time before the 9th of August, 1897, give to the plaintiff notice in writing to that effect then, and in such case the person giving such notice should be deemed the purchaser of the premises at the price of £16,000 as from the date of such notice subject to such conditions as therein mentioned, of which two only are material to this report—viz., a condition that the purchaser should pay all arrears of rent up to the day appointed for the completion of the purchase including the quarter's rent due on that day; and a condition that if the purchaser should take any objection or make any requisition which the vendor should be unable or unwilling to remove or comply with the vendor might by such notice as was therein mentioned, and notwithstanding any intermediate negotiation, rescind that agreement for sale.

The defendant applied for, and, after considerable delay, obtained from the London County Council an extension of time for the completion of the buildings until the 27th of October, 1897, the letter from the council consenting to the application being dated the 28th of October, 1896.

The plaintiff would seem to have been dissatisfied from the first with the progress made by the defendant in carrying out the works, and on the 27th of January, 1897, caused a notice to be served upon the defendant purporting to determine the said agreement under the above power in clause 15 thereof, and stating the plaintiff's intention to forthwith re-enter upon the premises. The notice alleged default in carrying out the said agreement as the reason, and the plaintiff's evidence particularly alleged that the defendant had taken no step to build upon the land, and had never paid any rent as provided by the said agreement.

Meanwhile—viz., on the 30th of December, 1896—the defendant had served upon the plaintiff notice of his intention to exercise the option of purchase given by clause 17 of the said agreement.

The defendant's evidence was to the effect that the defendant had expended upwards of £1,000 in building upon the said land and premises, and the time for the completion of the buildings did not expire until the 27th of October, 1897, under the circumstances above mentioned, and that a quarter's rent (being the first rent payable under the agreement) was due on the 25th of December, 1896, which he had not paid, as under clause 17 of the said agreement, having exercised his option to purchase, he was deemed to be the purchaser of the premises, and under the same clause all arrears of rent were to be paid with the purchase-money on the completion of the purchase.

This was an action for an injunction to restrain the defendant from trespassing upon or interfering with the possession by the plaintiff of the said land and premises, and proceeded upon the footing of the plaintiff's allegation that he had taken possession pursuant to his notice, and had since remained in possession. This allegation was denied by the defendant, who alleged that his men had been continually at work upon the land since the date of the agreement.

ROMER, J.—This action gives rise to points of some difficulty. From the evidence before me it appears that the property is worth considerably more than the purchase-money payable by the defendant, and if the plaintiff's contention be correct, the defendant will lose not only the benefit of his bargain, but also all the money that he has already paid to the plaintiff and that he has otherwise expended in reference to the property. On the other hand it is suggested on the plaintiff's behalf that if the defendant does not complete the purchase the property will be deteriorated in value by the buildings contemplated by the agreement not being completed within the time limited. But having regard to the value of the property, it does not appear to me very probable that the defendant will fail to complete.

The first question is, whether the defendant has made such default as would entitle the plaintiff, if the option had not been exercised, to determine the agreement under clause 15? It was contended on the plaintiff's behalf that the defendant had committed default in not completing the buildings by the time limited by clause 3. But it was proved to my satisfaction that there was a collateral contemporaneous agreement that the dates mentioned in clause 3 should be postponed if an extension of time could be obtained from the London County Council for the completion of the buildings by the amount of such extension. A large extension was so obtained, and the times for covering in and finally completing the buildings under the original and collateral agreements have in consequence not yet expired. So no default has arisen in this respect. But the other default relied on by the plaintiff occasions more difficulty. It appears that beyond pulling down some erections on the site, and stacking the bricks ready to be used for the new building, and paying one or two men to keep possession of and look after the premises, the defendant has not substantially done anything to carry out the works mentioned in the agreement. It seems to me that under these circumstances, and looking at the agreement as a whole, I cannot say that the defendant did "forthwith proceed with the works" within the fair meaning of those words as used in clause 3. And in coming to this conclusion I bear in mind that the agreement does not provide for or require that the works should be continuously proceeded with. But I think it did require some building to be forthwith proceeded with. Something more, at any rate, than what the defendant has done. I therefore come to the conclusion that in this respect there was default on the defendant's part, and that consequently he did not "perform and observe the several stipulations and agreements on his part" within the meaning of these words as used in clause 15.

This conclusion renders it necessary for me to consider the effect of the exercise by the defendant of the option of purchase given to him by clause 17. Now it clearly was not a condition precedent to the exercise of the option that the defendant should not have made default under the building agreement, so that the option was well exercised and a building contract was thereby come to, between plaintiff and defendant for sale and purchase of the property. But I agree with the plaintiff's arguments so far that that contract did not in itself before completion put an end to what I may call the leasing parts of the building agreement. I come to that conclusion from a general consideration of the building agreement and in particular of the provisions of clause 17, that the tenant was to buy "free from incumbrances (except these presents)." And of course the contract of purchase might not be completed, and that from no fault of the purchaser, for it might (by way of example) be put an end to by the vendor under the provision of clause 17, that if the purchaser made any requisition that the vendor was unable or unwilling to remove or comply with, the latter might rescind the sale, and it could not be within the contemplation of the building agreement that in such a case the purchaser should not only lose his purchase bargain, but also find himself deprived of all his rights under the other parts of the agreement. But on the other hand, though the contract of purchase did not in itself destroy the leasing parts of the agreement, it created fresh rights and liabilities between the parties, and a new relation between them—viz., that of vendor and purchaser. It was, in fact, a new and distinct contract from that created by the building agreement, though it arose by reason of and flowed from the building agreement; and even assuming that, notwithstanding the purchase contract, the rest of the building agreement stood, including the power to determine under clause 15, I see no sufficient reason for holding that the determination of the building agreement under the power would in itself destroy or affect the contract for sale, which (as I have pointed out) was a new and distinct contract from that created by the building agreement. The wording of the provision in clause 15 which enabled the landlord to determine "this present agreement" is not appropriate if attempted to be applied to the contract of purchase.

The last-named contract was not "this present agreement," or even part of it, though flowing from it. And even assuming that the plaintiff has by his notice to determine put an end to the defendant's rights so far as they arise directly from the building agreement, I think the plaintiff has not thereby put an end to the contract of sale or to the defendant's rights thereunder.

Now, on the evidence it is clear that the defendant has throughout remained and is still in possession of the property, and I find that on completion under the second condition in clause 17 he will have to pay to the plaintiff all arrears of rent up to that date, and under these circumstances I think I ought not even on the above assumption to order him to retire from possession before the date fixed for completion arrives. I think it was contemplated by the agreement that after exercising his option of purchase the defendant should remain in possession until completion, and should then pay with his purchase-money rent for the interim possession, and with that possession I think I ought not to interfere. I may add that no question arises here as to rent accruing due before the option was exercised, for no such rent remains owing.

But there is another consideration which also induces me to hold that the plaintiff ought to fail in this action. After the relation of vendor and purchaser was established between the parties, the purchaser was in equity the owner of the property. And the position of the vendor is clearly stated by Lord Cairns in Shaw v. Foster, 20 W. R. 907, L. R. 5 H. L. 321, p. 338: "The vendor was a trustee of the property for the purchaser; the purchaser was the real beneficial owner in the eye of a court of equity of the property, subject only to this observation, that the vendor, whom I have called the trustee, was not a mere dormant trustee; he was a trustee having a personal and substantial interest in the property, a right to protect that interest and an active right to assert that interest if anything should be done in derogation of it. The relation therefore of trustee and cestui que trust subsisted, but subsisted subject to the paramount right of the vendor and trustee to protect his own interest as vendor of the property." Now, in the case before me I cannot see that any paramount right of the vendor to protect his own right as vendor requires or entitles him to determine the defendant's occupation or his interests under the building agreement, even assuming that the defendant is occupying the property not as purchaser, but as a quasi-tenant under the building agreement. This is not a case where the vendor has rights in respect of the defendant's occupation which are apart and separate from the rights of the purchaser or require separate protection. As I have pointed out, no rent remains owing to the vendor in respect of the occupation of the property prior to the exercise of the option of purchase, and the subsequent rent is expressly provided for by the contract of sale. The question of the defendant's occupation, therefore —that is to say, whether it is better or not that that occupation should be determined, is one which only concerns the property sold and its value, and that property is in equity the defendant's, and he is entitled to say that he desires the existing position of the property and its occupation not to be disturbed pending completion. Suppose that the occupier had not been the purchaser, and had been an ordinary tenant existing at the date of the contract. The purchaser would have been entitled to say to the vendor that he did not desire the tenancy to be determined, for as between vendor and purchaser of a property which at the date of contract is in occupation of a tenant, the purchaser is, generally speaking, entitled to have the property preserved pending completion in its existing state, and the vendor would not only not be entitled as against the purchaser's desire to determine the tenancy, but if he did determine it he would be liable to the purchaser for any loss thereby accruing. This has always, I think, been the general view of the profession, and is certainly implied in the case of Harford v. Purrier, 1 Madd. 532. In fact as between vendor and purchaser generally the powers of the vendor to act as owner of the property and (inter alia) to change tenants or holdings, are suspended pending completion of the purchase. And I think I ought to hold in the case before me that after the exercise by the defendant of the option to purchase and pending completion, the power of the plaintiff, if any, to determine the defendant's occupation, and the defendant's rights and liabilities under the building agreement, became as between the plaintiff and defendant suspended, and not enforceable—at any rate, not enforceable under the circumstances of the case established before me.

The action, therefore, fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

WILDING v. SANDERSON. (a.)

Consent judgment—Mortgagee's accounts—Unilateral mistake—Mistake innocently induced—Ambiguous phraseology—Mistake of fact or law—Subsequent adoption.

A judgment by consent which has been duly passed and entered after its terms have been settled in the presence of the parties, will—upon action brought for that purpose—be set aside if it has been consented to by one party, or his legal advisers, in the belief that the terms employed bore a meaning which in reality they do not bear, where such erroneous belief was contributed to, although innocently, by the conduct of the other party or his agents.

The court will set aside a consent judgment made in pursuance of and intended to embody a supposed previous agreement between the parties, when such supposed agreement was in reality no agreement at all, the parties never having been ad idem on an essential particular.

So long as such a consent judgment stands it must be obeyed, and consequently the conduct of one party in insisting upon its having the meaning he thought it had when he consented to it, and in taking the necessary legal steps to maintain his supposed rights under it, is not such an election to stand by the judgment as will prevent him afterwards claiming to have it set aside.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Trial of action.

This was an action to set aside a consent order made by Romer, J., on the 23rd of November, 1894, in a redemption and foreclosure action of Ainsworth v. Wilding, in which the present defendants Sanderson, Howson, & Waugh, as representing the original plaintiff, Ainsworth, were the plaintiffs, and the present plaintiff and the other defendants were the defendants.

The facts were as follows: For some years previously to the mortgage hereinafter mentioned Richard Wilding, since deceased, and John Wilding, the present plaintiff, acted as solicitors for one John Smith, and made large advances to him from time to time, and received payments on account. On the 7th of October, 1877, Smith gave an equitable mortgage by way of charge upon freehold and leasehold properties to the Wildings to secure the sum of £12,500, which was the sum believed to be then due to them, with interest at 5 per cent. In January, 1878, Smith brought the action of Smith v. Wilding for redemption against the Wildings, and by the judgment therein in March, 1878, the mortgage was declared to stand as security for the amount of money actually due on the balance of accounts, to the Wildings, and accounts were directed to be brought in. An account was accordingly made out between the parties in the nature of an ordinary current account, in which interest at 5 per cent. per annum was charged on both sides on all receipts and payments, and a balance of £11,805 3s. 1d. shown as due to the Wildings up to the 7th of October, 1877. This account was accepted, and an agreement admitting that this balance was due to the Wildings was signed by them and Smith at the foot of the account on the 4th of August, 1879, and thereupon further proceedings in the action were stayed by consent. Previously, in February, 1879, Smith had mortgaged the same property as that comprised in the mortgage of October, 1877, but subject to it, to Thomas Ainsworth, who acted as his solicitor up to July, 1879. In October, 1879, the Wildings went into possession of the mortgaged property. Richard Wilding died in 1884 leaving John Wilding, the plaintiff, in sole possession, and solely entitled to the mortgage.

The mortgagees while in possession from time to time sold portions of the mortgaged property. In 1884 Smith, the mortgagor, became bankrupt, and died in 1892.

In August, 1890, Ainsworth brought the abovementioned action of Ainsworth v. Wilding, in the court of Stirling, J., against John Wilding and Smith and a third mortgagee, the present defendant, Sir W. C. Brooks. Upon the death of Ainsworth in December, 1890, the action was continued by his representatives, Sanderson, Howson, & Waugh, the present first three defendants. Subsequently the trustee in bankruptcy of Smith, the present defendant Edelsten, was also made defendant. In this action the plaintiff alleged that the sales of portions of the mortgaged property by the Wildings had been made at an undervalue, and claimed a declaration that J. Wilding was liable to make good the loss thus occasioned, and for damages, and to have an account taken as against a mortgagee in possession of what was due to Wilding under his mortgage. Before the trial came on negotiations and correspondence took place between the solicitors of the parties, minutes of a consent order were proposed, but were not agreed to owing to a difference between the parties as to whether the account signed on the 4th of August, 1879, could be reopened or not, and it was suggested that the court might pursue a third course—namely, to hold the account primâ facie binding upon the then plaintiffs, but subject to their right to surcharge and falsify. At the trial, which took place before Romer, J., on the 23rd of November, 1894, the plaintiffs' counsel stated that the only point between the parties was whether the said settled account was binding upon the subsequent mortgagees, and after discussion and evidence, and a suggestion by the learned judge that the settled account should be taken as primâ facie correct, subject to the plaintiffs' right to surcharge and falsify, a suggestion made by counsel for the then plaintiffs that the account should be "upon the footing and by way of continuation of" the previous account appeared to be assented to.

The judgment was drawn up before the registrar in the presence of the parties, and was passed and entered. It by consent declared that the mortgage of the 7th of October, 1877, should stand as a security for the amount which on taking the accounts thereinafter directed should be found to be due to the plaintiff, and accounts were directed of what was due to the plaintiff upon his mortgage, and of the rents and profits received by Wilding, or which without his wilful default might have been so received, "and it was by consent ordered that the said accounts should be taken on the footing and by way of continuation of the account delivered in the action of Smith v. Wilding up to the 7th of October, 1877," and that on taking such accounts the plaintiff should be at liberty to surcharge and falsify any items except those agreed to prior to the 23rd of May, 1879 (an agreed date).

On the 16th of January, 1895, a summons was taken out in chambers to proceed upon the consent judgment by the plaintiffs in Ainsworth v. Wilding, and accordingly an account was brought into chambers by Wilding in the ordinary form as from the appointed date—that is to say, not such an account in form as the previous one agreed upon between Smith and Wilding, charging and allowing interest at 5 per cent., but the ordinary account of a mortgagee in possession who has sold part of the property. The account was verified by affidavit dated the 9th of March, 1895.

This form of account was objected to by the plaintiffs on the ground that the judgment directed an account current of the same kind as the previous account. The determination of this question was adjourned to the chief clerk, and by him to Stirling, J., who decided that the account was in its proper form as directed by the judgment, but upon appeal the Court of Appeal reversed this decision, and held that the account must be taken in the same manner as the previous one.

Wilding thereupon made an application in the action of Ainsworth v. Wilding to Romer, J., to set aside the judgment on the ground of mistake, reported 44 W. R. 540, [1896] 1 Ch. 673, but it was refused, as asking the court to do what could not be done on motion. Wilding then brought this present action, stating that if the construction placed upon the consent order by the Court of Appeal was correct, the order had not been made by consent, and did not carry out the intention of himself or his counsel or solicitors in consenting to it, and that the plaintiff never gave his counsel or solicitors any authority or instructions to consent to such an order, and he claimed rectification of the said order of the 23rd of November, 1894, or that it might be set aside, and the action of Ainsworth v. Wilding reheard. At the trial Mr. Hopkinson, Q.C., and Mr. Rawlins, Q.C., who had been the counsel engaged for Wilding in the action of Ainsworth v. Wilding, were examined on oath (in their places within the bar) as to what were their instructions and intentions, and gave evidence in support of the above allegations.

Astbury, Q.C., and J. G. Butcher, for the plaintiff.—A consent order may be impeached upon the same grounds as an ordinary agreement: Huddersfield Banking Co. v. Lister, 43 W. R. 567, [1895] 2 Ch. 273; Hickman v. Berens, [1895] 2 Ch. 638, 44 W. R. Dig. 41. The plaintiff's advisers never intended to consent to such an order as the Court of Appeal has now pronounced this to be. Under such circumstances the order will be set aside: Paget v. Marshall, 33 W. R. 608, 28 Ch. D. 255; Harris v. Pepperell, 16 W. R. 68, L. R. 5 Eq. 1. The order was intended to carry out a previous agreement, or supposed agreement, which did not leave the form of the account an open question. If this was not the agreement then there was none, as the parties were never ad idem. The misleading words were suggested to us. We were misled by the conduct of the defendants in the previous negotiations.

Eve, Q.C., and O. L. Clare, for the defendants.—A consent order passed and entered cannot be set aside, except upon such grounds as would enable an agreement to be set aside: Attorney-General v. Tomline, 26 W. R. 188, 7 Ch. D. 388. An agreement can only be set aside on account of a mistake of fact, and there was no such mistake on the part of the advisers of the plaintiff: Stewart v. Kennedy, 15 App. Cas. 108, 38 W. R. Dig. 179; Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland v. Kinder, 6 W. R. 510, 6 H. L. Cas. 798. The construction of a document is not a question of fact: Fry on Specific Performance, 3rd ed., p. 356, par. 765; Powell v. Smith, 20 W. R. 602, L. R. 14 Eq. 85; Marshall v. Collett, 1 Y. & C. Eq. Ex. 232; Denys v. Shuckburgh, 4 Y. & C. Eq. Ex. 42; Hart v. Hart, 30 W. R. 8, 18 Ch. D. 670, 693. Holt v. Jesse, 24 W. R. 879, 3 Ch. D. 177, and Hickman v. Berens were cases where the order had not been drawn up, and they turned upon the authority of counsel. They do not apply where the order has been completed: Hickman v. Berens, Lindley, L.J., p. 646; Harvey v. Croydon Rural Union Sanitary Authority, 32 W. R. 389, 26 Ch. D. 249. The plaintiff has estopped himself from repudiating the order. The order was voidable, not void; and after he discovered its ambiguity he elected to stand by it. He cannot both approbate and reprobate it. He took his chance of its turning out in his favour: Sharpley v. Louth and East Coast Railway Co., 2 Ch. D. 663, 685, 24 W. R. Dig. 62; Clough v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 20 W. R. 189, 191, L. R. 7 Ex. 26, 34; Gray v. Fowler, L. R. 8 Ex. 249, 281, 22 W. R. Dig. 254; Arbib & Class's Contract, 39 W. R. 305, [1891] 1 Ch. 601; Campbell v. Fleming, 1 Ad. & El. 40; Fry on Specific Performance, 3rd ed., p. 341; Scarf v. Jardine, 30 W. R. 893, 7 App. Cas. 345.

Astbury, in reply.—The plaintiff did not elect because he had no other course open to him.

March 25.—BYRNE, J. [after stating the facts]: It is consistent with every word that was said during the case, and is the fact, that in discussing and negotiating as to the nature of the order to be made, the plaintiff and his advisers remained in the belief—a belief induced by the previous correspondence, by the minutes as proposed by the then plaintiffs' advisers, and by the opening remarks of leading counsel for the then plaintiffs—that there was no question as to the form of the account to be taken, as from the date at which the primâ facie amount of the principal sum due under the mortgage was to be deemed settled. Their minds were directed to the question of whether or not the account was to be reopened from the commencement of the transactions between Smith and the Wildings, or whether or not a sum was to be taken as due at the particular date, either finally and absolutely, or subject to a right to surcharge and falsify. I have heard the evidence of the counsel engaged in the case on behalf of Wilding and the evidence of the solicitor's managing clerk and his own evidence, and I am satisfied that they neither agreed nor intended to agree that the account to be taken as from the stipulated date should be taken on the footing of its being a current account with interest charged and allowed at 5 per cent. on both sides, as the account had been made out and agreed between Smith and the Wildings in 1879. I am satisfied that subsequently, during the revision and settlement of the minutes, and up to and after the time when the order was passed and entered—indeed, until after the accounts were brought into chambers—they continued in the same condition of mind.

As regards the meaning and intention of the counsel acting for the then plaintiffs, although I have not heard any evidence from them, I have seen their briefs and have heard the evidence of the managing clerk instructing them, and, although there is one passage in the observations which might perhaps point to the notion that those instructing counsel were willing to take a judgment which would leave it an open question in what form accounts would have to be rendered under it, still I cannot think that they intended to take a judgment bearing any other meaning than that which the Court of Appeal has decided it actually does bear. The judgment is not in common form, and, in respect of the account directed about which the difference has really arisen, it is far from being clearly expressed; and although I know what it means, having the decision of the Court of Appeal to guide me, still I am of opinion that the words used are ambiguous, and so ambiguous as to true nature of the account to be taken that even trained legal minds might well mistake its real sense. Moreover, I think that this ambiguity is not fully apparent upon the face of the document itself, but requires knowledge of other circumstances connected with the subject before it fully appears. A consent judgment or order is meant to be the formal result and expression of an agreement already arrived at between the parties to the proceedings embodied in an order of the court. The fact of its being so expressed puts the parties in a different position from the position of those who have simply entered into an ordinary agreement. It is, of course, enforceable while it stands, and a party affected by it cannot, if he conceives he is entitled to relief from its operation, simply wait until it is sought to be enforced against him and then raise, by way of defence, the matters in respect of which he desires to be relieved. He must, when once it has been completed, obey it, unless and until he can get it set aside in proceedings duly instituted for the purpose. In my opinion there was no agreement between the parties prior to the judgment being passed and entered, their minds never having been ad idem in respect of the subject-matter with which they were dealing. It also appears to me that the divergence of their minds was in respect of an essential or fundamental point. If there was no agreement there was no consent upon which the judgment could be founded, and, just as a consent order may be set aside upon any of the grounds upon which an agreement can be set aside, so it appears to me to follow that such an order may be set aside if it can be clearly proved that there was no agreement, and consequently no true consent to the order made. There was, it is true, an agreement that the judgment should be drawn up in the words actually used, but that agreement was, in fact, only part of and founded upon a supposed prior agreement come to by the parties. When it is once ascertained that there was no actual agreement arrived at before the judgment was completed, and that the consent upon which it purports to be founded never existed, the actual judgment pronounced does not, I think, in itself constitute or represent an agreement, but stands as a judgment of the court made in pursuance of a supposed agreement or consent which both parties believed to exist, but which did not in fact exist. I conceive that this is the true principle upon which the present case ought to be decided, and that the judgment ought to be set aside upon the ground that there never was any agreement or consent between the parties. In so deciding I believe that I am not infringing any of the established rules in reference to contracts and as to parties being presumed to have intended what they have expressed in words, and I think that I have the authority of the Court of Appeal, in principle, for my decision, in the case of Hickman v. Berens. I may also refer to the cases of Attorney-General v. Tomline and Huddersfield Banking Co. v. Lister, both cases of setting aside orders on the ground of mutual mistake. The only difference (if any) between the present case and Hickman v. Berens, in principle, is to be found in the references in the judgments to the fact that in that case the agreement had never been formulated in an actual order of the court. These references do not, in my judgment, mean that that fact would have prevented the same relief from being given had the agreement been duly formulated. It would have prevented the relief being given without an action, and the court would, no doubt, have required the most cogent evidence in a case where so formal and deliberate an act as assenting to judgment, with all the opportunities of settling minutes and applying to the court before completion of the order, had been taken by the party complaining; but, in principle, if the court finds no agreement up to the time of perfecting the order, I think the order itself cannot stand, for the reasons given in the case referred to.

It has been argued before me that, the judgment having been perfected, the case ought to be dealt with as equivalent to the case of an agreement made, which it is sought to set aside on the ground of mistake. Further, it is argued that the mistake (if any) is on the part of one only of the contracting parties, and is not in respect of the subject-matter, but in respect of the meaning and legal effect of the agreement. Dealing with the case from this point of view, I consider that the mistake, although it is not common to both parties, is a mistake in respect of the subject-matter of the contract, and in an essential or fundamental particular, and that, although Wilding was under a mistake as to the meaning and legal effect of the contract, that is not the mistake in respect of which he asks relief, such mistake being that he thought he was bargaining in respect of one thing, while the other parties thought that they were bargaining about another. I also consider that the mistake, whatever it was, was innocently contributed to by the present defendants in their correspondence, in their form of proposed minutes, and in the statement of the case made in court by leading counsel. Whatever is the true view of the case—whether it is to be looked upon as a case of no agreement, or as a case of an agreement entered into under a mistake—I hold that the plaintiff is entitled to the same relief.

Another argument on the part of the defendants was that the plaintiff has lost his right (if any) to rescission or cancellation by electing to stand on the judgment. In support of this contention various cases were referred to, of which I need only refer to Stewart v. Kennedy as the most authoritative and favourable. In that case the contract was clear and unambiguous, and the party complaining had deliberately elected to take his chance of succeeding on the terms of the contract as they stood. But here what else could Wilding have done up to the time of the decision of the Court of Appeal other than he in fact did? The order stood and must be obeyed. I am of opinion that he has done nothing so unequivocal in its character as to estop him from asserting that an agreement had been come to.

HOOD BARRS v. CROSSMAN & PRICHARD. (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Payment of costs to solicitor—Judgment reversed on appeal—Repayment of costs by solicitors—Solicitors' agents.

A solicitor who has succeeded, after notice of appeal, in obtaining payment of his costs from the unsuccessful opposite party under an order which is afterwards reversed on appeal, cannot be personally ordered to repay such costs to the successful appellant. In cases where an appeal is intended and execution is not stayed, application should be made to the court requiring the solicitor of the successful party to give a personal undertaking to repay should the order for payment of costs be reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and A. L. Smith and Rigby, L.JJ.), reported as Hood Barrs v. Heriot (No. 2), 44 W. R. 487, [1896] 1 Q. B. 610.

Judgment had been obtained for £44 1s., debt and costs, against the defendant in the action, a married woman who, under her marriage settlement, was entitled to the income of trust funds for her separate use without power of anticipation.

At the date of the judgment there were arrears of income accrued due, and the judge at chambers made an order appointing a receiver of the income of the defendant accrued due, and payable at or before the date of the judgment, sufficient to satisfy the debt and costs.

The defendant appealed, and the Court of Appeal discharged the order made at chambers, with costs: see Loftus v. Heriot, [1895] 2 Q. B. 212, 43 W. R. Dig. 112.

The defendant's costs of the appeal were taxed, and the London agents of the country solicitors demanded payment. Mr. Hood Barrs offered to pay upon their giving an undertaking to repay the amount if he were successful in the House of Lords. This was refused, and, under a threat of issuing execution against him, Mr. Hood Barrs paid.

The House of Lords afterwards reversed the decision of the Court of Appeal in Loftus v. Heriot, with costs, and restored the order made at chambers, holding that the arrears of income which had accrued due, though not actually paid to the married woman, could be made available to satisfy the judgment (Mr. Hood Barrs had been substituted for Mrs. Loftus previously in the proceedings): Hood Barrs v. Heriot (No. 1), 44 W. R. 481, [1896] A. C. 174.

Mr. Hood Barrs applied for an order for the repayment of the costs paid to the London agents as above stated. This was refused by the Court of Appeal.

The Appellant in person.

Jelf, Q.C., and Macaskie, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Lord HERSCHELL. — In this case, in an action brought by the present appellant—or, rather, continued, I think, by the present appellant—against Mrs. Heriot, the Court of Appeal ordered the appellant to pay certain costs to Mrs. Heriot. On the occasion when that order was made application was made to the Court of Appeal to stay execution pending an appeal to this House. The application was refused. The appellant did not ask the court, if execution was not to be stayed, to require a personal undertaking from the solicitors to repay the costs if they were paid to them. When the case of Hood Barrs v. Heriot (No. 1) came before this House, the order of the court below was reversed, and Mrs. Heriot was ordered to repay to the appellant the costs which he had paid to her solicitors for her. The Court of Appeal was then asked to make an order upon the solicitors, who had actually received the money from the appellant, and who had been the solicitors in the proceedings (being the London agents of Mrs. Heriot's country solicitor), to repay the money. The Court of Appeal declined to make that order: hence the present appeal.

I am of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed. No precedent has been cited in which the courts in England have ever made such an order. Indeed, it appears that search was made by the registrars in the Chancery Division, and there was no trace of any such order ever having been made. In the case of Lydney and Wigpool Iron Ore Co. v. Bird, 34 W. R. 749, 33 Ch. D. 85, an application was made for an order that the solicitors should repay the money, the judgment having been reversed. The solicitors were not before the court; the client only was represented; but it was upon that occasion that the court consulted the registrars as to the practice, and they stated that there was no precedent for such an order as that the solicitor should repay the costs. Cotton, L.J., who said it was impossible to make an order upon the solicitors as they were not before the court, added: "But I do not encourage any application against the solicitors to make them repay the costs, for I think such an application would fail. The order does not direct the money to be paid to the solicitors in their own right, but only on behalf of James Bird, just as if he had given them a power of attorney and the money had been paid out to them as his attorneys." Lindley, L.J., expressed no opinion upon the question as to whether an order could be made against the solicitors, they not being before the court. Lopes, L.J., said: "I agree in thinking that the money was ordered to be paid to the solicitors on behalf of James Bird, and James Bird is therefore alone liable to repay it."

So the matter stands as regards this country; and it is to be observed that nothing is more common than for the court when refusing to stay execution, and allowing costs to be received, to require the solicitor who is to receive them to give a personal undertaking to repay them if on the appeal the order for their payment should be reversed. The fact that such undertakings are constantly required and constantly given is, to my mind, conclusive against the notion that the court has power, when no such undertaking has been required and given, to order the solicitor to repay the costs. If the court has such inherent power without any undertaking, it is nonsensical and ridiculous in the court to require an undertaking to be given. It is requiring the solicitor to undertake to do that which it is said the court can well do without any undertaking on his part. That, to my mind, is almost conclusive against the existence of the jurisdiction contended for, which does not certainly rest on authority, and, to my mind, cannot rest on any sound principle.

It is true that in the case of Fitzmaurice v. Jordan in the Court of Appeal in Ireland, where there had been a difference of opinion in the court of Queen's Bench, and notice of appeal had been given to the solicitors, the Court of Appeal made an order when the appeal had taken place, and the judgment had been reversed, that the solicitor should repay the money. With all respect, I cannot see my way to accept that decision, if it is to be held to cover, as it apparently would cover, such a case as the present. The Lord Justice who delivered the judgment said: "I think there is a precise analogy in the ordinary case where the court orders costs to be paid to a solicitor pending an appeal, but requires his personal undertaking that he will be answerable for the amount"; and he also says: "It seems to me to be equally reasonable that the same risk should be taken where the solicitor levies the money after notice of appeal." That might or might not be a sound law to enact and to make general, but I am unable to come to the conclusion that there is any such rule of law as that a solicitor is personally liable to repay the costs.

I desire only to add this. In the present case Mr. Hood Barrs applied for a stay of execution pending the appeal to this House; but he did not apply to the court, if they were not prepared to stay execution, that they should require an undertaking from the solicitors to repay the costs. I cannot myself doubt that, if that application had been made, the application would have been granted. I say I cannot doubt it, because it appears to me so very clear that it ought to have been granted, if the application had been made, in a case of this description, where the whole controversy arose by reason of the difficulty of obtaining from a married woman payment of an undoubted debt, she interposing these difficulties and sheltering herself by reason of the circumstance that she was a married woman. Where the party to a litigation is a married woman who is setting up and interposing these obstacles, it seems to me to be preeminently a case in which, if the costs are to be repaid, a personal undertaking should be required from the solicitor. No such application was made in the present case; if it had been, very likely this litigation would never have arisen. It is impossible to hold otherwise than that the decision of the court below was correct, and that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion, and, agreeing in every word that has fallen from my noble and learned friend, I do not think it necessary to add anything.

Lord MORRIS.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

Lord SHAND.—I am also of the same opinion. The question appears to me to be one in which an order for the repayment of costs, if such an order had been asked for, should certainly have been granted; but no such order was asked for. When a court does grant an order against a law agent for the repayment of costs, in the event of a reversal of a decision then given, the obligation of repayment arises from the order of the court or from the agent's undertaking given in the terms of that order. When there is no such order or relative obligation, and the party litigant receives the money for the costs, although this occurs through the hands of the law agent, the law agent incurs no personal responsibility for repayment. He has acted as agent only, and his responsibility as such is to his client. Having acted as agent only, I cannot find any legal ground upon which personal liability for the repayment of these costs can be enforced against him by the other party to the litigation; and so, with much deference to the learned judges in the Irish case which has been cited, I am unable to follow it as a precedent.

SOUTH AFRICAN TERRITORIES (LIMITED) v. WALLINGTON. (a.)

Company — Debentures — Payment by instalments — Specific performance of agreement—Damages.

The defendant applied for and was allotted sixteen debentures in the plaintiff company upon the terms that the amount thereof should be payable by instalments, and that the principal moneys secured should be repaid at a future named date. The defendant made default in the payment of the instalments.

Held, that specific performance of the agreement to pay the instalments would not be granted, and that the company was only entitled to such damages as had been suffered by reason of the defendant's default, and that as there was no evidence of any damage, the company was entitled to nominal damages only.

Appeal of the defendant from the judgment of Wright, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The plaintiff company issued a prospectus inviting applications for debentures of £50 each of the company, the money being payable by instalments, and the principal secured by the debentures being repayable on the 31st of December, 1900.

On the 24th of September, 1895, the defendant applied for sixteen debentures according to the form following: "To the directors of South African Territories (Limited). Gentlemen—Having, paid to your bankers the sum of £ , being a deposit of £5 per debenture on debentures of the above-named company, on the terms of your debenture prospectus dated the 21st of September, 1895, I request you to allot to me that number of debentures, and I agree to accept the same or any less amount that may be allotted to me on the terms of the prospectus dated the 21st of September, and I agree to pay the further instalments due thereon in accordance with the terms of the said prospectus."

The terms of the prospectus dealing with the payment of the instalments are set out in the judgment of Chitty, L.J.

At the time of application the defendant paid a deposit of £80, being £5 for each of the sixteen debentures applied for. The plaintiff company allotted to the defendant sixteen debentures, but the defendant paid no further instalments in respect thereof.

The plaintiff company in this action claimed specific performance of the agreement of the 24th of September, 1895, or payment of the balance of the price of the debentures and damages.

Wright, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff company for £520, the amount of the instalments due at the date of the issue of the writ.

The defendant appealed.

Gore-Browne (R. M. Bray with him), for the defendant.—The contract between the defendant and the plaintiff company was a contract by which the defendant undertook to advance certain sums by instalments to the plaintiff company on the terms of repayment at a future date. Specific performance of such a contract will not be granted: Western Wagon and Property Co. v. West, 40 W. R. 182, [1892] 1 Ch. 271; Feize v. Thompson, 1 Taunt. 121; Sichel v. Mosenthal, 10 W. R. 283, 30 Beav. 371; Rogers v. Challis, 7 W. R. 710, 27 Beav. 175; Laird v. Pim, 7 M. & W. 474. The only question therefore is, what damages the plaintiff company is entitled to in respect of the defendant's failure to pay the agreed instalments? On a breach of contract to lend money the damages will not be the sum agreed to be lent, for if that were the case the borrower would be in a better position than if there had been no breach, since, after obtaining the damages, he would be under no obligation to repay the amount. The borrower is only entitled to such damages as he has actually suffered through not getting the loan. In this case there was no evidence of any damage, and therefore the plaintiff company is entitled to nominal damages only.

Bigham, Q.C., and Herbert Smith, for the plaintiff company.—This is not a case of a contract to lend money. It is a contract to buy a negotiable security, the plaintiff company having the right to buy it back at a certain date. The property in the debenture bond passed to the defendant on allotment, and the plaintiff company is entitled to sue for the price.

Gore-Brown, in reply.—If this is not a loan, then the creation of debentures is not a borrowing, and, therefore a company without any borrowing powers could, by the creation of debentures, in effect borrow to any extent.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 12.—LOPES, L.J., read the following judgment: The plaintiffs' claim is for (1) Specific performance of an agreement dated the 24th of September, 1895, for payment of instalments due upon certain debentures of the plaintiff company applied for by the defendant; or (2) payment of the balance of the price of the debentures; and (3) damages. The learned judge has decided the case in favour of the plaintiffs on the ground that the plaintiffs' claim is a debt, and judgment is entered for £520. Is it a contract to pay a specific sum or only a contract to make a loan of money? The defendant applied for debentures according to following form. [The lord justice read the form.] The plaintiff company, in accordance with such request, on the 5th of October, 1896, duly allotted the defendant sixteen debentures of the company on the said terms, and the defendant was duly informed of such allotment. The defendant has paid the sum of £80 under the terms of the said contract, but has not paid any further sum either for allotment or by way of instalment.

If the contract is a contract to make a loan, that that specific performance will not lie is too clear for argument. We must look at the agreement as a whole. Surely in its very nature it is a contract to lend money for a certain fixed period to the company, the payment to be made in the way specified.

On a contract to lend money you cannot sue for the money; you can only sue for damages for the breach of the contract. The borrower may go into the market the next day after breach, and get the money without incurring any loss, or he may not be able to get it without suffering a loss, in which case the measure of damages is the loss he suffers. Chitty, J., puts it very clearly in The Western Wagon and Property Co. v. West, [1892] 1 Ch., at p. 277: "It was contended for the plaintiffs that, on a contract to make a loan, the measure of damages for breach was the sum agreed to be lent, and that the damages were thus liquidated and ascertained. . . . On a contract to make a loan of money, the measure of damages is the loss sustained by the breach, and the damages may be merely nominal. For instance, if A. agrees to lend B. £100 at interest for a week, and makes default, and B., within a few minutes after the time at which the £100 ought to have been lent, obtains from his bankers a loan of £100 at the same rate of interest and for the same period of time, the damages would be merely nominal. Damages recovered are not recovered by way of loan; the plaintiff puts them in his pocket and keeps them. It is really difficult to understand how this argument as to the measure of damages could have been seriously advanced."

I cannot understand how the learned judge in the court below decided that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for £520, the full amount payable upon the debentures up to the date of issuing the writ in the action—that is, in reality, specific performance.

In my judgment the contract is a contract for a loan, and on the breach damages only are recoverable. It appears that 5s. was paid into court, and there was no evidence given of any damage to the plaintiffs. Under these circumstances 5s. is sufficient. The judgment must be reversed.

CHITTY, L.J., read the following judgment: The contract between the parties was that the defendant would lend and the plaintiff company borrow, money on security. It was constituted in this way. The plaintiff company being desirous of obtaining a loan of £75,000 issued a prospectus inviting subscriptions. The prospectus stated the terms of the proposed loan, and the security offered. The loan was to be in sums of £50 secured by first mortgage debentures for that amount, the debentures constituting a floating charge on the whole of the properties and assets of the company, the loan was also to be secured by a trust deed. The money was to be paid by instalments—viz., 10 per cent. on application, 15 per cent. on allotment, and the balance by equal instalments, payable two, four, and six months after allotment. The interest on the loan was to be at the rate of 6 per cent. payable quarterly, and the principal was to be repaid on the 31st of December, 1900, with a bonus of £7 10s. per every £50 debenture. The allottees were to have a right or option to exchange their debentures for shares within two years after the 31st of December, 1896. The prospectus stated that the whole proceeds of the issue would be used for working capital and the general expenses of the company including the cost of the issue, and that failure to pay any instalment when due would render previous payments liable to forfeiture. A form of application for the debenture accompanied the prospectus. The defendant signed one of these forms for sixteen debentures and paid the deposit of £80, being 5 per cent. on each debenture. On this application the plaintiffs allotted sixteen debentures to the defendant, and gave him notice of the allotment. Under this contract the defendant was not entitled to have the debentures delivered to him until he had paid the final instalment. The defendant having made default in payment of three of the subsequent instalments this action was brought. The plaintiffs claimed—first, specific performance of the contract; secondly, the balance of the prices (as they called it) of the debentures; and thirdly, damages.

It is clear that specific performance cannot be granted of such a contract, and it was so held by the learned judge. It is settled that no specific performance of a contract to lend and borrow money can be granted at the suit either of the proposed lender or the proposed borrower. It is immaterial whether the loan is to be on security or whether the loan is to be for a fixed period; and it can make no difference whether the loan is to be made in one sum or by instalments. As regards the claim for the alleged price of the debentures, the contract is not and cannot be read as a contract for sale, the company were not selling their own debentures, but were offering them as the security for the money they were borrowing. The debentures would contain a covenant to repay and a charge by way of security. A loan on the borrower's bond or covenant is not a purchase of the bond or covenant.

By the application form which he signed the defendant agreed to pay the further instalments in accordance with the terms of the prospectus. It was urged that an action would lie on this promise, and that, accordingly, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the unpaid instalments as a debt. But the promise cannot, in my opinion, be isolated from the other terms of the contract; and the promise was neither more nor less than a promise to lend the instalments. For these reasons the first and second grounds of claim cannot be supported.

But the plaintiffs are entitled to recover damages for breach of the agreement to make the loan. The damages in such a case may be large or small or merely nominal according to the circumstances. The measure of the damages is the loss sustained by the borrower by the breach, the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341, being applied when the circumstances justify its application. If the intended borrower, being a man of good credit, can readily obtain the loan from another person on the same terms, the damages would be nominal. If he cannot obtain the money except at a higher rate of interest, or for a shorter term of years, or upon more onerous terms, the damages would be greater and might be very substantial. The burden of proving the amount of the loss sustained rests on the plaintiff. In this case no such evidence was adduced. The sum recovered by way of damages for breach of a contract to make a loan does not constitute a loan. It is merely the damages for not making the loan. A plaintiff is entitled under such a judgment to put the sum into his own pocket and keep it; the defendant could never recover it as money lent or otherwise. The judgment is for £570, the full amount of the instalments due. If it stands, the defendant will be in a much worse position than he would be under a decree for specific performance. Under such a decree he would be ordered to pay the instalments as they fell due, but as a loan he would be entitled to the security contracted for, and he would be entitled eventually to have the loan repaid. Under the judgment he will not be entitled to get back a penny of his money. As there was no evidence of any special loss sustained by the plaintiffs, the damages must be reduced to a nominal sum.

Lord ESHER, M.R., concurred.

Appeal of the plaintiff from a decision of Kekewich, J.

The facts as stated by A. L. Smith, L.J., in his written judgment were as follows: The defendants on the 25th of March, 1896, as beneficial owners, conveyed to the plaintiff in fee a plot of land with a house recently erected thereon, known as Rothesay, Mostyn-avenue, Llandudno, which had windows upon its western side overlooking an adjoining plot of land then belonging to the defendants. In the conveyance was the following exception: "Except nevertheless and reserving to the vendors (defendants), their heirs and assigns, and other the owners and occupiers for the time being of the land shown on the said plan contiguous or near to the piece of land hereby conveyed marked building land, a right of way." There was no reservation in express terms of any right of the defendants to build upon the vacant land. Upon the plan which was annexed to the deed was shewn a vacant piece of land which the plaintiff's western windows overlooked, and upon it were written the words "building land." Shortly after this conveyance to the plaintiff the defendants commenced to build, and had since completed two houses upon their vacant land, and the learned judge found that the erection of these houses seriously and materially interfered with the access of light to the plaintiff's kitchen window, which was one of the western windows in his house. Thereupon the plaintiff brought the present action for an injunction and damages.

It was established at the trial that the plaintiff at the date of his conveyance knew that the defendants intended to build upon their vacant land a pair of houses to the west of his house similar to those already built in the row in which the plaintiff's house was situate.

The learned judge dismissed the action with costs, being of opinion that, although there had been serious and material interference with the light to the plaintiff's window, he nevertheless had no cause of action against the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

Warrington, Q.C., and Badcock, for the appellant.—It is clear from the evidence that there has been a substantial interference with the plaintiff's light. The insertion of the words "building land" on the plan does not prove that the plaintiff was to be deprived of his primâ facie right to the light over the vacant land. The defendants would have had no defence to an action at law for damages for the obstruction of the plaintiff's light.

They referred to Swansborough v. Coventry, 2 Moo. & Sc. 362, 9 Bing. 305; Myers v. Catterson, 38 W. R. 488, 43 Ch. D. 470; and The Birmingham, Dudley, and District Banking Co. v. Ross, 36 W. R. 914, 38 Ch. D. 295.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Rowden, for the respondents.—The use of the words "building land" on the plan negatives the idea that the defendants were precluded from building on their own land as they pleased. The words also showed a "contrary intention" within the meaning of section 6, sub-section 4, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.

In addition to the cases above cited, they referred to Rigby v. Bennett, 31 W. R. 222, 21 Ch. D. 559; Beddington v. Atlee, 35 W. R. 799, 35 Ch. D. 317; Wheeldon v. Burrows, 27 W. R. 165, 12 Ch. D. 31.

Warrington replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 12.—LINDLEY, L.J., stated the facts shortly, and after referring to the conveyance and to the plan, and to the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 6 (sub-sections 2 and 4), continued: The reference to the plan and description in it of the adjoining land as "building land" does not show any intention to exclude the operation of section 6 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, for it was quite possible to build on that adjoining land without darkening the windows of the house conveyed. Consequently the conveyance of the house must be read as if the words in section 6, sub-section 2, of that Act were contained in the conveyance—i.e., as if the conveyance contained the words "together with all lights appertaining to or occupied or enjoyed with or reputed as part of" the house, and as if such lights were conveyed with it. I do not myself lay much stress on these words; they probably add little, if anything, to the conveyance of the house as it was at the date of the conveyance. But from one point of view they may be important, as will appear presently. Having regard to the conveyance and to the foregoing circumstances, I was surprised to find that there could be any doubt as to the right of the plaintiff to enjoy the lights conveyed to him, unobstructed by his grantor. It was quite new to me to have to consider in such a case what was reasonable or not. But so much was made of The Birmingham, Dudley, and District Banking Co. v. Ross and Myers v. Catterson that I desired to look again at those cases in order not to make any mistake. Those cases throw no doubt at all upon the principle that a grantor cannot derogate from his own grant. But they show the importance of ascertaining accurately what has been granted in any particular case to which the principle has to be applied. In those cases the grantor had not sold or conveyed a house built by himself with windows for the admission of light. The house had been built by the grantee on vacant land which he had agreed to buy, and the conveyance came afterwards, when the vendor had no equitable interest in the property conveyed. The question then arose what lights the purchaser was entitled to. In the Birmingham case the circumstances showed that the purchaser had bargained forand had obtained special protection against obstruction, and was entitled to no more, In Myers v. Catterson it was held that the purchaser was entitled to all the light which his vendors could give him, but that they, being a railway company, could not fetter themselves by granting rights to light which would prevent them from exercising their statutory powers and performing their statutory duties.

It was contended that these cases had shaken the law previously established by Swansborough v. Coventry and older authorities. But I do not so understand them. On the contrary, Cotton, L.J., in the Birmingham case, 38 Ch. D., at p. 310, and in Myers v. Catterson, 43 Ch. D., at p. 477, distinctly recognizes the principle on which the older cases were decided. They were also recognized as law in Wheeldon v. Burrows, and Allen v. Taylor, 16 Ch. D. 355, 29 W. R. Dig. 120. Some passages were read from the judgment of Bowen, L.J., in the Birmingham case, which, if taken by themselves and apart from the facts of the case before him, would favour the defendant's view, but he certainly never intended to throw any doubt on the above authorities. If this were a case of an implied grant, and not, as I think it is, a case of express grant, the defendant would still be in the wrong. The grantor cannot throw on the grantee the onus of showing the limit to be set on rights incidental to the enjoyment of the property granted. If such rights are to be limited in favour of the grantor, it is for the grantor, and not for the grantee, to show what those limits are. Even if section 6, sub-section 2, of the Conveyancing Act does not apply by reason of the words "building land" on the plan, I should still hold, on the authority of Swansborough v. Coventry and the older decisions, that the grantee had a primâ facie unrestricted right to light as against the grantor, and that the burden of setting limits to such right lay on the grantor. As the plaintiff does not complain of the defendant's building except so far as it injures him by being nearer than 4ft. 9in. to the boundary-wall the defendant will have the benefit of this limitation of the plaintiff's claims. In my view it is a concession; but in the other view the plaintiff's own evidence may be regarded as the extent to which the defendant has succeeded in limiting the right of the plaintiff to the light of his west windows.

In any event, the defendant has exceeded his rights, and the following will be the proper wording of the judgment:

Allow the appeal and discharge the order. Declare that the defendant was not entitled so to build on his land adjoining the plaintiff's house as to create any material obstruction to the light which came to the kitchen and other windows on the west side of the plaintiff's house at the time of the grant thereof by the defendant to the plaintiff. And the plaintiff not claiming any damages by reason of any obstruction to such windows which would have been caused by the defendant's house if it had been set back 4ft. 9in. from the wall bounding the plaintiff's land on the west side thereof, inquire what damages the plaintiff has sustained by reason of the obstruction of the light of the said windows occasioned by the defendant's house not being so set back, and order the defendant to pay such damages when ascertained. Liberty to apply. Defendant to pay the costs of the action and of the appeal.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., stated the facts as above set out, and after referring to Tenant v. Goldwin, 2 Ld. Raym., pp. 1089 and 1093; Myers v. Catterson, Swansborough v. Coventry, Wheeldon v. Burrows, and Allen v. Taylor, continued as follows: There being this primâ facie right of a grantee in circumstances such as exist in the present case not to have his lights interrupted by his grantor, how when the grantee brings an action against the grantor for derogating from his right can the grantor show that what he is doing does not give a cause of action to his grantee when a material interruption to his lights is established? In my opinion it can only be by the grantor showing that the primâ facie right of the grantee is in some way limited and restricted. The burthen of proof is upon the grantor, and if he does not show that this primâ facie right which the grantee has is in some way cut down, and if a material diminution of the grantee's light by what the grantor has done upon his own land is established by the grantee, the grantee is entitled to judgment. When the cases of the Birmingham, Dudley, and District Banking Co. v. Ross and of Myers v. Catterson are examined, it appears that the above statement of the law is not impugned, and that each of these cases was decided upon the ground that the grantor was able to show that this primâ facie right of the grantee was limited or restricted, or in other words, the grantor was able to show what was the implied obligation which he, in fact, undertook when he sold to the grantee. In the one case, Birmingham, Dudley, and District Banking Co. v. Ross, it was shown that it was perfectly well known to each party when the sale took place that the land was to be built upon by the corporation—i.e., the grantors, as they liked, subject only to this, that there was to be a passage of the width of 20ft. between the buildings of the grantors and the house of the grantee, and that this was the measure of the grantee's protection. In the other case, Myers v. Catterson, the grantors (the railway company) established that the grantee knew at the date of the conveyance to him of his house that the grantors required the remainder of the land for the purposes of the construction of this railway, and it was held that the obligation which the grantors (the railway company) undertook towards the grantee was limited by this, that the company might utilize their land for that purpose, but for no other, and that this was the measure of the grantee's protection. This is what I understand Cotton, L.J., was pointing to when in Birmingham, Dudley, and District Banking Co. v. Ross he said: "But when the question is as to an implied obligation we must have regard to all the circumstances which existed at the time when the conveyance was executed which brought the parties into that relation from which the implied obligation results."

In the present case how does the defendant displace the primâ facie case of the plaintiff, the grantee? If he could have shown nothing whereby to cut down the primâ facie right of the grantee not to have his light interfered with by the grantor, I should have thought that the defendant could not materially have obstructed the plaintiff's light, but the defendant has been able, out of the plaintiff's own mouth, to establish this, that at the date of the conveyance to the plaintiff, the latter knew right well that the defendant was about to build upon his own land, and that all the plaintiff required was when the defendant erected his proposed buildings that the passage should be left unbuilt upon by the defendant between his buildings and the plaintiff's house.

In these circumstances the defendant, by the plaintiff's own admission, has established that his right to build upon his vacant plot was only limited to this, that the defendant was not to build any house substantially higher than those already erected in the row, that he was not to build over the part which was to constitute the passage, and that this was the only obligation which he undertook to the grantee when he executed the conveyance to him. The defendant has shown that the plaintiff's primâ facie right is not an unrestricted right to the passage of light over the whole of the defendant's land, and that the defendant's right to build his proposed houses upon his own land was only restricted as above mentioned. This restriction the defendant has not observed, and consequently he is liable in this action, and in the circumstances of this case the declaration proposed by my brother Lindley is the proper declaration to make.

RIGBY, L.J.—The cases cited in argument before us were cases in which looking to the conveyance alone you find no grant of the easement, interference with which was complained of. The protection of the easement must, therefore, in each of these cases depend upon the doctrine of implied grant. The only case which I think it necessary to examine in reference to this point is Birmingham, Dudley, and District Banking Co. v. Ross, which is hereafter dealt with. The present case belongs in my judgment to the totally different class of grants by construction (not by implication), where the express words of the conveyance when properly construed (regard, of course, being had to the state of circumstances existing at the date of the conveyance) convert a quasi easement into a new legal easement: Kay v. Oxley, L. R. 10 Q. B. 360, 23 W. R. Dig. 251, and Bayley v. Great Western Railway Co., 26 Ch. D. 434, 32 W. R. Dig. 227, may be taken as leading instances of this class; but the decisions with reference to it are numerous and the principle now well settled. In Bayley v. Great Western Railway Co. will be found a clear exposition by Bowen, L.J., of the difference between the two classes. He is speaking of a right of way, but of course his language would apply with at least as much force to a right of light. The words contained in the conveyance in Kay v. Oxley and other cases of the kind are not, indeed, to be found in the actual deed of conveyance in this case, but words at least as extensive are introduced by section 6, sub-section 2, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. It is true that the section applies if only and so far as a "contrary intention" is not expressed in the conveyance (see sub-section 4). Here, however, the only words that can be suggested as expressing a contrary intention are the words "building land" occurring in the reservation of a right of way and on the map attached to the conveyance. Bearing in mind the principle that a grant must be construed in case of ambiguity against the grantor, and the well-established deduction from that principle that a reservation in the grantor's favour not being a reservation of an easement of necessity, must be expressed in clear and unambiguous language in order to be valid, it does not in my judgment need authority to prove that these words, which may be satisfied without interference with the rights as to light enjoyed at the time of the conveyance, are not inconsistent with the continuation of those rights. But the considered judgment of the Court of Common Pleas delivered by Tindal, C.J., in Swansborough v. Coventry, showing these words to be insufficient of themselves to rebut the presumption of an implied contract, is a fortiori an authority for holding them insufficient to exclude the operation of the Conveyancing Act in bringing about an express grant. I have said that the case of The Birmingham, Dudley, and District Banking Co. v. Ross needs some examination. There, as in Myers v. Catterson and in Rigby v. Bennett, the house in respect of which an easement was claimed, was erected not by the grantor, but by the grantee. The grantor, the Corporation of Birmingham, sold not a house, but the site only of a house. It was at the time—not of the conveyance but—of the contract for the purchase of the site, that the rights to be enjoyed with the house when built were determined. The decision of the Court of Appeal was that at that time it was agreed in substance that the corporation were to have the unrestricted right of building on the further site of Warwick-lane which the grantee stipulated should be twenty feet wide. Cotton, L.J., dealt with the question of an express grant by virtue of the Conveyancing Act having regard to this state of things. This decision was, and it is difficult to see how it could have been otherwise, that having regard to the pre-existing agreement no easement over the corporation land on the further side of the lane was ever enjoyed de facto by the owners of the house. From this it followed that section 6, sub-section 2, of the Conveyancing Act, even supposing it to be read at length into the conveyance, had no application. No part of the judgment of Bowen, L.J., except that which excludes the hypothesis of an express grant has any application to the case of an express grant.

It follows in my judgment that the numerous cases of which Kay v. Oxley is a leading instance, in which the quasi easement has been treated as enjoyed with what becomes on severance the dominant tenement, govern the present case. I should have had great difficulty, to say the least, in coming to the conclusion that there was anything to entitle the defendant as vendor to the plaintiff, to interfere more with the plaintiff's lights than if he had been a stranger and the lights ancient lights. However, the very fair and equitable treatment of the case by the plaintiff relieves the court from any difficulty in the matter.

There can, in my judgment, be no question that he is entitled to the only relief which he has asked for, and the appeal should be allowed.

FLETCHER v. NOKES. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Breach of covenant—Sufficiency of notice—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 14 (1).

The notice "specifying the particular breach complained of" required to be served on a lessee under section 14 (1) of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, as a condition precedent to the enforcement of a right of re-entry or forfeiture, must not specify the breach complained of by reference merely to the particular covenant which has been broken, but must give sufficient details to enable the lessee to understand with reasonable certainty what he is required to do to remedy the breach.

Action.

The plaintiff, the lessor, sought to recover possession of certain houses from the defendant, the lessee in consequence of the defendant's non-compliance with a notice served on the defendant under section 14 (1) of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, calling on the defendant to repair the houses in accordance with the covenants in the lease.

The covenant was to "keep the premises in good condition and complete tenantable repair," and at the expiration or sooner determination of the term so to yield up the same unto the lessor, his executors, &c.

There was the usual proviso for re-entry by the lessor on any breach of any of the covenants by the lessee.

The notice served was as follows: "I hereby give you notice that you have broken the covenants for repairing the inside and outside of the houses (describing them) contained in the lease of the said premises, dated the 7th day of June, 1896, and made between myself on the one part and yourself of the other part. And I require you to repair the said houses in accordance with the said covenants forthwith, and to pay forthwith to me £20 as compensation for such breach of covenant and for the expenses which have been incurred by me for surveyor's fees and solicitor's charges by reason of such breach of covenant aforesaid. And I hereby give you further notice that if you make default in remedying such breach of covenant in manner above-mentioned or in making the compensation hereby required I will enter and take possession of the said messuages, dwelling-houses, and premises, but without prejudice to any other remedies which I may have by reason of such default."

This notice followed the form given in Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant, 15th ed., Appx. C, p. 991, and see Wolstenholme and Turner's Conveyancing Act, 7 ed., p. 52.

The defendant, by his defence, said that he had not committed any breach of covenant and pleaded that the notice was not a good or sufficient notice in compliance with section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, as it did not specify any particular breach complained of.

Mulligan, for plaintiff.

Clayton, for defendant, referred to Key and Elphinstone Conveyancing Precedents, 5th ed., vol. 2, p. 258.

NORTH, J., after stating the facts, continued: Is this a sufficient notice? There is nothing in it to show in which house default has been made or whether all the houses are defective. Assume that section 14 had not been passed, and that the law stood as it was previously, and the landlord had brought an action against the tenant for breach of covenant. The first thing that the landlord would have been compelled to do would have been to give particulars of the breaches complained of. I think that section 14 was passed to put the tenant in a better position than he was before. He was to have the chance of doing before action those things which would have been a ground of action against him if section 14 had not been passed. It is impossible to suppose that the tenant was intended to be in a worse position than he would be after action brought. I think the notice under section 14 ought to be such a notice as will enable the tenant to understand with reasonable certainty what it is he is required to do. The landlord need not go through every room and point out every defect, but the notice ought to enable the tenant to do the particular things of which the landlord complains before an action for forfeiture is brought against him.

In my opinion this is not a sufficient notice; it is not sufficient that the notice should merely say, "You have broken the covenants for repairing."

Will—Construction—Tenant for life and remainderman—Conversion of leaseholds—Rule in Howe v. Lord Dartmouth.

The rule in Howe v. Lord Dartmouth, 7 Ves. 137, will be applied unless indications of the testator's intention that it shall not be applied can be discovered from the language of the will. Neither a direction to pay "rents and profits," nor a power of distress on "land" given to annuitants, nor both together are sufficient indications of intention on the part of a testator to exclude the operation of the rule.

This was a summons taken out to decide a question arising on the construction of the will of W. Game—namely, whether the rule in Howe v. Lord Dartmouth, 7 Ves. 137, applied so as to compel the conversion of certain leaseholds to which the testator was entitled.

By his will the testator directed his executors within a reasonable time after his decease to pay all his just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and he gave his wife for life his furniture, plate, linen, china, pictures, books, and household effects. And after a series of pecuniary legacies he devised his freehold house, 40, Cambridge-road, Hammersmith, to his nephew absolutely, and as to all the rest and residue of his real and personal estate, . . . he directed that the rents and profits arising therefrom should be paid to his wife for and during the term of her natural life for her own use and benefit, and after her decease he gave and bequeathed his said furniture, plate, linen, china, fixtures, books, and household effects to and equally between George Game and George Young.

Then the will proceeded: "And as to the residue of my estate, real and personal, I give and devise the same to my nephew, the said George Game, for his life, subject to and charged with the payment of the following annuities (then followed a series of annuities), and on the death of the said George Game, then I give and devise the same, subject as aforesaid, to and equally between his children as tenants in common. And I direct that each of such annuities shall commence from the death of my said wife, and shall be payable quarterly, and that each of such annuitants shall have the same or the like remedy by distress for the recovery thereof as landlords have for the recovery of rent in arrear upon a common demise."

The testator died on the 5th of March, 1889, and his wife, the tenant for life, on the 29th of July, 1896. The residuary estate consisted of five freehold and five leasehold houses.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 8.—STIRLING, J.—This is a summons which raises a question on the construction of the will of Wm. Game, whether the rule in Howe v. Lord Dartmouth applies, so as to affect certain leaseholds forming part of the testator's residuary estate, and cause them to be converted. [His lordship then read the will, and after observing that the testator presumed that the disposition of the furniture and household articles at the beginning of the will gave them to the wife during her life only, and did not treat them as forming part of the residue, continued:] The question is whether the rule in Howe v. Lord Dartmouth ought to be applied as regards the leaseholds. It has been laid down by the Court of Appeal in Macdonald v. Irvine—I read from the judgment of James, L.J.—that "the rule must be applied, unless upon the fair construction of the will you find a sufficient indication of intention that it is not to be applied; the burden in every case being upon the person who says the rule of the Court of Chancery ought not to be applied in the particular case." Accordingly it rests with those who assert that the rule ought not to be applied to point out indications of intention on the part of the testator that the rule should not be applied. What indications were referred to by those on whom the duty devolved which I have pointed out? They were two. The first was the direction that the rents and profits arising from the residue of the realty and personalty should be paid to the testator's wife during her life, followed by a devise to the testator's nephew for life, charged with certain annuities. The second indication relied on is the power of distress given to the annuitants. Now, as to the first point some of the authorities were referred to in the argument, and I have looked myself at others. Certainly the law appears to me to stand in a somewhat singular position. On the one hand it is said that the use of the word rents implies an intention on the part of the testator that the leaseholds should be preserved in specie. On the other hand, it is said that as the testator's estate included freeholds, the word rents is amply satisfied by reference to those, and cannot be relied on as an indication of intention that the leaseholds should be preserved in specie. The point has arisen repeatedly in cases, and in Harris v. Poyner, 1 Dr. 174, before Kindersley, V.C., the Vice-Chancellor expressed his opinion on the point. There the testator gave his residuary real and personal estate upon trust, to pay to his wife for life the net or clear rents and profits, dividends, and annual proceedings and income thereof, and after her death he gave his said real and personal residuary estate term and interest therein upon trust for his son absolutely. The argument in favour of the retention of the leaseholds in specie was based on the use of the word rents, and upon that the Vice-Chancellor says: [His lordship read the judgment from "Though there is mention . . . leasehold estate."] That is a clear expression of opinion on the part of the Vice-Chancellor that the use of the word rents alone was not a sufficient indication of intention against conversion, but he decided in that case that the leaseholds ought to be retained on the ground that in the limitation of the gift to the son, the testator spoke of the term and interest in the property, and the Vice-Chancellor held that the word term indicated an intention that the leaseholds should be enjoyed in specie. In Craig v. Wheeler, 8 W. R. 172, 29 L. J. Ch. 374, both freeholds and leaseholds were devised together, and, dealing with the general rule, Kindersley, V.C., says: [His lordship read the judgment from the words "In Pickering v. Pickering . . . satisfy myself that it exists," and continued:] Later he goes on to deal with the particular case and says: "It was said that although that word (leaseholds) was not used, there were the words messuages, lands, and by the Wills Act lands was sufficient to pass leaseholds in the absence of freeholds, and that the words rents and profits were tantamount to a sufficient designation of leasehold property. This is a fallacy, for the testator had freeholds, and it was unnecessary to resort to the word lands." And it was held that the use of the words rents and profits was not a sufficient indication of intention that the leaseholds should be enjoyed in specie. On the other hand, there were at least three cases before Lord Romilly in which a different view was expressed. One of these is Crowe v. Crisford, 2 W. R. 45, 17 Beav. 507. There a testator gave his freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estates, and all his stock, shares, and personal estate to trustees in trust to receive the rents, issues, and profits, and thereout to keep the houses and buildings in tenantable repair and renew his leaseholds, and then to pay the net income arising from the residuary real and personal estate to his wife for life, and it was held that the wife was entitled to enjoy the leaseholds in specie. Lord Romilly said: "This is not a case for conversion, the current of authority has established the rule that where the rents are referred to the person taking a life estate is entitled to the enjoyment of the property in specie, and besides, the provision as to paying fines for renewal and keeping in repair with respect to the leaseholds shows that they were not to be converted." So far, then, as the decision goes, that case is not in point because the Master of the Rolls did not rely on the use of the word rents, but he does say that a current of authority has established that where the rents are referred to the person taking a life estate is entitled to the enjoyment of the property in specie. The current of authority was not referred to in the argument, and the learned judge does not mention the cases to which he referred, but the learned reporter in a note refers to Goodenough v. Tremamondo, 2 Beav. 513, but that was a case in which no doubt the word rents was used, but there were no freeholds, and Lord Langdale came to the conclusion on the construction of the will that he should be striking the word rents out altogether if he did not imply an intention on the part of the testator that they should be enjoyed in specie. That is not the case with which I have to deal, but I may observe that in the case of Pickup v. Atkinson, before Wigram, V.C., it was held that the use of the word rents was not sufficient to exclude the rule even where the testator had no freeholds to which the words could apply. The next case is Wearing v. Wearing, 23 Beav. 99, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 102. There the testator gave all his real and personal estate upon trust "out of the rents and profits of his said real and personal estate" to pay his widow sufficient for her maintenance; and on her death he devised "all his said real and personal estate" to his children. There are no reasons given for the decision; what the Master of the Rolls said was: "Morgan v. Morgan is a different case. In that case there was a bequest of the personal estate separate from the devise of the real estate in which the word rents was used. This case was referred to in Craig v. Wheeler and not approved by Kindersley, V.C., but distinguished." Lastly, in Vachell v. Roberts, the testator devised the residue of his real and personal estate on trust to permit A. B. to "receive and take the rents, issues, and profits" for life, with remainder over. The Master of the Rolls said: "The word rents being used I think I must follow the authorities cited. Where there is both real and personal estate the expression rents would refer to and include leaseholds as well as freeholds." The authorities cited were Goodenough v. Tremamondo which I have already mentioned, Crowe v. Crisford which was not decided on the use of the word rents but is based on the direction of renewing and repairing the leaseholds, and thirdly Alcock v. Sloper, 2 Myl. & K. 699, in which also there were other circumstances.

I confess these cases make it difficult to say what the true state of the law according to the authorities is, and I must use my own judgment. I am bound to say that I agree with Kindersley, V.C. I think that where a testator makes a residuary devise including both freeholds and leaseholds the use of the word rents is not a sufficient indication on the part of the testator that the leaseholds should be enjoyed in specie inasmuch as that word may be perfectly well satisfied by reference to the freeholds. Then there was said to be an indication of intention in the power of distress given to the annuitants. By this the testator indicated his intention that there should be liberty to distrain on the land, but on what land? I cannot find any indication of intention that that word should refer to the leaseholds. The freeholds afford ample scope for the employment of that word. In my judgment, therefore, neither of the circumstances relied on alone, nor both together, is sufficient indication of intention on the part of the testator that the leaseholds should be enjoyed in specie, and the rule in Howe v. Lord Dartmouth applies.

WILCOX & GIBBS v. JANES. (a.)

Patent — Action for infringement — Discontinuance — Costs of particulars of objections — Certificate — Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 29, sub-section 6.

The plaintiff in a patent action by written notice discontinued the action before the pleadings were closed. By reason of the provisions of sub-section 6 of section 29 of the Patents, Designs and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, the taxing-master refused to allow the costs of the defendant's particulars of objections, because no certificate had been granted as required by that sub-section. The defendant took out a summons asking for a certificate.

Held, that in the absence of information which would enable the court to certify that the particulars were reasonable and proper, the court would not enter upon any kind of trial of the action to obtain such information. That the case came within the provisions of sub-section 6 of section 29, and that there being no certificate no costs of the particulars of objection could be allowed.

Adjourned summons.

The action had been an action for the infringement of a patent. There had been ninety-one claims in the plaintiffs' specification, and to meet these the particulars of objections delivered by the defendant had been of a corresponding length.

The plaintiffs had by written notice discontinued the action before the pleadings were closed, and upon getting the notice of discontinuance the defendants carried in their bill of costs, including those of their particulars of objections. The costs of these amounted to about £160 out of a bill of £200.

Subsection 6 of section 29 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, provides that "on taxation of costs regard shall be had to the particulars delivered by the plaintiff and by the defendant; and they respectively shall not be allowed any costs in respect of any particular delivered by them, unless the same is certified by the court or judge to have been proven or to have been reasonable and proper without regard to the general costs of the case."

Upon the ground that there was no certificate in accordance with the provisions of this sub-section, the taxing-master disallowed the defendant's costs of their particulars of objections, and this application was made by the defendants in the patent action to ask the court to certify that these particulars were reasonable and proper.

A. J. Walter, for the applicant.—The court has power at any time to certify that particulars of objections in a patent action are reasonable and proper. Unless there is such power the defendant might never be able to get these costs where as in a case like the present the plaintiffs by written notice discontinue before the pleadings are closed.

He referred to Boake, Roberts, & Co. v. Stevenson, 12 R. P. C. 228, and Middleton v. Bradley, 43 W. R. 694, 12 R. P. C. 390.

Neville, Q.C., and J. C. Graham, for the respondents.

ROMER, J.—I am very sorry that I am unable to intervene in this case in favour of the applicant; but the Act of Parliament is too strong for me. I cannot help thinking that a remedy might be afforded, either by an amendment of the Act or possibly by some additional rule as to discontinuance in patent cases being made. My difficulty is this—I cannot certify unless I have the materials before me which enable me to make a certificate—that is to say, unless I know sufficient of the case, and what is to be said on one side or the other, to enable me to certify that these particulars of objections are reasonable. Now, as a fact, I have no materials before me, and I cannot have unless I were to enter into an intermediate sort of half trial of the action, and that I cannot do. So to do would be a very bad precedent, and one which the court ought not to lay down. I agree with what Stirling, J., said, if I may say so, in the case of Middleton v. Bradley. I do not think the court is of necessity bound to make a certificate, if it is a proper case, at the trial only; it may do it at any time, but it can only do it when, by reason of some application having been made to it, or some sort of procedure having been taken, the court comes to the conclusion that it knows sufficient of the case to be able to make a certificate.

In the present case I have no such materials, and there is nothing in the present case to enable me to make a certificate. In my judgment it would be a bad precedent, in a case like this, where the case has never come before the court at all before this application, to enter into a sort of half trial of the action in order to see whether or not these particulars of objections are reasonable. As I have said, that I cannot do, and, that being so, I cannot certify; and therefore the application fails.

Summons.

The above-named testator, by his will dated the 28th of July, 1868, appointed executors and trustees thereof and thereunder, and gave, devised, and bequeathed all his real and personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever unto his said trustees upon trust to pay certain pecuniary legacies, and subject thereto and to the payment of his just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, upon trust as to his personal estate, and as to certain specified real estate as therein mentioned, and upon trust to pay over from time to time the rents, issues, and profits of all other his real and personal estate unto and for the benefit of his three daughters, the plaintiff Sarah Y. G. Sheppard, Elizabeth Sheppard, and Mary L. Sheppard, and their issue, if any, per stirpes in equal parts, shares, and proportions during the term of their natural lives respectively and the life of the longer liver of them for their separate use respectively, and from and after the decease of the survivor of them his said three daughters, then to equally divide the principal thereof amongst all and every the children then living of them his said three daughters in equal shares and proportions for their own sole use and benefit respectively per stirpes and not per capita.

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALKY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The testator died on the 23rd of January, 1873, and the plaintiffs were the present trustees of his said will.

Mary L. Sheppard, one of the testator's said three daughters, intermarried with C. Manning and died on the 11th of July, 1880, leaving her two sisters, her husband, and three children, Mary L. Manning, the defendant Charles I. H. Manning, and John H. S. Manning her surviving. Her husband, C. Manning, died on the 6th of August, 1885.

The said Mary L. Manning (the younger) intermarried with the defendant John H. Heard, and died on the 25th of July, 1893, intestate, leaving her husband and one child, the defendant Marie Louise Heard, who was an infant. The said John H. S. Manning died on the 21st of December, 1893, intestate and a bachelor.

The judge in chambers having decided that the three children of Mrs. Manning became on her death absolutely entitled in thirds to her share of the income and rents of the testator's residue during the lives of Mrs. Manning and her sisters and the longest liver of them, the further question arose whether the shares of her two deceased children passed to their heirs at law or to their legal personal representatives respectively.

H. M. Humphry, for the trustees of the will and for the personal representatives of the deceased daughter. This is an estate pur autre vie, of which there is no special occupant, and it passed under section 6 of the Wills Act (re-enacting in substance the 12th section of the Statute of Frauds) to the daughter's personal representative on her dying intestate: Re Barber, 29 W. R. 909, 18 Ch. D. 624; Chatfield v. Berchtoldt, 20 W. R. 401, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 192; Mountcashell v. More-Smyth, [1896] A. C. 158, 44 W. R. Dig. 11.

Baden Fuller, for the heir of the deceased son.—The estate was an estate of quasi-fee, a descendible freehold: see Burton's Law of Real Property, 8th ed., p. 240. Philpotts v. James, 3 Doug. 425, seems to be the English case referred to in Wall v. Byrne, 2 Jo. & Lat. 118, and both those cases are in favour of the heir. The testator has given the whole quasi-fee to the persons designated in his will, and therefore the whole interest passed to them, and it is the same as if he had mentioned the heir as special occupant. The heir, therefore, takes as special occupant, and the Wills Act does not apply. [ROMER, J., referred to Lord Davey's judgment in Mountcashell v. More-Smyth, [1896] A. C. at p. 165.]

A. L. Ellis, for the heir of the deceased daughter.—The principle is the same whether the testator has an estate of inheritance and devises it for lives, as here, or only has an estate pur autre vie, and devises that estate, as was the case in Wall v. Byrne. Wall v. Byrne, therefore, governs this case, and shows that the persons to take here are the heirs and not the personal representatives of the devisee. [ROMER, J.—A special occupant must be a person designated in some shape or form.]

Humphry, in reply.—The devise in Chatfield v. Berchtoldt is not distinguishable from the devise here, and the principle on which that case was decided is conclusive of this.

ROMER, J.—This is the case where the owner of the freehold devises to trustees on trust to pay the income to A. during the life of another. If A. dies intestate during the life of cestui que vie, to whom does the beneficial interest go during the remainder of the life of cestui que vie? In my opinion it passes according to the 6th section of the Wills Act. There is no special occupant in such a case. In order to find that there is a special occupant, the word heir must either be expressly mentioned in the gift or it must be otherwise shown that the heir is intended to take where the gift is by will, but the heir must be expressly mentioned where the gift is by deed. My opinion is, I think, supported by the cases which have been cited for the personal representatives.

Now, as to Wall v. Byrne, whether that case was rightly decided or not, which I need not now consider, it is not an authority here. What Sugden, L.C., says there is this: "Where a man has an estate pur autre vie limited to him and his heirs, and devises that estate by words which, without words of limitation, would pass the quasi inheritance—as the words here would—and the devisee dies intestate, the persons to take are the heirs and not the personal representatives of the devisee," 2 Jo. & Lat. at p. 119, and, assuming that to be correct, it is no authority here. The testator in the case before me did not have an estate pur autre vie. If the English decision referred to by Sugden, L.C., is Philpotts v. James, that case is not in point here either. There a lease was expressly limited to a person and his heirs, the person died and by his will devised his freehold lease to another person who was his heir-at-law, and the court held that the heir of that person was entitled to take. Lord Mansfield's judgment shows the ground of the decision. The words used by the testator there show the intention to pass the freehold. As Lord Mansfield says, "He gives all his freehold lease. It is the same as if he had added 'heirs.'" For these reasons these cases are not in point. I therefore hold that there is no special occupant here, and the property passes to the personal representatives according to the 6th section of the Wills Act.

BROOKS v. RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY. (a.)

Where a picture contains a direct copy of a substantial portion of a copyright work, that substantial portion constitutes an infringement if it is a copy in the ordinary sense, and particularly where the sentiment expressed in the copyright picture has also been embodied.

Motion.

This was a motion by the plaintiff for an interim injunction restraining the defendants from printing, selling, &c., any copies of the Child's Companion containing a certain woodcut which was alleged to be an infringement of a well-known picture called "Can't You Talk?" of the copyright of which the plaintiff was registered proprietor. The infringement complained of was particularly in respect of the figure of a collie dog which appeared in the plaintiff's picture with the figure of a child on a stone floor, having a background of a wall with a door out of which a cat was looking. Above the dog was a table on which was a tub with a spoon in it. The defendants' woodcut reproduced many of the details of the plaintiff's picture. The collie dog in the woodcut was identical in expression, attitude, and position, and was with the wall in the background and the table an exact copy of those in the plaintiff's picture. The only differences between the picture and the woodcut were that in the woodcut the figure of the child had been removed, and in its place two cats and a tortoise had been inserted, while the background and foreground had been increased, and some new details introduced. The Child's Companion was a monthly periodical, and the woodcut in question appeared in the November issue of 1896 as an illustration to a tale entitled "A Strange Visitor." The expression of the dog in both woodcut and picture was one of calm and fixed attention. The defendants stated that they had purchased the block from which the woodcut was taken some five years ago from a man whom they had lost sight of. It was agreed that the motion should be treated as the trial of the action.

The defendants had on the plaintiff's complaint at once withdrawn the publication. The plaintiff waived any claim for damages.

Neville, Q.C., and Knowles Corrie, for the plaintiff.

Levett, Q.C., and Scrutton, for the defendants.—The dog is the only detail common to the picture and the woodcut. The pictorial meaning of the two is quite distinct. The idea conveyed by the picture is not that of the woodcut, and is not within the object of the Copyright Acts as stated by Lopes, L.J., in Hanfstaengl v. Empire Palace, Hanfstaengl v. Baines, 42 W. R. 681, [1894] 3 Ch. 109.

ROMER, J., said that he thought the woodcut was an infringement of the plaintiff's copyright. The principal part, or one of the principal parts, of the copyright picture was the figure of the dog with a particularly sagacious or benevolent appearance. That appearance, together with the form and attitude of the dog, had been copied, and the defendants' dog was a reproduction of the plaintiff's dog. Other portions of the plaintiff's picture had also been reproduced by the defendants. It was not only the dog which was taken, but also the feeling and artistic character of the plaintiff's work. They had taken the design whilst substituting cats and a tortoise for the child in the original. Wherever one found a direct copy of a substantial portion of a copyright work that substantial portion constituted an infringement if it was a copy in an ordinary sense. For instance, if a person were to take an historical picture and take out of it the principal figure and reproduce that figure without the other surroundings, that would be an infringement. The present case was a stronger case, because the defendants had not only taken the principal figure of a dog, but copied as well the sentiment of the picture.

By a society like the defendants what had been done had been done inadvertently. They offered an undertaking in the terms of the application. This he accepted. The defendants must pay the costs.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. DODINGTON. (a.)

Inland revenue — Estate duty — Exemption — Person dying before commencement of Finance Act, 1894—Personal property settled by a will or disposition—Marriage settlement—Power of appointment—Will—

(a.) Reported by RALEGH B. PHILLPOTTS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), ss. 1, 21, sub-section 1.

Section 21, sub-section 1, of the Finance Act, 1894, provides that estate duty shall not be payable upon the death of a deceased person in respect of personal property settled by a will or disposition made by a person dying before the commencement of the Act in respect of which property any duty mentioned in paragraphs 1 and 2 of the first Schedule to the Act has been paid.

By a marriage settlement B. transferred personal property to trustees upon trust to pay the income to herself for life, and after her death to her husband for life, and after the death of the survivor upon trust for such persons as she should by deed or will appoint. B. died in 1883, having by her will exercised the power of appointment in favour of certain beneficiaries. Probate duty was paid by her executors upon the value of the trust funds after deducting the value of the husband's life estate. The husband died after the Finance Act, 1894, came into force, and the estate duty payable under section 1 of that Act was claimed upon the value of the trust funds.

Held, that the case came within the exemption from estate duty conferred by section 21, sub-section 1, of the Act, save in respect of that part of the trust funds upon which no probate duty had been paid by B.'s executors.

Information by the Attorney-General praying that it might be declared that upon the death of William Popham estate duty became payable under the provisions of the Finance Act, 1894, upon the principal value of the trust funds remaining subject to an indenture of settlement of the 16th of October, 1871, and that the defendant, the surviving trustee of the settlement, might be ordered to pay the amount of such duty and interest to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

By the indenture of settlement of the 16th of October, 1871, made in contemplation of the marriage of William Popham with Elizabeth Frances Bailward, widow (which marriage subsequently took place), certain personal property was vested in trustees upon trust to pay the income to Mrs. Popham for life for her sole and separate use, and after her death, in case William Popham should survive her, upon trust to pay the income to William Popham for his life, and upon the death of the survivor upon trust for such person or persons as Mrs. Popham should by deed or will appoint.

Mrs. Popham died on the 10th of August, 1883. William Popham died on the 28th of August, 1894.

Mrs. Popham by her will appointed the trust fund as to part upon trust for William Popham, and as to the residue, subject to the life interest of William Popham, upon trust for her children by her first marriage.

At the date of Mrs. Popham's death the trust fund consisted of India Four per Cent. Stock worth £1,852 6s. 8d., and £1,939 12s. 9d. invested in a mortgage.

Mrs. Popham's executors included £2,855 18s. 2d. as the value of the reversionary interest in the trust funds (after deducting the value of William Popham's life interest) in the affidavit of the value of Mrs. Popham's estate for the purpose of obtaining probate of her will under 44 & 45 Vict. c. 12, and probate duty was paid on the said sum. The defendant contended that by reason of such payment the trust funds were exempted under section 21 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894, from duty on the death of William Popham.

The Finance Act, 1894:—

Section 1.—"In the case of every person dying after the commencement of this part of this Act, there shall, save as hereinafter expressly provided, be levied and paid upon the principal value ascertained as hereinafter provided of all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of such person, a duty called 'estate duty' at the graduated rates hereinafter mentioned, and the existing duties mentioned in the first Schedule shall not be levied in respect of property chargeable with such estate duty."

Section 21 (1).—"Estate duty shall not be payable on the death of a deceased person in respect of personal property settled by a will or disposition made by a person dying before the commencement of this part of this Act in respect of which property any duty mentioned in paragraphs 1 and 2 of the first Schedule to this Act, or the duty payable on any representation or inventory under any Act in force before the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, has been paid or is payable, unless in either case the deceased was, at the time of his death, or at any time since the will or disposition took effect had been, competent to dispose of the property."

First Schedule:—

"1. The stamp duties imposed by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, on the affidavit to be required and received from the person applying for probate or letters of administration in England or Ireland or on the inventory to be exhibited and recorded in Scotland.

"2. The stamp duties imposed by section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended and extended by section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, on the value of personal or movable property to be included in accounts thereby directed to be delivered."

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.

Haldane, Q.C., and Danckwerts, for the defendants.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—The question of the liability of the defendant to pay the duty claimed by the Crown depends in my judgment entirely upon the construction of section 21. [His lordship read the section.] The contention on the part of the Crown is that no duty mentioned in paragraphs 1 and 2 of Schedule 1 of the Act had been paid in respect of property settled by a will or disposition made by a person dying before the commencement of Part 1 of the Act within the meaning of that section. It is common ground that it could not be said under the circumstances of this case that the duty has been paid in respect of personal property settled by a will. But it is said on behalf of the respondents that duty has been paid in respect of personal property settled by a "disposition," and also that that duty is a duty mentioned in paragraphs 1 and 2 of Schedule 1. [His lordship read paragraphs 1 and 2 of the Schedule.] The two Acts of Parliament therein mentioned may be spoken of, the one as the Act relating to a duty in respect of testamentary instruments proper, and the other as the Act relating to a similar duty in respect of dispositions not strictly testamentary, but which the Legislature thought proper to include within the scope of the duty as being dispositions which might have a tendency to evade, and be executed for the purpose of evading, probate duty. It is contended by the defendant that the duty mentioned in paragraph 1 has in the present case been paid in respect of personal property settled by a disposition made by a person dying before the commencement of that part of the Act. Whether that be so or not depends upon what is the nature of the act of Mrs. Popham under which the disposition was made under which the beneficiaries now claim. If that disposition was not a part and parcel of a settlement by a will or disposition then the case would not come within the section; and it is said on behalf of the Crown that the disposition in question was independent of the settlement, and that it ought to be looked at as a mere disposition by Mrs. Popham of property, the disposition of which was left in her notwithstanding the settlement, and as having really no dependence on the settlement whatsoever. It is said on behalf of the defendant that that it is not so, that the disposition must be treated as the exercise of a power of appointment which was created by the settlement, and that if this is so this is property which has been settled by the settlement and that such settlement is a disposition within the meaning of this section. Upon this part of the case I agree with the respondents. According to my view the exercise of the power of appointment ought to be referred to the instrument which created the power, and that is what I understand to have been the decision of the court in Attorney-General v. Chapman, 40 W. R. 79, [1891] 2 Q. B. 526. That case was decided under 44 & 45 Vict. c. 12, s. 38, by which stamp duties are imposed in respect of accounts delivered of personal property, including any property "passing under any past or future voluntary settlement made by any person dying on or after the 1st of June, 1881, by deed or any other instrument not taking effect as a will, whereby an interest in such property for life is reserved to the settlor." The question there was whether the Act applied because the instrument executed under a power of appointment did not itself create the life estate, that estate having been created by the deed of settlement which conferred the power of appointment. Wills, J., said: "But in order that the duty may be payable it is necessary that the settlement should be one by which a life estate shall have been reserved to the settlor, and therefore since the deed of appointment reserved nothing to the appointor, the duty is not payable unless within the meaning of the sub-section the property in question "passed under" the deed of 1843. The expression "passed under" is not a phrase of art in the same strict sense in which "devise," "grant," "estate in fee," "remainder," and a host of others having exact and uniform technical significations would be properly so termed. It is a phrase of a comprehensive nature, and we think it may fairly be used in respect not only of dispositions which are effected by the words of the instrument creating them, but of those which are effected by the subsequent execution of a power created by the instrument in question. A deed of appointment would do nothing of itself, and only owes its vitality to the instrument creating it. It is surely under such circumstances no stretch of language to say that property, the right to direct the application of which is created by deed A., but the specific division of which is effected by deed B., passes under (not by) deed A." It is quite true though, that in the present section the word used is "by," not "under," but I am not pressed by that fact, because Wills, J., was not laying down a new proposition of law, he was merely enunciating, as I understand, a well established proposition. I find it laid down in Farwell on Powers that the execution of a power of appointment must be referred to the deed which created the power.

So, in this case, I think that the execution of this power of appointment must be treated as part and parcel of the settlement, and therefore I think that the argument that this property dealt with by Mrs. Popham by her will was not property settled by will or disposition fails. It is true it was not settled by will, but it was settled by disposition, and none the less so because the power of appointment took the shape of a will. But then it is said that the duty was not paid in respect of the settlement as such, but only by reason of the accident of the exercise of the power of appointment taking the form of a will. That may be true, but the Act does not say that the duty must have been a probate duty paid in respect of the settlement as such; it only says it must be a probate duty payable in respect of personal property settled by a will or disposition, and it seems to me that the case does not the less come within the words of the section, because at the time of the origin of the settlement and independently of the accident of the will no probate duty was payable at all. In my opinion this case comes within the very words of section 21.

Before leaving this part of the subject I wish to call attention to the provisions of this Act, because I am anxious to give a decision in this case which is consistent with the whole scope and intention of the Act. Section 1 creates the estate duty, which is a duty payable, not on estates and interests in property, but on the property itself, passing on the death of the persons mentioned in the Act. Section 2 deals with the property which shall be deemed to be included in property passing on death, and the effect of section 2 is to include not only property strictly speaking, but interests or estates in property, and that has an important bearing upon my decision on this case.

The only other sections to which I need refer are sections 5 and 7. It seems to me that the Legislature has dealt with two possible cases of hardship; first, cases in which the hardship arises in respect of the duty newly imposed by the Act taken by itself; and secondly, cases of hardship arising in respect of persons who have paid duties under the existing law. Section 5, sub-section 1 (b) deals with the one case, for it provides that during the existence of the settlement the estate duty shall not be payable more than once, and I think that section 5 recognizes the difference between the payment of duty on property strictly so called, and on interests carved out of one property by a settlement. Section 7, sub-section 7, also recognizes the same distinction. Then section 21 deals with cases of hardship where the interests carved out of a property have been created prior to the Act, and have taken effect either as duties or by the death of a testator before the Act. In construing section 21 we ought to give it such an interpretation as will make it effective against the hardship which it is clear that the Legislature intended should be guarded against. I do not think that would be so if one adopted the construction of section 21 put forward by the Crown, but the hardship will be prevented if we adopt the construction of the defendant.

That being so, the only matter that I have now to deal with is the question whether any duty is payable here at all. In my judgment the Crown is not entitled to duty upon the whole principal value of the trust fund, but I think that the defendant is liable to pay duty to a certain extent. When the probate duty was paid under Mrs. Popham's will, duty was paid in respect of two-thirds of this property, but no duty was paid on one-third—that is, the amount which was deducted from the capital value of the trust funds. I think that under those circumstances the respondents cannot in respect of that part of the personal property, or that interest in the personal property, rightly say that any duty has been paid, and therefore, in my opinion, the Crown is entitled to judgment in respect of that portion of the property as to which it cannot truly be said that any duty has been paid under those duties mentioned in the first Schedule to the Act.

WRIGHT, J.—I agree, and it is not necessary for me to say more than this, that it being agreed that but for section 21 the respondents would have been liable to estate duty under section 1, the question of the rights of the parties appears to me to depend on the construction which ought to be put on one phrase in section 21—namely, "personal property settled by a will or disposition" made by Mrs. Popham. Section 22 says that "settled property" means "property comprised in a settlement," and that "settlement" means "any instrument whether relating to real or personal property which is a settlement within the meaning of section 2 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, or if it related to real property, would be a settlement within the meaning of that section." That definition is one which it is very hard to understand. Reading the material words of section 2 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, a settlement is "any will or instrument under or by virtue of which instrument" any property "stands for the time being limited to any persons by way of succession."

The question here is whether Mrs. Popham's will (whether you call it a will or disposition does not matter) can be considered as an instrument under or by virtue of which the property would be limited to any persons by way of succession. If it stood alone I should say it certainly could not. It simply appoints the property to her children subject to her husband's life interest; but I think in substance it ought to be treated in a different way. The will is not a simple devise, it is a pure testamentary appointment. It does not purport to do anything but exercise the powers of the marriage settlement. That being so, it seems to me that the settlement not having designated as the persons to take the property, the persons who do take it under the will, it is the will which in perfecting the exercise of the powers of appointment under the marriage settlement makes the marriage settlement operative, as giving an estate to the particular persons who take the estate. It therefore can be said that Mrs. Popham's will was an instrument under or by virtue of which the estate became limited to the particular persons who took it by way of succession to her own estate, not under the will, but under the marriage settlement—that effect, however, being given by virtue of the will. That is the ground upon which I base my conclusion.

Upon the other point I am unable to add anything. I cannot find anything in section 21 which entitles the Crown to say that unless the whole estate has been taxed for probate duty, even though probate duty was not payable in respect of the whole of it, the respondents are to pay afresh for everything; nor can I quite understand the respondents' contention that they are not liable pro tanto for that which they have not paid. Section 21 seems to exempt them only so far as they have paid.

Therefore I agree with the judgment of Vaughan Williams, J.

Bankruptcy—Receiving order—Refusal to make order—"Sufficient cause"—Destruction of bankrupt's assets by bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 7, sub-section 3.

The fact that the assets of the debtor are likely to be absorbed in the costs of the bankruptcy is not "sufficient cause" for refusing to make a receiving order within section 7, sub-section 3, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883:—"If the court . . . is satisfied that the debtor is able to pay his debts, or that for other sufficient cause no order ought to be made, the court may dismiss the petition."

Ex parte Betts, In re Betts, ante, p. 98, [1897] 1 Q. B. 50, distinguished.

Appeal from his Honour Judge Waddy in the county court at Sheffield, refusing to make a receiving order.

The petition was presented on the 26th of October, 1896, and was for the sum of £66 15s., the act of bankruptcy alleged being notice of suspension of payment. The debts ascertained at that date amounted to about £120 owing among four creditors. The assets consisted of book debts to the amount of £20. At the hearing before the county court judge, on the 5th of November, the debtor's solicitor admitted the debt and the act of bankruptcy, but urged that no order ought to be made, because the debtor had offered a composition of 3s. 4d. in the pound which had been accepted by two out of the four creditors, and that £13 had been paid on account of such composition since the act of bankruptcy.

The learned judge refused to make a receiving order, on the ground that the assets would probably be swallowed up by the costs of the bankruptcy, which in his discretion he considered "sufficient cause" within section 7, sub-section 3, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, for refusing to make an order.

The petitioning creditor appealed.

R. W. Harper, for the appellant.—The reason given by the county court judge for his decision does not constitute "sufficient cause" for refusing to make a receiving order, because further assets may be discovered in the course of proceedings in bankruptcy: Ex parte Dixon, In re Dixon, 32 W. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—We think that the learned county court judge was wrong in this case. At the date of the presentation of the petition the debtor was possessed of assets, not large, it is true, but then his liabilities were not large either. The debtor wanted his creditors to accept a composition. Two of them accepted, and were paid; one refused, and presented a petition. Why, then, should there not be a receiving order? The learned judge, basing his decision on section 7, sub-section 3, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, held that there was "sufficient cause" for his refusing the order because the costs were likely to exceed the assets. I can only say that I know of no case which decides that the mere fact that the costs of the bankruptcy are likely to absorb the debtor's assets is "sufficient cause" for refusing to make a receiving order. If such were the law many receiving orders would have to be refused.

It has been urged that the case of Ex parte Betts, In re Betts, so decides; but that is not so. It is true that Lord Esher does mention waste of money in costs in his judgment; but that was not the ground of his decision.

I cannot held adding that, after studying the facts and the correspondence in this case, I think that perhaps assets to the value of more than £20 may be forthcoming.

When an appeal against a refusal to grant a receiving order is allowed, the receiving order shall date from the day of the hearing of the petition in the court below.

Appeal from the refusal of a receiving order by the registrar of the county court at Swansea.

The court allowed the appeal, whereupon

Herbert Reed, Q.C., who (with Burleigh Muir) represented the appellant, applied to the court to make the order as of the date when it ought to have been made—that is, the date of the hearing before the registrar at Swansea. He stated that the practice was not at present settled, receiving orders being sometimes dated as of the day of the hearing of the appeal, sometimes as of the day of the hearing of the petition in the court below.

Meager, for the respondent, did not oppose the application.

The COURT (VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and WRIGHT, JJ.), after consulting Mr. Registrar Hope, decided that the receiving order ought to be made as of the date of the hearing in the court below.

Appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge Austin in the county court at Bristol, admitting the proof of a creditor.

On the 11th of July, 1881, Stock filed his own petition under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, with liabilities of about £4,000. A meeting of his creditors was held on the 8th of August, when they resolved to accept a composition of 5s. in the pound in such rateable instalments or dividends as the trustee of a deed to be prepared should think fit. Stock was to be allowed to continue trading, subject to an inspectorship, and to keep £500 a year for himself before paying any of the composition. A deed was prepared and executed embodying the resolutions, and further providing (inter alia) that if Stock were adjudged bankrupt before payment of the composition it should thereupon become lawful for the inspectors appointed under the deed to declare the same at an end.

The respondents to the present appeal were among the creditors who proved under and signed the deed. Stock never succeeded in earning more than £500 a year, so none of the composition was ever paid, and in 1889 he filed his own petition.

On the 27th of March, 1896, the sole surviving inspector under the deed made an indorsement upon it to the effect that he thereby declared it at an end.

The respondents thereupon proved in the 1889 bankruptcy for £925. The Official Receiver rejected the proof, but his decision was reversed by his Honour Judge Austin.

The Official Receiver appealed.

E. Cooper Willis, Q.C., for the appellant.—The respondents' claim is statute-barred prior to the bankruptcy in 1889, and also is barred because they encouraged people to trade with Stock. The deed was a mere licence to trade, and did not suspend the operation of the Statute of Limitations: Fuller v. Redman, 26 Beav. 614, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 38. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—By the terms of this deed no creditor could sue till default made. Has there been default?] No. But the surviving inspector could not alone determine the deed, and it is still alive. [WRIGHT, J.—Then is not the whole question whether it has been validly determined?] [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—The resolutions in the deed bar the creditors from suing until default, therefore the statute could only run from the date of default: Irving v. Veitch, 3 M. & W. 90.] The respondents cannot prove because the deed is still alive, or, if they can prove, it can only be for the composition at the rate of 5s. in the pound.

Muir Mackenzie, for the respondents, was not called upon.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—In this case it is clear that the county court judge was right. As long as the deed was in force none of the creditors could sue, but now their rights have revived. It is said that the indorsement by the one surviving inspector alone was inoperative; but having regard to the authorities cited in Lewin on Trusts (9th ed., p. 277 et seq.) I have no doubt but that he had power to declare the deed at an end. The deed having come to an end, it is now said that the rights of the creditors are statute-barred. I am happy to say that it is not so. It would be shocking if a creditor's right of action, taken from him by a resolution to which, perhaps, he did not assent, were thus to be for ever lost.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I think it clear that the intention of the resolutions and of the deed was that, upon the deed becoming in any way inoperative, the debtor should thereupon be liable to pay the amount of the original debt. It is right to treat the deed as an acknowledgment which takes the debt out of the Statute of Limitations.

Appeal from North, J.

The plaintiff company were the owners of a valid patent, applicable only to the United Kingdom, for the manufacture of (amongst other things) a dye called "Yellow T for wool." The defendants, Henry Johnson & Co., were drysalters in London, and the defendant Bindschedler was a chemical manufacturer carrying on business at Basle, in Switzerland. On the 7th of June, 1895, Johnson & Co. wrote to Bindschedler at Basle, "Please send us by post immediately 5 lbs. Yellow T for wool." On the 11th of June Bindschedler replied, "In reply to your post-card of 7th inst. we are sending you enclosed invoice for the 5 lbs. Yellow T for wool you ordered, asking you kindly to credit us for the amount, 16s. 6d." On the 12th Bindschedler sent a parcel containing 5 lbs. Yellow T for wool to Niebergall & Goth, forwarding agents in Basle, to be forwarded to Johnson & Co. The dye was forwarded accordingly, without further instructions from Johnson & Co., and was received by them in London. Johnson & Co. then remitted the price to Bindschedler, and paid the postage, including Niebergall & Goth's charges, to the postal authorities in England. It was proved that the dye so sent was of the kind covered by the plaintiffs' patent, and that Bindschedler, when he despatched the parcel, was aware of this. It also appeared that the course here adopted, of sending the goods to a forwarding agent in Switzerland, was the ordinary practice in Bindschedler's work, being prescribed by a standing order.

The plaintiff company commenced an action claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from importing into England, and from manufacturing, selling, supplying, and using in England, dyes manufactured according to the plaintiffs' patent, and from infringing the plaintiffs' rights under their patent. Johnson & Co. at once submitted to an injunction, but Bindschedler contested the action, alleging that he had done no act in England, and that the patent was not in force in Switzerland, where alone he had done anything.

North, J., granted the injunction asked for against Bindschedler, who appealed.

W. H. Upjohn, for the appeal.—The goods were at Johnson's risk from the time they were dispatched by the appellant, or at any rate from the time they left Basle. Delivery, therefore, was complete at Basle. Under section 32, sub-section 1, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), delivery to the carrier is delivery to the buyer. The appellant has never had any control of the article in England.

He cited Nobel's Explosives Co. v. Jones, 30 W. R. 294, 17 Ch. D. 721, 31 W. R. 385, 8 App. Cas. 1; Grainger v. Gough, 44 W. R. 561, [1896] A. C. 325; and Henthorn v. Fraser, 40 W. R. 433, [1892] 2 Ch. 27.

Moulton, Q.C., and W. N. Lawson (J. C. Graham with them), for the plaintiff company.—We admit that the appellant was justified in selling to Johnson at Basle. But here the liability does not depend upon contract, or upon the ownership of the goods. It does not matter in whom the property is, for the appellant, by sending the infringing goods into England, has done an act which ends here. [RIGBY, L.J., referred to Reg. v. Keyn, 2 Ex. D. 63, and Coombes's case, 1 Lea. Cr. C. 388.] The appellant cannot excuse himself by showing that he acted as agent for another person, or that the goods belonged to that other.

They cited Elmslie v. Boursier, 18 W. R. 665, L. R. 9 Eq. 217; Von Heyden v. Neustadt, 28 W. R. 496, 14 Ch. D. 230; Wright v. Hitchcock, L. R. 5 Ex. 37. [RIGBY, L.J., referred to Stephen's History of the Criminal Law of England, vol. ii., p. 12.]

Upjohn, in reply.—The appellant is only an exporter from Switzerland, not an importer into England. If he had sent the goods without any order, and merely on approval, that would have been an infringement, because the property in the goods would have continued to be in the appellant, and the post-office would have been his agents. Coombes's case is explained in Reg. v. Keyn, 2 Ex. D., at p. 103.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 8.—The following written judgments were delivered.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In this case Smith L.J., has prepared a judgment in which I concur.

The conclusion at which I have arrived is that the court has no jurisdiction over the defendant Bindschedler, except so far as he has conferred such jurisdiction by appearing to the writ in order to have the merits of the case determined. If, instead of appearing to the writ, he had applied to discharge the order of this court giving leave to serve him out of the jurisdiction, the court would in my opinion have been bound to discharge such order.

But I proceed to consider the merits. I have come to the conclusion that the defendant Bindschedler has done nothing which amounts to making, using, exercising, or vending the invention of the plaintiffs in this country. In other words, Bindschedler has not infringed the plaintiffs' patent. The patent is confined to this country, and does not extend to Basle, where all the acts done by Bindschedler were committed. It is true that by reason of what Bindschedler did in Basle, goods made by him there according to the plaintiffs' patent came into this country, and no one had a right to use them here. But what the defendant did in Basle was lawful and not unlawful; lawful by the law of Switzerland, and not unlawful by the law of England, which has no application there. This circumstance, and the immateriality of the intention accompanying the act done, destroy the analogy between such a case as this and those criminal cases with which Mr. Moulton ingeniously compared it, and of which Coombes's case is a type. There a man in this country, and on shore, fired at and killed a man out at sea; it was held that his offence was committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty. I cannot think such a case a safe guide for the decision of the one before us. Bindschedler has no agent here for the importation of his goods, nor are they in fact in his possession or under his control in this country. It is true that he may be said to be aiding and abetting abroad importers here; but that neither makes him amenable to our jurisdiction nor makes him an infringer of the plaintiffs' patent. See on this last point Nobel's Explosives Co. v. Jones.

The appeal must be allowed, and judgment must be entered for the defendant, with costs here and below.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question in this case is new, and of considerable importance, and the defendant Bindschedler, who is a foreigner, has submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the courts of this country in order to test the point now for the first time raised. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:] I do not think the device of putting a forwarding agent (in the present case Niebergall & Goth, of Basle) between Bindschedler and the post-office at Basle, advances Bindschedler's case, and I will deal with it as if, in compliance with the order of Messrs. Johnson & Co. of the 7th of June, 1895, Bindschedler had at Basle placed the 5 lb. packet of "Yellow T for wool" into the post-office at Basle addressed to Johnson & Co. in London. In these circumstances the plaintiffs have brought an action against both Messrs. Johnson & Co. and Bindschedler for an infringement of their letters patent in England. Messrs. Johnson & Co. submitted, and an injunction restraining them from further infringing the plaintiffs' patent was granted, and no question arises thereon. North, J., however, went further, and held that Bindschedler had also infringed the plaintiffs' patent in England, and granted an injunction restraining him from, during the continuance of the plaintiffs' patent, importing or bringing into and delivering in England—to state it shortly—"Yellow T for wool" covered by the plaintiffs' letters patent.

Bindschedler contends that he has not imported or brought into and delivered in England the dye, and therefore has not infringed the plaintiffs' patent, and the question arises what, if anything, has Bindschedler done in this country. That he has exported from Basle an article covered by a patent in this country is clear; but has he in breach of the words of the plaintiffs' patent "made, used, exercised, or vended" the article here? for if not, the plaintiffs have no cause of action against him. In spite of Mr. Moulton's ingenious arguments it appears to me that, although Bindschedler was an exporter of the 5 lbs. "Yellow T for wool" from Basle, he was not an importer thereof into England. When he had placed the parcel of dye, which was according to the order given by Johnson & Co., into the post-office at Basle addressed to Messrs. Johnson & Co. in London, he had nothing more to do with it. If it went wrong in the post, if it was lost or burnt during transit, that was nothing to Bindschedler; that was a matter concerning Johnson & Co. alone. All control over the parcel was given up by Bindschedler when it was placed into the hands of Johnson & Co.'s agent at Basle—viz., the post-office there; and I cannot see in these circumstances how it can be said that Bindschedler has imported the infringing article into this country. It was Johnson & Co. who did this by their agent, not Bindschedler. Mr. Moulton admits that if Johnson & Co. by themselves or their agent, had gone to Basle and had there received the parcel from Bindschedler he could not have supported the plaintiffs' case. But he says that Bindschedler was the instrument of sending the parcel into England; that sending infringing goods into this country suffices, and that it matters not from where the goods are sent, nor whether they are brought into this country or not by the foreign manufacturer or his agent; and he says that if a man does a wrongful act he cannot set up agency. I cannot agree with these arguments, and as to the last, as a matter of fact, what wrongful act has Bindschedler comitted at Basle? None whatever. Mr. Moulton admits that the intention of the foreign manufacturer is not the test, and this in my judgment differentiates this case from Coombes's case, which was a case of murder, and which, as Denman, J., pointed out at p. 103 of the report of Reg. v. Keyn (2 Ex. D.), was founded upon the presumption that the intention accompanied the act, and both operated together where the fatal wound was inflicted. Thus, in that case, the murder was committed upon the high seas, where the bullet took effect, though the murderer fired from within the body of the country. I agree that if Bindschedler by himself or his agent had brought the infringing article into this country, or had received it here, he would have been liable, for he would then be in this country by himself or his agent using, exercising, or vending the infringing article. The cases of Elmslie v. Boursier and Von Heyden v. Neustadt show this to be so.

Mr. Moulton's suggestion that Bindschedler's act was as if he had sent the parcel down a pneumatic tube extending from Basle to London is certainly far-fetched, and I think extravagant. If the analogy is to be pursued, I should say that Johnson & Co. in England had sucked the parcel down the tube, rather than that Bindschedler in Basle had blown it down. But the truth is that Bindschedler delivered the goods in Basle to Johnson & Co.'s agent—i.e., the post, and that Johnson & Co., and not Bindschedler, brought them into this country, and thus infringed the plaintiffs' patent here. It is as if Johnson & Co. had taken their cart to Basle and there received the parcel of dye therein from Bindschedler, and then brought it to England. How can it be said that in such circumstances Bindschedler had used, exercised, or vended the plaintiffs' patent in England? My brother North based his judgment upon there being a combination on the part of two persons to hand over in this country (i.e., to Johnson) an article infringing the plaintiffs' patent. Mr. Moulton did not stand up for this, and I do not think he could with success, for, assuming combination between Johnson and Bindschedler, surely all that took place, so far as Bindschedler was concerned, was at Basle and not in England, and what jurisdiction have our courts over a foreigner resident abroad as regards transactions carried on by him in his own country? To grant an injunction in circumstances such as exist in this case would in my judgment be to exercise a jurisdiction over foreigners for acts done in their own country which our courts do not possess, and also would be unwarrantably extending the ambit of an English patent to foreign parts.

We gave leave in this case for service of the writ out of the jurisdiction upon Bindschedler, expecting that it would turn out that Bindschedler was doing something in this country so as to bring himself within ord. 11, r. 1 (f). But, now that all the facts are known, if Bindschedler had applied to discharge the order for service, the court would have been bound to discharge it. He has not done so, but has preferred to appear, in order that the question whether he can be regarded as infringing the plaintiffs' patent, might be raised and argued. It has been, and the result is that, in my judgment, we should not have given that leave to serve Bindschedler, for this court has no jurisdiction over him. The plaintiffs have not shown that Bindschedler has done anything to bring himself within the jurisdiction of the courts here. He has done nothing in this country to infringe the plaintiffs' patent, and therefore in my judgment this appeal must be allowed with costs here and below.

RIGBY, L.J.—In this case the owners of an English patent sue the defendant, a manufacturer of Basle, in Switzerland, for an injunction to restrain infringement of their patent, and for damages. The defendant was served with notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction by the authority of an order of the Court of Appeal. He, however, appeared, and did not move to discharge the order, electing to defend the action on its merits. No question, therefore, was raised before the court as to the propriety of the service out of the jurisdiction, and the action has to be tried as though the defendant, being found within the jurisdiction, had been served here with the writ. The peculiarity of the case is that, as the patentee's rights arise only within the territorial limits of his patent, there can be no infringement outside those limits; and in order to succeed the plaintiff must show that in point of law the defendant did something in England amounting to an infringement.

In my judgment the short but most important point which the case raises is, whether a man who posts at a foreign post office (in this case that of Basle) a parcel addressed to a trader in London, the carriage of which through England for delivery and the delivery of which in London for trade purposes amounts to an infringement of the plaintiffs' patent by the person causing such carriage and delivery, is so responsible for the carriage and delivery in England as to be liable to be treated as an infringer of the patent. It seems to me that in an action against the sender the patentee has nothing to do with the questions whether other persons may be infringers of the patent or not; whether the person posting the parcel did so as agent for someone else, or as a principal acting on his own account; whether he is or is not the owner of the parcel at or after the posting; whether he sends it in the fulfilment of an order, or only on approval or offer; whether he does or does not retain any control of the parcel after the posting; whether he pays the postage or leaves it to be paid on delivery in London; in short, the nature and consequences of the act done can alone be taken into account. Everything else is matter of indifference to the patentee, with which he need not concern himself. If the sender is a wrongdoer he cannot defend himself by saying that the wrongful act was done by him by the direction, in the interest, or with the property of another. Nor can he protect himself from liability for the consequences of his act by any instructions given by him to, or by any arrangement made by him with, a third person. The one fact which remains unaltered, among the numerous possible variations which may arise from the contract, is the act done (in this case the posting of the parcel). The sender, by the posting, makes it inevitable as a matter of business that the parcel will in due time, by the merely ministerial action of the postal authorities called into play by the sender, be carried into and through England to London, and thereby delivered. If what the sender does, amounts to an infringement of the patent he is responsible as a principal actor to the patentee. He does not aid or abet an infringement, but actually infringes. No other person (postal officers excepted) does any act which in any way forwards or assists the getting of the parcel to London or its delivery there. I cannot distinguish sending by post, as regards the legal effect of it, from a sending by a special messenger employed for the purpose. Any agreement between the parties that the messenger shall not treat himself as agent for the sender, but shall look to the consignee only for payment, would seem to me to be irrelevant and immaterial. No such agreement can alter the fact that the messenger does carry through England and deliver in London because he got a commission to do so from the sender, whatever the terms in which that commission may be worded. If the messenger is simply hired and paid by the sender it seems to me clear that the sender is in the same position legally as if he carried and delivered the parcel himself. If the principle above enunciated be sound, that no agreement with a third person can alter, as regards the patentee, the legal effect of the act done by the sender, then the delivery of the parcel with a commission to carry and deliver it in London makes the carriage throughout, and the delivery, that of the sender. Basle is a long way from England, and the English Channel separates England from the Continent, and has to be crossed by the parcel. But other countries, like England and Scotland, have for boundary in some places an imaginary line only, and when we are endeavouring to obtain a test of the legal effect of an act which causes a parcel to cross the boundary, it is perfectly legitimate to examine instances which might occur at such a boundary. I will take the case of a manufacturer who in order to fulfil an order throws parcels over the boundary to his customer, or, what is more likely to occur in practice, places the parcels on one end of an inclined plane or shoot crossing the boundary, and allows them to slide by the force of gravity down the shoot across the boundary into the adjacent country, to be taken by the customer at the other end. These cases appear to me to be, in their legal aspect, similar to a sending by post. It is quite as easy to attribute to the sender liability for the acts of the human agency which he has called into operation in the one, as for the natural forces called into play by him in the others. The only physical act done by the sender is in each case done in the country where the transaction commences, which I will call the foreign country. But the necessary conequence of that act is that the parcel passes the boundary, and travels for some longer or shorter space through the other, which I will call the patentee's country. Whether anything is in law done in the patentee's country by the person who starts the parcel has to be determined, as it seems to me, in the same way in each case. After the initial act which starts the parcel on its journey the sender has no control over the parcel. But that act in each case causes the parcel to cross the boundary and continue its journey through the patentee's country, and that continuance of the journey in the patentee's country seems to me to be as much attributable in law to the sender as the initial act of starting the parcel. But it seems to me also to involve a something done by the sender, not in the foreign country, but in the patentee's country, attracting the jurisdiction of the courts of that country. I have taken the instance of a manufacturer throwing a parcel or letting it fall down a shoot across the boundary, because I think there is a very important authority which in such a case decides the liability of the starter of the parcel —that is Coombes's case, where it was decided that if a pistol be fired from the land at the distance of a hundred yards from the sea and a man is maliciously killed in the water a hundred yards from the shore, the offender shall be tried by the Admiralty jurisdiction, on the ground that the offence is committed where the act takes effect. This establishes the responsibility for the consequences in one jurisdiction of an act done in another, though the offender himself never crosses the boundary.

This case was much discussed in Reg. v. Keyn—the Franconia case. All the judges who dealt with that case agreed that it was rightly decided, though they differed as to the application of it to the Franconia case. Cockburn, C.J. (at p. 233), thus deals with the case: "We have in this instance not the case of the blow or wound in one jurisdiction and the death in another, but as in R. v. Coombe one in which the act causing the death begins in one jurisdiction and extends into another, in which it inflicts the blow or wound from which, as its cause, death ensues. When a man strikes a blow with a club, or inflicts a wound by the thrust of a sword or the stab of a knife, or blows out another's brains by putting a pistol to his head, the act takes effect immediately. If he hurls a stone or discharges a bullet from a gun or pistol at another person at a distance, the instrument he uses passes from him; the stone or bullet, having left his hand, has to make its way through a given space before it strikes the blow it is intended to inflict. But the blow is as much the act of him who casts the stone, or fires the gun, as though it had taken effect immediately. In such a case the act, in lieu of taking effect immediately, is a continuing act until the end has been effected—that is, till the missile has struck the blow—the intention of the party using it accompanying it throughout its course. The act must be taken to be the act of the party in the effects it was intended to produce, till its agency has become exhausted and its operation has ceased. When, therefore, a person, being in one jurisdiction, fires a shot at a person who is in another, as was the case in R. v. Coombe, it may well be held that the blow struck by the bullet is an act done in the jurisdiction in which the bullet takes effect." And, further, he says, "It is enough for the present purpose to say that R. v. Coombe was rightly decided, and I think the same principle would apply where the master of a vessel purposely ran down another, and by so doing caused the death of a person on board." It is true that the learned judge afterwards distinguished Coombes's case from that of The Franconia, but that was on the ground that the offender was a foreigner on a foreign ship on the high seas, who could not be liable to our English criminal law at all. Apply this, mutatis mutandis, to the sender of a parcel, whether it be thrown by hand, allowed to slide down an inclined plane, or sent by post. His act is a continuing act until the end has been effected—that is, until the parcel has been carried through England to London and delivered there. That part of its operation is done within the jurisdiction of the patentee's country (say, as in this case, England), and is a tort committed there, for which the wrongdoer can be sued in the English courts if he comes to England for any reason, whether independently of the acts complained of or for the purpose of justifying them, and to prevent the repetition of which, if it be threatened or justified, an injunction may be granted. I have dealt only throughout with the sender by post, since I hold the defendant liable in the same way as if he had posted with his own hands, notwithstanding the ingenious way in which he has tried to escape from responsibility. It was by reason of his directions that the forwarding agents posted the parcel. They acted on those directions without waiting for instructions from London, and the evidence shows that they were intended by the defendant to do so. On this part of the case I have nothing to add to what was said by North, J., in the court below, in which I entirely concur. In my judgment North, J.'s, decision ought to be affirmed.

Appeal of the vendors on a summons taken out by them under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, from a decision of North, J.

The vendors of real estate derived title under a voluntary settlement executed by a prior owner in March, 1896.

The purchaser objected that, by reason of section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the vendors could not make a good title.

North, J., held that, in view of the conflicting decisions of In re Briggs & Spicer, 39 W. R. 377, [1891] 2 Ch. 127; In re Vansittart, 41 W. R. 286, [1893] 2 Q. B. 377; and In re Brall, 41 W. R. 623, [1893] 2 Q. B. 381, the title was too doubtful to force on a purchaser, and dismissed the summons.

The vendors appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Borthwick, for the appellants.—There is no suggestion of fraud on creditors or any act of bankruptcy. The true meaning of the word "void" in section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act is "liable to be avoided," and the title of the trustee in bankruptcy will not relate back to the date of the voluntary settlement, but only to the date of his appointment. If it were not so, this estate of 170 acres could not be disposed of for a period of ten years, and would be unsaleable. The Voluntary Conveyances Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 21) puts an end to the class of cases represented by Doe v. Martyr, 1 B. & P. (N. R.) 332. There is nothing in the language of the section or in the general principles of the law to prevent a person dealing with his interest under a voluntary settlement.

Eustace Smith, for the respondent. — The word "void" means "void ab initio," and the section gives no protection to anybody. The settlement is a link in the chain of title, and, the settlement being void, the vendors have no right to sell.

No reply was called for.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question is this. Some gentlemen who own some real property under a voluntary settlement have agreed to sell it for value to a purchaser, and the purchaser says, "You may become bankrupt either within two years or within ten years for anything I know, and if I complete I shall not have a good title, because your trustee, if you have one, will be able to upset your settlement, and will upset the conveyance to me." That is a very formidable objection if there is anything in it; and one cannot say there is nothing in it, because the question has arisen already, and Stirling, J., in the case referred to of In re Briggs v. Spicer has held that the objection was so serious that he could not force a title on the purchaser. On the other hand, Vaughan Williams, J., who has not had to consider it from that point of view, has considered that the purchasers do get a good title.

The question really turns on the true construction of section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. That section, first of all, deals with a settlement, including any conveyance or transfer of property; and if you turn to section 168 you find a definition of "property," and the definition is naturally wide, and covers property of every description. Therefore this section 47, according to its terms, hits a conveyance or transfer of property of any sort. I will read it. "Any settlement of property"—with some exceptions which I will pass over—"shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt within two years after the date of the settlement, be void against the trustee in the bankruptcy, and shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt at any subsequent time within ten years after the date of the settlement, be void against the trustee in bankruptcy, unless the parties claiming under the settlement can prove that the settlor was at the time of making the settlement able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement, and that the interest of the settlor in such property had passed to the trustee of such settlement on the execution thereof." Looking at that section with no more than ordinary care, you first find that the section does not say that these settlements are to be void generally, but that they shall be void against the trustee in bankruptcy, which is a totally different thing. You must ask yourself, how can a settlement be void against the trustee in bankruptcy until there is one against whom it can be void. The force of that remark leads to this question, void as from what time? That is the whole controversy. The section does not say a word about it. You must look at it with reference to the language and the kind of transaction with which the section deals. Looking at the language only I should say that when any enactment says a settlement shall be void against the trustee in bankruptcy, it does not say it shall be void until there is a trustee in bankruptcy. Let us look at the consequences if the other result is arrived at. The consequences are that nothing which comes under the description of settlement here — no conveyance or transfer of property — can ever be made by anybody if that conveyance or transfer is what is called voluntary, that is to say, without consideration. Just conceive what that means. Suppose a father gives his son a horse or some money in the funds. Of course the father may become bankrupt within two years or within ten; the son cannot deal with that horse or give a good title to it for money or otherwise for two or ten years. That cannot be the meaning of it; and you cannot get that out of the section unless you construe the words "void against the trustee in the bankruptcy" as meaning void from the date of the transaction which is referred to. I cannot get that out of my mind. Good sense is shocked by such a startling construction as that.

It appears to me that is the true method of construing this section. The view I have taken has been taken not only by Vaughan Williams, J., but by the Queen's Bench Division in In re Holden. There the point arose very neatly. There had been a good deal of litigation between the settlor and the trustees of the settlement, and the trustees had incurred some costs of which the settlor tried to evade payment. The settlor became bankrupt, and the trustee in bankruptcy claimed the property from the trustees of the settlement. The trustees of the settlement said what was obvious, that these costs, charges, and expenses were incurred before the trustee in bankruptcy came in; and the court held that the trustees of the settlement had a lien upon the property for these costs. There is nothing in the Act to carry the title of the trustee in bankruptcy back to the date of the settlement. That this is the true construction appears to be very much fortified by the fact that you do not find in section 47 any clause similar to sub-section 2 of section 48, which is: "This section shall not affect the rights of any person making title in good faith and for valuable consideration through or under a creditor of the bankrupt." If my construction is right, you do not want it. It would be a strong mode of legislation to say that you can impeach a settlement from the date of its execution, even as against bonâ fide purchasers for value without notice. Such a legislation would be at variance with the whole spirit of the bankruptcy law ever since we have had one. I have no doubt that Vaughan Williams, J., was perfectly correct, and that in a case like this every bonâ fide purchaser gets a good title. I am of opinion that the purchaser in this case will get a perfectly good title.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I come at once to the statute, and the sole point is, What is the true meaning of section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883? Having heard the case argued on both sides, I have not the slightest doubt what is the true construction of that section. I read it in this way: Any settlement of the property shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt within two years after the date of the settlement, be void against the trustee in bankruptcy. Void from when? That is the point and the matter which has to be determined. On one side it is said it is void ab initio—void from the date of the settlement. Where do you find that? The words are not there. There are other words which point in the contrary direction, and those are the words "void as against the trustee in bankruptcy." What do they mean? They mean void as against the trustee in bankruptcy from the date of the accruer of his title—or, in other words, void as from the act of bankruptcy, to which the title of the trustee relates back. That, in my judgment, is the construction of that branch of the section. Then it goes on, "and shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt at any subsequent time within ten years after the date of the settlement, be void against the trustee in bankruptcy"—exactly the same words again, except that the period is enlarged from two to ten years—"unless the parties claiming under the settlement can prove that the settlor was, at the time of making the settlement, able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement, and that the interest of the settlor in such property has passed to the trustee of such settlement on the execution thereof." I must say that I disagree with my brother Stirling that the meaning of the words "unless the parties claiming under the settlement" include purchasers from the volunteer. I think the meaning of these words in this clause is, unless the parties claiming under the settlement—that is, the volunteers—when their deed is impeached during the period of ten years, can show that their settlor was solvent, and so get rid of the claim of the trustee. Reading the section in that way, as has been pointed out by Lindley, L.J., and Vaughan Williams, J., it is unnecessary to put sub-section 2 of section 48 into section 47, excepting from the operation of the section bonâ fide purchasers in good faith and for valuable consideration. If it is to be read as Mr. Eustace Smith asks us to read it, it is manifest that that sub-section ought to have been put in, because it never was the intention of the Legislature that bonâ fide purchasers for value should have their title impeached by what they have done in good faith. It would be contrary to all the provisions of the bankruptcy law; although, if the other construction is the right one, I think that sub-section 2 would have been inserted. For these reasons I prefer my brother Vaughan Williams' construction to the construction of my brother Stirling.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In construing this Act we must, of course, look, in the first place, to the exact way in which the enactment is expressed. In a certain contingency—that is, of bankruptcy—happening to a voluntary settlor a voluntary settlement shall be void as against the trustee in bankruptcy. It is impossible to construe that as meaning that it shall be void for all intents and purposes in favour of the trustee in bankruptcy. It is impossible to treat that as avoiding the settlement from the date of it, in favour of the trustee in bankruptcy, with the result, which would appear to follow, that the trustee might have an account of all rents received, that he might follow the money into the hands of any person who had got it, if it were money, or the land, if it were land. Of course in all these cases they would know of the Act of Parliament; but it is quite possible they might not know of the voluntary settlement. In all cases in which they did—and that would practically extend to all cases of real estate—they would know that this section might apply, and they would know they were running the risk. I do not think it possible that the Legislature, which has taken such pains in all other matters to protect the rights of innocent dealers, should have left a perfectly innocent voluntary settlement entirely without protection in the event of the bankruptcy within two years or ten, as the case may be, of the settlor. I think we must construe that as meaning that the voluntary settlement shall not stand in the trustee's way; that that alone shall not exclude him from laying his hands upon any property comprised in it, so that if the person in possession has no other title than that which is given by the voluntary settlement, that title will not avail him against the trustee. I think the reasonable construction is this, that anything that has been done under the settlement shall be treated as before; that if rents have been paid there can be no account of them; or if, going to the extreme, the property has been sold out and out in a bonâ fide way for valuable consideration, the trustee cannot go against the purchaser at all.

It appears to me that is the logical result of the decision in Re Holden. I think it is the fair result of the section itself. But, if once we admit that Re Holden was correctly decided, I do not see where we can stop. I have not the slightest doubt in my own mind that Re Holden was correctly decided, and it comes to this, that every equity which has been acquired before the bankruptcy or the act of bankruptcy, which is the beginning, is to be respected, and is not in any way interfered with or hit by section 47. In that particular case the specific question was whether the trustees, who had defended an action by the settlor and had become entitled to the costs of the litigation, and who, according to the ordinary rules of equity with regard to a valid settlement, were entitled to a lien on the property for those costs, if, as happened there, the settlor could not pay them, the specific question was whether the trustees were disentitled to these costs. Of course they could have had no such claim if the trustee in bankruptcy could go behind their title. What were the trustees? They were only persons who claimed under the voluntary settlement. I do not see that their position can be better than that of purchasers. They claimed, of course, not as volunteers, but as purchasers in the wide sense of the word, under the voluntary settlement; and if one set of purchasers is to be protected I fail to see how you can draw the line, and how you can say another set of purchasers out and out, or mortgagees, or any persons who on the faith of a settlement which at the time of dealing with them was a valid settlement, are not to be protected when they acted on the right assumption that it was valid and paid their money.

I do not think it is necessary to go into the earlier cases, but at any rate they show to what an alarming extent we should be altering the position of persons dealing with voluntary settlors on the strength of a section of an Act which does not truly bear the interpretation sought to be put on it.

In the course of proceedings to set aside an award on the ground of misconduct of an arbitrator an affidavit was sworn by the arbitrator for the purpose of being used by the party in whose favour the award had been made. The affidavit was not filed, but a copy of it was handed to the other party. It contained a reference to certain letters. On an application for inspection of the letters,

Held, that the case was within ord. 31, r. 15, and that there was power to make an order for inspection under rule 18.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from an order of Lawrance, J., at chambers.

A dispute between the two parties, Fenner and Lord, having been referred to arbitration, an award was made by two arbitrators appointed by the parties respectively, in favour of Fenner. Lord gave notice of motion to the Queen's Bench Division to set aside the award on the ground of misconduct on the part of the arbitrator appointed by Fenner. An affidavit was made by the arbitrator whose conduct was impugned for the purpose of being used by Fenner on the hearing of the motion. Fenner's solicitors sent a copy of this affidavit to Lord. The affidavit contained a reference to certain letters which had passed between Fenner's solicitors and the arbitrator.

The affidavit not having yet been filed, Lord took out a summons under ord. 31, r. 18, for inspection of the letters referred to therein.

Lawrance, J., refused to make an order for inspection.

Lord appealed.

Boxall, for the appellant.—The appellant is clearly entitled to inspection of these letters under ord. 31, r. 15, and the learned judge ought to have made an order under rule 18.

Channell, Q.C., and C. E. Jones, for the respondent.—These letters do not come within rule 15, which allows inspection of documents which are referred to in pleadings or affidavits. The word "affidavits" in this rule must mean filed affidavits, and does not include mere copies of affidavits, which may or may not be used. It was a pure matter of courtesy that we sent them a copy of this affidavit, and it will be for counsel to determine whether it shall in fact be used. Rule 18, under which this application is made, is quite apart from rule 15, and does not cover this case.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case an award has been made by arbitrators, and it is binding on both the parties unless something improper has been done such as to justify the court in setting it aside. It is alleged that there has been misconduct on the part of one of the arbitrators such as to make the award void. In the course of the dispute as to whether the award is binding or not, the parties have made affidavits, and an affidavit has been sworn by the inculpated arbitrator, which the party in whose favour the award was made desires to use for the purpose of showing that the arbitrator has not in fact been guilty of any misconduct. He is not bound by law or by custom to show this affidavit to his opponent until he uses it, but, as a matter of courtesy, and in my opinion quite properly, he has handed a copy of it to the other side, though it has not yet been filed. In the affidavit is a reference to certain letters. The question is whether that reference gives authority to the judge to order inspection of the letters.

I am of opinion that the case comes within the words of ord. 31, r. 15, which says that "every party to a cause or matter shall be entitled at any time by notice in writing to give notice to any other party, in whose pleadings or affidavits reference is made to any document, to produce such document for the inspection of the party giving such notice." This is a cause or matter, and an affidavit has been made for the purpose of being used at the hearing. It is said that it depends on the discretion of counsel whether it is in fact used. But I think the words of the rule are wide enough to include affidavits which are intended to be used. In my opinion rule 17 includes documents mentioned in rule 15, and rule 18 says that if the party served with notice under rule 17 objects to give inspection, as is the case here, a judge may make an order for inspection. I think such order ought to have been made in this case, and our order must be that the letters referred to in this affidavit be produced for inspection.

CHITTY, L.J.—Rules 15 to 18 of order 31 deal with inspection of documents referred to in affidavits. In this case certain letters are sufficiently referred to in an affidavit, and I think the party applying is entitled to an order. Rule 18 gives the judge discretion, but in my opinion that discretion ought to have been exercised in favour of the applicant. I think that rule 18 applies to documents which are within the words of rule 15.

Arbitration—Contract—Master and servant—Arbitration clause—Wrongful dismissal—Stay of proceedings—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 4.

By a contract in writing the defendants agreed to employ the plaintiff for five years, but it was provided that the defendants might at any time dismiss the plaintiff if he were guilty of gross misconduct. It was also provided that any dispute should be referred to arbitration. Held, that the action ought to be stayed under section 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889.

Davis v. Starr, 37 W. R. 481, 41 Ch. D. 242, distinguished.

Appeal from an order of Day, J., at chambers.

By a contract of employment made in writing between the plaintiff and the defendants, the defendants agreed to employ the plaintiff, and the plaintiff agreed to serve the defendants, as their managing engineer, for five years. It was provided that the defendants might at any time dismiss the plaintiff if he were guilty of gross misconduct. It was also provided that if any difference or dispute should arise between the defendants and the plaintiff touching their or his rights or liabilities under the contract, it should be referred to arbitration.

The defendants having dismissed the plaintiff for alleged misconduct, the plaintiff brought an action for wrongful dismissal.

On the application of the defendants, Day, J., acting under section 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, stayed the action, and ordered the dispute between the parties to be referred to arbitration in accordance with the terms of the contract.

The plaintiff appealed.

Bigham, Q.C., and Schiller, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff's cause of action is not within the terms of the arbitration clause of the contract. The defendants, by dismissing the plaintiff, have put an end to the whole contract including the arbitration clause, which therefore now has no operation. The plaintiff's only remedy is an action for damages. Davis v. Starr, 37 W. R. 481, 41 Ch. D. 242, shows that in such a case as this the court will not stay an action for wrongful dismissal. It was a condition precedent to the defendants' right to dismiss the plaintiff that they should obtain an award under the arbitration clause finding him guilty of misconduct.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Dickens, Q.C., and R. Younger, for the defendants.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case there is a contract of service, by which the defendants agree that they will employ the plaintiff for five years unless he is guilty of gross misconduct, and it is the duty of the plaintiff to remain in the defendants' employment for the specified time. If either party breaks from their undertaking, it is of course a breach of contract, and no doubt a wrongful dismissal is a breach of contract. The contract goes on to provide that, if any dispute arises between the parties touching their rights or liabilities under the contract, it shall be referred to arbitration. The question is whether an action by the plaintiff for wrongful dismissal should be stayed, and an order made referring the dispute between the parties to arbitration. It seems to me there could be no doubt on the matter if it were not for the case of Davis v. Starr. I have a difficulty in understanding that case, but at any rate it is distinguishable from the present case. There Lindley, L.J., said: "It seems to me that the defendant was not ready to submit anything to the arbitrators except only the assessment of the damages, and he was not ready at the time when the action was brought to withdraw his dismissal if the arbitrators ordered him to do so." Here it appears that the defendants are willing to refer the whole matter to arbitration, so that Davis v. Starr does not govern this case. In my opinion the proposition, that when a man breaks a contract of employment by dismissing his servant he puts an end to it altogether, so that the arbitration clause no longer has any existence, is not tenable. I think it was right in this case to order a reference to arbitration, and the appeal must therefore be dismissed.

CHITTY, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Chitty, L.JJ.) — April 2.

COBURN (Appellant) v. COLLEDGE (Respondent). (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Cause of action—Action for work done—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 37—Statutes of Limitation (21 Jac. 1, c. 16), s. 3, and (4 & 5 Anne, c. 16), s. 19.

In the case of work done by a solicitor in the course of his profession a cause of action accrues due immediately after the completion of the work he was retained to do, and the Statute of Limitations runs from such date, and not from one month after the delivery of his signed bill of costs.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff in the action from the judgment of Charles, J.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister at-Law.

The appellant, a solicitor, brought this action to recover a sum of money due for work which he had done for the respondent in respect of an action which the latter had brought against one King.

The work the appellant was retained to do was completed in May, 1889, at which date the respondent settled his action with King, and on the 4th of June, 1889, he wrote to his solicitor, the appellant, asking for the delivery of his bill of costs.

On the 7th of the same month, however, before the bill was sent in and whilst it was being prepared, the respondent left England and went abroad. He remained away from England until 1896. A bill of costs, however, was duly delivered at his father's address, where he was likely to be found, but it did not reach his hands until 1891.

On the 12th of June, 1896, shortly after respondent's return to England, the present action was commenced by the appellant for the recovery of his costs.

The question thereupon arose whether the action was maintainable, and when the cause of action arose.

By 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, s. 3, all actions of debt shall be commenced within six years next after the cause of action arose.

By 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16, s. 19, it is provided that if any person against whom there is any cause of action of debt be, at the time any such cause of action accrued, beyond the seas, then such person who is entitled to any such suit or action shall be at liberty to bring the action against such person after his return from beyond the seas, so as the action is brought after the return within six years.

By section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, it is provided that "no solicitor shall commence or maintain any action or suit for the recovery of any fees, charges, or disbursements, or any business done by such solicitor until the expiration of one month after such solicitor shall have delivered unto the party to be charged therewith or sent by post to or left for him at his office or dwelling-house a bill of such fees."

Charles, J., held that the cause of action here was the doing of the work, and that the Statute of Limitations does not run from the indefinite date at which a solicitor chooses to deliver his bill of costs, but from the completion of the work in respect of which the action is brought, and he therefore gave judgment for the defendant in the action with costs. From this decision the plaintiff now appealed.

Atherley-Jones, Q.C. (Sturges with him), for the appellant.—The cause of action here did not accrue until one month after the bill of costs was delivered, but by that time the respondent had gone beyond the seas, and therefore the Statute of Limitations did not begin to run until the respondent returned to England, as provided by section 19 of 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16. By section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, the delivery of a bill of costs is a condition precedent to the bringing of an action by a solicitor to recover his costs, and until one month after this has been delivered no cause of action can arise. He must prove a month has elapsed since the delivery, otherwise the defendant may apply to have the action struck out. As to the meaning of "cause of action," see the judgment of Lord Esher, M.R., in the case of Read v. Brown, 37 W. R. 131, 22 Q. B. D. 128. Even supposing there is a cause of action without the delivery of a bill of costs, yet the cause of action is suspended until the bill has been delivered one month: see In re Kensington Station Act, 23 W. R. 463, L. R. 20 Eq. 197, where it was held that the Statute of Limitations did not run against creditors of a railway company in respect of the costs of obtaining an Act of Parliament until the company had assets to meet the claims.

Counsel also cited In re Crossley, Munns v. Burn, 35 W. R. 790, 35 Ch. D. 266, and Murray v. East India Co., 5 B. & Ald. 204.

[CHITTY, L.J., referred to Reeves v. Butcher, 39 W. R. 626, [1891] 2 Q. B. 509, where Lindley, L.J., says that the statute runs "from the earliest time at which an action could be brought."]

Jelf, Q.C. (F. M. Abrahams with him), for the respondent.—The Statute of Limitations runs from the concluding date on or before which the work is completed, notwithstanding the fact that a formality is interposed which a solicitor must fulfil in order successfully to maintain an action for the recovery of his fees. The cause of action here is the doing of the work. He has a right to be paid, wholly apart from whether he does or does not deliver a bill.

Atherley-Jones, Q.C., replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This appeal must fail. The question we have to consider is, When did the cause of action in this case arise? It is admitted that if the cause of action arises when the work by the solicitor is done, the appellant must fail; but if it arises one month after the delivery of the signed bill of costs, then the appellant is entitled to succeed.

Now, this is the case of work done by a solicitor in the ordinary course of his profession. The solicitor seeks to be paid for such work, and, unless there is something to prevent it, he has a right to be paid as soon as the work is done, and therefore a right to bring an action to recover what is due to him.

Now, before the Solicitors Act, 1843, a solicitor was in the same position as any other person in that respect and had a right to bring an action the moment the work was done. The question arises whether that Act has taken away this then existing right and altered the time when the cause of action arose, or has it only affected the procedure that must be adopted before bringing such an action. It is clear that this Act has not taken away the right of a solicitor to be paid for work that he has done. It assumes he has a right to his charges, but says that that right cannot be enforced by action unless and until certain preliminary steps have been taken. Section 37 of that Act provides, to put it shortly, that solicitors shall not commence an action for fees till one month after delivery of their bills. That section does not affect the solicitor's rights, and if he has money belonging to his client in his hands, which is not subject to any trust or charge, he may retain it in order to satisfy his claim. That Act therefore does not touch the cause of action, but only the remedy for enforcing it. Under the old system of pleading it was sufficient for him to allege the work done as the cause of action, and it would lie upon the defendant to set up the defence that a signed bill of costs had not been delivered one month before action. What I said in the case of Read v. Brown, 37 W. R., at p. 132, was that a cause of action "comprises every fact which must necessarily be proved"—that is to say, the plaintiff must assert all the facts which, if anybody traverses them, he must prove in order to support his right to the judgment of the court. I stand by what I said there. That definition was concurred in by the rest of the court (Fry and Lopes, L.JJ.). The judgment of Lindley, L.J., in the case of Reeves v. Butcher has been cited, but on looking at that judgment I see that it does not in the least differ from what I said in the case of Read v. Brown. If you can allege facts which cannot be traversed, the debt can be recovered. These definitions apply to this case, for the plaintiff here could have brought this action at once and have recovered for the work done, unless the defendant could defeat him by putting forward by way of answer, the plea that the plaintiff had not delivered a signed bill of costs, or had not delivered it one month before action. For these reasons I think the judgment of Charles, J., was right, and this appeal must therefore be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The matter has been very fully gone into by the Master of the Rolls, and it is not necessary for me to say much. The question is whether in this case time runs from when the work was completed or from the delivery of the signed bill of costs. If it runs from when the work was completed, the plaintiff is too late, but if from the time of the delivery of the bill, then he would be in time. By the Statute of Limitations of 21 James 1, c. 16, s. 3, it is provided that all actions of debt shall be commenced within six years next after the cause of action. Now when did the cause of action arise here? The work in respect of which the action is brought was completed on the 29th of May, 1889, and on the 12th of June the plaintiff's bill of costs was posted to the defendant, but the latter had then gone beyond the seas, and the bill did not reach him until 1891. In 1896 he returned to England, and shortly after his return this action was commenced. In my opinion the cause of action arose in 1889 when the work was completed. Before the Solicitors Act, 1843, the solicitor, there is no doubt, had a good cause of action immediately the work was done, and before the Judicature Act he would have sued for work and labour done, and if the defendant desired to raise any questions, he was compelled to plead specially. But that was no part of the plaintiff's case. The cause of action accrued at the time the work was done. The Statute of Limitations does not destroy that right, but merely affects the procedure of recovery. The Solicitors Act says that solicitors shall not commence an action for fees until one month after the delivery of a signed bill of costs. Now, it said that if this view is adopted a solicitor will have less time within which to bring an action for work done than any other class of people. That is so. But if, on the other hand, we do not adopt that construction, a solicitor might wait twenty years before delivering his bill of costs, and then within one month after doing so, commence his action. That would clearly be preposterous.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and this appeal must fail. The object of section 3 of the Statute of Limitations of James 1 was to prevent suitors from bringing stale actions for debt, but that statute does not affect the right to the money due which is the cause of action. Now, when did the cause of action arise here? On behalf of the appellant it is contended that it only arose one month after the delivery of the signed bill of costs. I do not think that is so. In my opinion the cause of action arose as soon as the work was done. I entirely accept what has been stated by the Master of the Rolls in the case of Read v. Brown, and I do not think that the judgment of Lindley, L.J., in Reeves v. Butcher in any way affects it. If this appeal were to succeed, a solicitor might delay the delivery of his bill as long as he likes. The whole basis of the Statutes of Limitation is to render such a thing impossible, and therefore the argument that a solicitor need only deliver his bill within a reasonable time falls to the ground.

Appeal dismissed.

DODD v. CHURTON. (a.)

Building contract — Construction of — Clause as to penalties for delay—Extras ordered by architect.

A builder entered into a contract to carry out certain specified works and to complete them by a stipulated date, and there was a provision that the whole of the works were to be completed by that date under a penalty of £2 per week for every week that any part of the works remained unfinished after that date, as liquidated damages. By the contract the building owner had the right to call upon the builder to do extra works, and this right he exercised. By one of the clauses in the agreement it was provided that any authority given by the architects for any alteration or addition in or to the works should not vitiate the contract. Owing to the ordering of extra works the whole work was not completed until some time after the stipulated date, and the building owner claimed to recover from the builder the penalties provided for as liquidated damages for the delay in completion.

Held, that the building owner was not entitled to claim the penalties for non-completion within the specified time, as he had ordered the builder to carry out extra works whereby it was impossible for the builder to complete the entire works within the time specified in the contract.

Jones v. St. John's College, 19 W. R. 276, L. R. 6 Q. B. 115, distinguished.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the Divisional Court, where the judges (Wills and Wright, JJ.) differed on an appeal from the County Court of Whitchurch, in the county of Shropshire. The action was by a builder against a building owner to recover the balance due under a building contract. The claim was admitted, but there was a counter-claim by the defendant for £50 as liquidated damages for not completing the works by the date specified in the contract.

By an agreement in writing dated the 24th of February, 1892, the plaintiff agreed to do certain building works for the defendant for the sum of £664, on the terms and conditions and subject to all the stipulations of an annexed specification which was made part of the agreement. The general conditions provided inter alia as follows:

Clause 1. "The whole of the works, and any other works that may be ordered as additions to this contract, are to be executed and completed in the best and most workmanlike manner, and with the best materials of their several kinds, and everything to be done to the full spirit and intent of this contract, which is intended to comprise everything necessary to the perfect completion of the works. Every part of the works to be done to the satisfaction of the architects, and their direction to be followed in every respect, and their opinion on all questions relating to the works or contract to be final and conclusive."

Clause 4. "Any authority given by the architects for any alteration or addition in or to the works is not to vitiate the contract, but all additions, omissions, or variations made in carrying out the works for which a price may not have been previously agreed upon are to be measured and valued and certified for by the architects, and added to or deducted from the amount of the contract as the case may be, according to the detailed schedule of prices on which the contract was formed. The schedule of prices to apply to all deductions and to additions up to 15 per cent. above the amount of the contract; any additional works beyond 15 per cent. above the amount of the contract and any item to which the schedule of prices does not apply to be allowed for at such prices as the architects may consider fair and reasonable."

Clause 19. "The architects shall have the power to delay or suspend the works during unsuitable weather or for any other reasonable cause, but the works are to be recommenced after receiving due notice from the architects. The time lost by such delay to be added to the time allowed for completion." There was a similar condition as to strikes.

Clause 24. "The building to be ready for the roof-timbers by the first day of May, 1892, and the whole of the works to be completed by the first day of June, 1892, under a penalty of £2 per week for every week that any part of the works remain unfinished after that date as liquidated damages."

The defendant ordered, under clause 4 of the conditions, extra works to the amount of £22 18s. 8d. The entire works were not completed until the 5th of December, 1892, twenty-seven weeks after the time specified for their completion.

The defendant, allowing two weeks as being a reasonable time within which the extra works ordered might have been completed, counter-claimed under condition 24 for £2 per week for twenty-five weeks as liquidated damages for the delay in completion.

The county court judge held that by the defendant ordering extra works there was an absolute waiver on his part of the stipulation as to the payment of penalties for delay in completing, and accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiff both on the claim and the counter-claim. On appeal to the Divisional Court the judges differed. Wills, J., was of opinion that the county court judge was right, while Wright, J., was of opinion that he was not so.

The judgment of the county court judge therefore stood.

The defendant now appealed.

E. Honoratus Lloyd, for the appellant.—The judgment of the county court judge is wrong. The contract is not vitiated by the ordering of extra works, nor are any of the terms of the contract vitiated thereby, and notwithstanding that extra works are ordered the whole of the works must be finished by the stipulated date. At any rate, if the building owner, by ordering extra works, prevents the builder from completing within the stipulated time, the builder can only be entitled to a reasonable time in order to complete the works, and then at the end of that reasonable time the clause as to penalties runs again. This case falls within the decision in Jones v. St. John's College, 19 W. R. 276, L. R. 6 Q. B. 115, where there was an agreement that even if extras were ordered yet the entire works should be completed by a specific date. Holme v. Guppy, 3 M. & W. 387; Westwood v. Secretary of State for India, 11 W. R. 261, 7 L. T. 736; and Russell v. Bandeira, 13 C. B. N. S. 149, are distinguishable from Jones v. St. John's College. In Thornhill v. Neates, 8 C. B. N. S. 831, there was a subsequent and new agreement, but here that is not so.

Lochnis, for the respondent.—This case falls within the general rule—namely, that if the building owner, by ordering extra works, prevents the builder from completing by the stipulated date, he cannot claim penalties for non-completion by that date. This case does not come within Jones v. St. John's College. There are not the express words here that there were in that case. The provision in clause 4 that the ordering of extras is not to vitiate the contract is only put in to show that any alteration in the works is not to rescind the original contract. If those words be struck out the relationship between the parties is not altered. They are really mere surplusage. This case comes within the decision in Westwood v. Secretary of State for India.

E. H. Lloyd replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is an action by a builder to recover the balance due upon a building contract. The claim is admitted, but the defendant, the building owner, counter-claims for £50 as liquidated damages for non-completion of the works within the time specified in the contract.

The question we have to decide is whether the defendant can recover these damages, and this raises the further question whether the defendant, by reason of his having ordered extra work beyond what was contained in the specification, has not disentitled himself to recover the penalty of £2 per week provided for in clause 24. It is admitted that extra work was ordered, and that the carrying out of that extra work must necessarily have caused the plaintiff to take a longer time in completing the contract than if he had only had to do the work specified in the contract. It is also admitted that under the contract the defendant has the right to order the plaintiff to do extra work, and that if the defendant did give such an order the plaintiff was bound to execute it.

In Comyns' Digest, "Condition (L. 6)," the rule was laid down, and has since then been recognized, that "the performance of a condition shall be excused by the obstruction of the obligee," and there is now the well-established principle that if a building owner orders extra work beyond that specified in the original contract, whereby the builder is prevented from completing the contract within the specified time, he is thereby disabled from claiming the penalties provided for in the contract for non-completion within the specified time. This rule was laid down because otherwise an unfair burden would be cast upon the builder, and it was recognized in the case of Holme v. Guppy. Then came this complication—namely, that the builder on entering into his contract agreed to do whatever extra works the building owner should call upon him to execute, and it was urged in such cases that the builder having contracted to carry out any extra works the building owner might order, could not therefore avail himself of the above rule. This argument was urged in Westwood v. Secretary of State for India, but it was there held that this did not render the rule inapplicable. Then came the case of Jones v. St. John's College, where it was alleged on the pleadings that certain extras had been ordered by the clerk of the works in accordance with powers contained in the contract, and that the period within which the works and such extras so ordered were to be completed was not by the terms of the contract to be extended except by order of the clerk of the works, and that such extension had not been ordered, and it was thereupon held that the builder, having expressly agreed to do the entire works and any extras ordered within the time originally limited, must abide by the consequences, even though it involved his performing an impossibility.

The question in the present case is whether, upon the construction of the contract, the plaintiff has agreed to take upon himself the burden which the builder in the St. John's case undertook; if he has done so he must abide by his agreement, however foolish and unreasonable it may be. There is a rule of construction with regard to contracts which this court adopts, which is that where the terms of a contract are ambiguous, and one particular construction would lead to what is unreasonable the court will be unwilling to adopt that construction. I cannot construe the contract in this case as containing such an unreasonable agreement by the plaintiff as was entered into by the builder in the St. John's case, for I think it is capable of a perfectly reasonable construction. It does not, therefore, come within that case, but only within Westwood v. Secretary of State for India, where it was held that the building owner, although entitled to give orders for extras, disables himself from claiming penalties if by the ordering of such extras he has rendered it impossible for the builder to complete the work by the specified date. We therefore adopt the judgment of Wills, J., and are of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I agree that the appeal must be dismissed. It is a well-established principle of law that if a contractor is unable to complete the work agreed upon by the specified date, owing to some act of the other party to the contract, he is absolved from the obligation, which has been thus rendered impossible of performance, to complete on the specified date. That principle must be applied in the present case. It has been held by the court that where a contractor has agreed to pay penalties for delay in completing work undertaken, such penalties cannot be enforced if the delay has been brought about by the party who is seeking to recover the penalties. I do not think this case comes within Jones v. St. John's College, and therefore I think this appeal must be dismissed.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. What we have to do here is to construe this contract. The law is well established that where the performance of a condition has been rendered impossible of performance by the action of the grantee he cannot compel the grantor to perform it: see remarks of Byles, J., in Russell v. Bandeira, 13 C. B. N. S. at pp. 205 and 206. This principle is applicable to all contracts. Here by the ordering of the extras it was impossible for the plaintiff to complete the entire works within the time specified. Of course, a man may enter into a contract such as was alleged in Jones v. St. John's College, and this rule would then not be enforced. He may contract to do specified work and any extras that may be ordered by the building owner and to complete the entire work by a certain date, but I can find nothing in the present case to justify us in saying that there was here any such contract. I am of opinion that this case does not come within the decision in Jones v. St. John's College, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

In re WILMOT.
WILMOT v. BETTERTON. (a.)

Will—Construction—Devise to E. and her issue—Issue to take on attaining twenty-one—Rule in Wild's case.

By his will a testator devised and bequeathed his residuary estate, subject to certain life interests, to E. and "to any lawful issue she may have, such issue to take a vested interest in my said property upon attaining the age of twenty-one years." The testator died leaving both real and personal property. E. survived the testator, and died intestate and without ever having been married.

Held, (1) as to the realty, that the direction that the issue should take vested interests on attaining to twenty-one was inconsistent with the use of the word issue as a word of limitation; that E. and her issue took concurrently as purchasers; that E. took a vested interest on the death of the testator liable to be divested pro tanto on the birth of issue, an event which never happened; that therefore the real estate went to E.'s heir-at-law.

(2) As to the personalty, that there was nothing to take the case out of the ordinary rule that under a gift to one and his children, the parent and children take primâ facie concurrently as joint tenants; that, consequently, the personalty belonged to E.'s legal personal representative.

This was a summons to determine the nature of the interest which, under the testator's will, passed to his ward, Ellen Ellendü.

The testator by his will dated the 21st of November, 1888, gave a legacy of £100 to his housekeeper, Emily Packe, and all the rest, residue, and remainder of his real and personal property he gave, devised, and bequeathed to his friend Mrs. Elizabeth Betterton for her life. Upon the decease of Elizabeth Betterton he directed that the said Emily Packe should have the use and enjoyment of all his property for her life, subject to forfeiture in a certain event, and the will then proceeded: "And from and after the decease of the said Emily Packe, or the forfeiture of her interest under this my will, I give and bequeath the property so given and belonging to the said Emily Packe for life, to my ward, Mademoiselle Ellen Ellendü, now residing with me, and to any lawful issue she may have, such issue to take a vested interest in my said property upon attaining the age of twenty-one years."

The testator died on the 26th of April, 1889, leaving both real and personal estate. Ellen Ellendü survived the testator and died in 1893 without having been married.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and A. W. Rowden, for the testator's heir-at-law and sole next of kin.—The words here used, "lawful issue," are words of purchase, and Ellen Ellendü took only a life estate.

They referred to Theobald on Wills, p. 255; Jarman, 4th ed., vol. 2, p. 398; and to Hockley v. Mawbey, 1 Ves. 143; Doe v. Burnsall, 6 T. & R. 30; Doe v. Elvy, 4 East, 313; and Audsley v. Horn, 7 W. R. 125, 1 De G. F. & J. 226.

Grosvenor Woods, Q.C., and E. Ford, contra.—There are no cases in which such indications as are to be found here, have been held sufficient to limit the interest of the parent. The will shows that, where the testator, who was a solicitor, intended to create life interests, he used apt words.

They referred to Buffar v. Bradford, 2 Atk. 220; Newill v. Newill, 20 W. R. 308, 7 Ch. App. 253; In re Davies' Policy Trusts, [1892] 1 Ch. 90, 40 W. R. Dig. 141; In re Adams' Policy Trusts, 31 W. R. 810, 23 Ch. D. 525; Jeffery v. Honeywood, 4 Mad. 398; Bibby v. Thompson, 32 Beav. 646, 13 W. R. Dig. 97; and disputed the authority of Jeffery v. De Vitre, 24 Beav. 296, 6 W. R. Dig. 100, if applicable.

G. A. Scott, for Mrs. Betterton, took no part in the argument.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

STIRLING, J.—The question raised by the summons is whether Ellen Ellendü took any and what interest in the real and personal estate of the testator. First, as to the real estate. In Roddy v. Fitzgerald, 6 H. L. Cas. 823, at p. 872, Lord Cranworth thus states the law as to the effect of a devise to A. B. and his issue: "The word issue, when it is used in a will, is primâ facie a word of limitation—that is to say, a gift to A. B. and his issue gives him an estate tail; it is the same as a gift to him and the heirs of his body. But if the context makes it apparent that the word is not so used, then it may be treated as a word of purchase."

In the present case the direction that the issue should take a vested interest in the testator's property upon attaining the age of twenty-one years seems to me inconsistent with the use of the word as a term of limitation. The testator intended that the issue taking interests under the will should themselves attain vested interests at twenty-one: if issue as used in the primary gift be a word of limitation, the whole interest is given to Ellen Ellendü as tenant in tail, and nothing could ever vest in her issue. In my judgment, therefore, the issue took as purchasers.

What, then, is the effect of a devise to A.B. and his issue where the issue are purchasers? On this question guidance is to be obtained from the rule established in Wild's case, 6 Co. Rep. 17, which is thus stated by Lord Cranworth in Byng v. Byng, 10 W. R. 673, 10 H. L. C. 171, at p. 178: "Where there is a devise of land to a man and his children, and he has at the time of the devise no child, then primâ facie the word children shall be taken to be a word of limitation and the first taker shall have an estate tail, but on the other hand if the first taker has children at the time of the devise then the will shall primâ facie be construed as giving a joint estate to the first taker and the children as purchasers." His lordship proceeds: "I have qualified the rule as stated by Lord Coke by introducing the words "primâ facie" because he certainly did not mean to state the rule as one which must take effect where a contrary intention was apparent, and it is clear that in acting on the rule in both its branches the courts have always considered themselves at liberty to disregard it where an adherence to it would defeat the intention of the testator as collected from other passages of his will." The rules in Wild's case were, by Sir G. Jessel, M.R., held to be applicable to a devise to the testator's children and their issue and heirs in Underhill v. Roden, 24 W. R. 574, 2 Ch. D. 494.

According to the second branch of the rule, where the word children is regarded as a word of purchase, under a devise to A. and his children, A. and his children take concurrently as purchasers. So under a devise to A. and his issue, where the word issue is regarded as a word of purchase, A. and his issue take concurrently as purchasers.

Then arises the question as to when the class of

issue to take is to be ascertained. As is stated by Wood, V.C., in Browne v. Hammond, Joh. 212 n. (a), "the rule is that a devise or bequest to children as a class, distributable at the death of some other person, vests in all children in existence at the death of the testator; the gift, however, opening so as to let in such after-born children, if any, as may come into existence before the period of distribution."

Here the period of distribution would be primâ facie the death of the survivor of Elizabeth Betterton and Emily Packe, or the time of the forfeiture of her interest by the latter if she survived; it might in certain circumstances be later, as for example, if Ellen Ellendü had died before the period of distribution, leaving issue surviving her, none of whom had attained twenty-one at the death of the survivor or the time of forfeiture by Emily Packe. Into this, however, it is unnecessary to enter. It appears to me that Ellen Ellendü took a vested interest on the death of the testator, liable to be divested pro tanto by the birth of issue before the period of distribution, an event which did not happen.

It appears to me, therefore, that her heir-at-law is entitled to the real estate. It was urged in opposition to the view above expressed that Ellen Ellendü took only an estate for life, and in support of this contention the cases of Hockley v. Mawbey, Doe v. Burnsall, and Doe v. Elvy were cited. The first of these cases appears to fall under the rule that where words of distribution, together with words which would convey an estate in fee, are attached to the gift to the issue, the ancestor takes for life only, as to which see Clifford v. Koe, 28 W. R. 633, 5 App. Cas. 447-456. As to the two latter cases, I refer to the remarks in Jarman on Wills, 4th ed., p. 414.

Secondly, as to the personalty. It has been held that the rule in Wild's case has no application to personalty (Audsley v. Horn). Under a gift of personalty to A. and his children, the parent and children take primâ facie concurrently as joint tenants; but slight circumstances have been laid hold of by the courts as enabling them to come to the conclusion that a gift for life to A. with remainder to his children was intended (Newill v. Newill).

In the present case I am unable to see anything to take the case out of the ordinary rule, and in my opinion the personal estate will go to the legal personal representative of Ellen Ellendü.

Canal—Special Act—Owners of adjacent and subjacent minerals—Right to support—Compensation—Statutory company—Undertaking not to sue—Ultra vires.

Where the Act of Parliament under which a canal was made and maintained contains provisions as to working the adjacent and subjacent minerals similar to or identical with the provisions of the Acts in the cases of Knowles v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., 14 App. Cas. 248, and Chamber Colliery Co. v. Rochdale Canal Co., [1895] *A. (a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

And if both parties admit that any damage which might result to the canal from the working of the subjacent minerals would be very trifling compared with the amount of the compensation payable to the mine owners in case they were left unworked, and if the canal owners give an undertaking that they will not claim any damages by reason of the working of such subjacent mines, and at their own expense will repair any damage thereby caused to the canal, the court will refuse to make a declaration that the mine owners are entitled to such compensation upon leaving the subjacent mines unworked.

Decision of the Court of Appeal in Chamber Colliery Co. v. Rochdale Canal Co., [1894] 2 Q. B. 632, 43 W. R. Dig. 119, followed.

Trial of action.

This was an action to determine the rights of the plaintiffs with regard to working or receiving compensation for coal lying adjacent and subjacent to a canal.

The plaintiffs were lessees of two seams of coal known as the Great Mine and the Roger Mine, part of which lay beneath the Ashton-under-Lyne Canal, and other part under land adjacent to the canal.

The defendants were owners of the canal, which was constructed under an Act of Parliament, [1792] 32 Geo. 3, c. 84, by a company of proprietors.

Sections 37 and 38 of this Act are as follows:

Section 37: "Provided always, and be it further enacted, that nothing herein contained shall extend to defeat, prejudice, or affect the right of any lord or lords, lady or ladies of any manor or manors, or of any owner or owners of any lands or grounds in, upon, or through which the said intended canal or any towing paths, wharfs, quays, trenches, sluices, passages, watercourses, or conveniences aforesaid, shall be made to the mines and minerals lying and being within and under the lands or grounds to be set out or made use of for such canal, towing paths, wharfs, quays, trenches, sluices, passages, or watercourses, or other conveniences aforesaid, or any of them; but all such mines and minerals are hereby reserved to such lord or lords, lady or ladies of such manor or manors, and to such owner or owners of such lands or grounds respectively, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns respectively; and it shall be lawful for the lord or lords, lady or ladies of such manor or manors, or such owner or owners of such lands or grounds respectively (subject to the conditions and restrictions herein contained), to work, get, drain, take, and carry away to his, her, or their own use such mines and minerals, not thereby injuring, prejudicing, or obstructing the said intended canal, towing paths, wharfs, quays, trenches, sluices, passages, watercourses, or other conveniences aforesaid, or any of them; anything herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding."

Section 38: "Provided also, and be it further enacted, that if the owner or worker, owners or workers of any coal or other mine or mines shall in pursuing such mine or mines work near or under the said intended canal or other works as aforesaid, so as in the opinion of the said company of proprietors to endanger or damage the same, or in the opinion of the said owner or worker, owners or workers of the said mine or mines to endanger or damage the further working thereof, then it shall be lawful for the said company of proprietors to treat and agree with the owner or worker, owners or workers for all such coal or other minerals as may be near or under the said intended canal or other works as shall be thought proper to be left for the security or preservation of the said intended canal, or works, or mine or mines as aforesaid, and in case the said company of proprietors and such owner or worker, owners or workers of such mine or mines shall disagree in the satisfaction to be made for such coal or other minerals, then it shall be lawful for the said commissioners, at the request of the said company of proprietors, or of such owner or worker, owners or workers of such mine or mines, to cause a jury to be summoned and impanelled in the manner hereinbefore directed, who shall, and they are hereby authorized and required by such ways and means as aforesaid, to assess and determine what satisfaction such owner or worker, owners or workers of such mine or mines ought to have and receive from the said company of proprietors on being restrained from working such mine or mines; and upon payment or satisfaction made to such owner or worker, owners or workers of such mine or mines by the said company of proprietors according to the verdict or judgment of such jury, such owner or worker, owners or workers of such mine or mines shall be, and they are hereby perpetually restrained from working such mine or mines within the limits for which satisfaction shall by the said jury be adjudged, and declared to extend."

Section 17 appointed certain persons as commissioners for settling all questions arising between the company of proprietors of the canal and the proprietors of lands, mills, or waters, that should be injuriously affected by the execution of the powers of the Act.

Section 73 provided that the canal should be open to the public upon payment of certain rates, and subject to certain bye-laws.

By an Act, 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 24, power was conferred upon the company of proprietors to refer any questions to arbitration.

By an Act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 86, the canal, with the towing paths and other works, was vested in the defendants, who were made liable to all the liabilities of the company of proprietors, and were (section 22) bound to keep open and in good repair the canal and its works, so as at all times to be open and navigable for the use of all persons.

In August, 1895, the plaintiffs served upon the defendants a notice informing them of their intention to work the coal both subjacent and adjacent to the canal, and requiring them to treat for the coal necessary to be left for the protection of the canal.

The defendants replied that they were advised that no coal was necessary to be left, and that they did not desire to treat for any coal.

The plaintiffs then brought this action, alleging that in working their mines they were approaching the canal, and that if they continued them within certain limits they would endanger and damage the canal, towing paths, and works. In their ordinary course of working they would take out the whole of the coal in each mine for 1,500 yards under and along both sides of the canal.

They claimed—(1) A declaration that they were entitled to work and get the whole of the coal and other minerals belonging to the plaintiffs which might lie within and under any land adjacent to the said canal, towing paths, and works, notwithstanding that the working or getting thereof might endanger or damage the said canal, towing paths, and works; or, in the alternative, (2) a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to be paid by the defendants pursuant to the Act of 1792, s. 38, satisfaction for all such part or parts of the last-mentioned coal and minerals as might be proper to be left for the security or preservation of the canal, towing paths, and works, or any of them; (3) a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to be paid by the defendants pursuant to the said first-mentioned Act, ss. 37 and 38, satisfaction for all such part or parts of the coal and other minerals belonging to the plaintiffs and lying under the canal, towing paths, and works as might be proper to be left for the security or preservation of the canal, towing paths, and works, or any of them.

No oral evidence was given by either side. In the course of the trial the defendants offered to give an undertaking to the plaintiffs not to claim damages, if any, caused by reason of the working by the plaintiffs of the subjacent coal, and to repair at their own expense any damage that might be done to the canal, towing paths, and works by such working. It was stated that if the subjacent coal was left its value would be about £80,000, while, as the coal was from 500 to 900 yards deep, the only damage that could result from its excavation would be a subsidence of a few feet in the course of five or six years, which could be dealt with and put right at the cost of a few hundred pounds.

It was also, with the approval of his lordship, admitted by both sides, after the form of the findings in the case of Chamber Colliery Co. v. Rochdale Canal Co., [1894] 2 Q. B. 635, 43 W. R. Dig. 119: (1) That there was no reasonable ground for apprehending that the working of the mines near or under the canal would cause damage to the mines, or to the further working thereof, by percolation of water from the canal to the mines; (2) that the subsidence caused by the working of the mines would not interfere with the navigation of the canal; (3) that such subsidence would necessitate repairs from time to time during a period of eight or ten years to the towing path and banks of the canal; (4) that the costs of such repairs would be very trifling as compared with the compensation that would be payable under section 38 of the Act.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and O. L. Clare, for the plaintiffs.—Section 37 does not deal with minerals under adjacent land, and neither that section nor section 38 prevents our working them without regard to the safety of the canal. This is the effect of the decisions of Cromford Canal Co. v. Cutts, 5 Rail. Cases 442; Andrew Knowles & Sons v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., 14 App. Cas. 248, 37 W. R. Dig. 121; and Chamber Colliery Co. v. Rochdale Canal Co., [1895] App. Cas. 564, all of which were decisions upon sections similar to or identical with those we have here. It is true that the decision in Knowles v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., is not expressly restricted to the subjacent coal, but that this was intended is shown by Chamber Colliery Co. v. Rochdale Canal Co. This view of our rights would seem quite clear if we were the owners of adjacent coal only. But we are also owners of subjacent coal, and the question arises whether that fact makes any difference to our rights with respect to the adjacent coal. We submit that it does not; but the matter is not free from doubt in consequence of certain dicta of the learned lords in the latter case on appeal to the House of Lords, see [1895] App. Cas. pp. 573, 578, 583, and we have a right to ask for a declaration of the court upon the point for our protection. The cases also show that we are bound to leave subjacent coal sufficient for the preservation of the canal, and that we are entitled to compensation for it. It is doubtful whether the canal company being a statutory one, it is not ultra vires for them to give us the undertaking offered, and consequently whether we should be safe in accepting it. The decision of the Court of Appeal on this point in Chamber Colliery Co. v. Rochdale Canal Co., was doubted by the learned lords in the House of Lords though it was not unnecessary for them to decide upon it. Such an undertaking was held ultra vires

in Ayr Harbour Trustees v. Oswald, 8 App. Cas. 623, 32 W. R. Dig. 112.

They also cited: Dudley Canal Co. v. Grazebrook, 1 B. & A. 59, and London and North-Western Railway Co. v. Evans, 41 W. R. 149, [1893] 1 Ch. 16.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Macnaghten, for the defendants.—As section 37 does not deal with adjacent coal, and section 38 only gives a right to compensation after the Canal Co. has given notice, the plaintiffs are, as regards their adjacent coal, asking a needless declaration of their clear legal rights. In Knowles v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. actual damage had already been done, which distinguishes it from the present case. The decision of the Court of Appeal in Chamber Colliery Co. v. Rochdale Canal Co. was that where an undertaking was offered the action would be dismissed; and this was not reversed by the House of Lords. It is therefore a binding decision upon the court. The case of Ayr Harbour Trustees v. Oswald is a different one, as there the trustees proposed to contract not to use the land for the special purpose for which alone they had been empowered to take it.

BYRNE, J.—This is a peculiar case. Both parties are desirous that the same conclusion shall be arrived at. There has already been two decisions of the House of Lords upon sections identical, or practically identical, with those in question here. The first of those cases is Knowles & Sons v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., where the mine owner was the owner of subjacent as well as adjacent minerals, and it was admitted there that the defendants had been taking and working the coal from the subjacent and adjacent mines, and had thereby "injured, prejudiced, and obstructed" the canal. Now, it is clear that under the section in that case, equivalent to section 37 here, the defendants had thus incurred a statutory liability. In that case the whole of the damage had been already done, and no distinction was taken between adjacent and subjacent minerals. The decision was that, having regard to their statutory liability, the mineowners were entitled to compensation under the section in that Act equivalent to section 38 here.

The decision in Knowles v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. was considered in Chamber Colliery Co. v. Rochdale Canal Co. The decision in that case only concerned the rights of owners of adjacent, as opposed to owners of both adjacent and subjacent, coal; and it was held that as no statutory liability was imposed upon the owners of adjacent mines they were not entitled to compensation under the Act.

The point I have now to consider is whether, having regard to this last mentioned decision, a mine owner who owns both adjacent and subjacent coal is entitled to come to this court and ask for a declaration that he is entitled to compensation under the compensation clause. There are certain passages in the judgments of the learned lords in this last-mentioned case which require consideration. If the case of Knowles v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. had stood alone I should have felt more difficulty, but reading that case with the judgments in Chamber Colliery Co. v. Rochdale Canal Co. I come to the conclusion that the decision in the earlier case was intended to apply to subjacent mines only, and decided nothing further. Lord Macnaghten, whose judgment in the earlier case was accepted by two others of the learned lords, refers to this case in his judgment in Chamber Colliery Co. v. Rochdale Canal Co. One passage in the latter judgment gave me some difficulty. He says, [1895] App. Cas. 585: "Section 40 is of wider application." [His lordship read down to "statutory liability," p. 585.] Now, so far as those sections are concerned, it is with reference to subjacent mines that the statutory liability applies; and the danger of this liability would arise to an owner of both subjacent and adjacent mines only because of his owning the subjacent mines. If a man was owner of adjacent mines only, he would be under no liability whatever; and I see no good reason for saying that because a person is owner of both subjacent and adjacent mines his rights with regard to the two kinds of mines are different from what they would have been if they had been owned by different persons. I think that the meaning of the decision of the House of Lords in Chamber Colliery Co. v. Rochdale Canal Co. was this: that in the case of subjacent mines there is a right to compensation under the compensation clause, and that in the case of adjacent mines there is no such liability.

That leaves another point for consideration. There is clearly a statutory liability in respect of subjacent mines, and it has been put to me (and both parties desire that I should take this view) that an undertaking can be given by the defendants that they will not insist upon any remedy in damages which they might otherwise have had by reason of the injury caused by the plaintiffs working the subjacent mines. And I am asked upon that to make no declaration with regard to the subjacent mines. Admissions have been made by the parties in accordance with what they say their scientific witnesses would prove, which show, among other things, that the damage that would be caused by working the subjacent mines would be very trifling compared with the compensation that would have to be paid if the minerals had to be left. The defendants say that the case then comes within the principle of Chamber Colliery Co. v. Rochdale Canal Co., where such an offer was almost forced upon the mine owner. There are, it is true, certain dicta of the learned lords on appeal in that case to the effect that had that point come before them they would have wanted further consideration before dealing with it. But these were dicta only, and the standing decision is that of the Court of Appeal; and having regard to the fact that the undertaking is not being forced upon the plaintiffs, and to the admissions made, I think I may take the course suggested.

Judgment for the plaintiff upon the first paragraph of claim. No order made upon rest of claim, but the judgment to state the admissions and undertakings made and given by the parties, and an expression of the opinion of the court as above stated.

thereunder the court will exercise its discretion having regard to the particular facts of the case.

In cases where there are two or more trustees, one of whom is solicitor, the trustee or trustees who are not solicitors will not be excused for a consequence of a breach of trust unless they have acted with the same caution as they would in their private affairs, but he or they may nevertheless be entitled to a complete indemnity from the solicitor-trustee.

Trial of action.

This was an action brought by the tenant for life and the reversioner under the will of Jane Maxwell Strong for a declaration that the surviving trustee thereof, H. Ivimey, and the representatives of a deceased trustee, James Turner, were liable to make good a breach of trust in respect of a sum of £900, part of the trust estate.

The facts of the case are as follows:

By her will the testatrix appointed the defendant Henry Ivimey and the above-named James Turner executors and trustees thereof, and directed that all her just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses might be paid and directed her trustees to stand possessed of the sum of £450 then invested in the leasehold premises, 13, King Henry's-road, Hampstead, in the county of Middlesex, and the sum of £450 invested (inter alia) on certain copyhold and leasehold premises at Acton Green, Middlesex, upon trust to pay the annual income thereof to her niece, the plaintiff Jane Maxwell Barker for her sole and separate use without power of anticipation. After her decease testatrix directed her said executors to pay the said sum of £900 and transfer any securities in which the same might be invested to the plaintiff Eliza Jane Barker, the only daughter of the plaintiff Jane Maxwell Barker. And the testatrix by her said will directed that in the event of the before-mentioned sums of £450 and £450 not being paid off at the time of her decease it should be lawful for her said trustees to continue the said investments, and in the event of their being paid off to re-invest the said sums in Government, freehold, or leasehold securities or securities guaranteed by Government upon the same trusts as were thereinbefore declared as aforesaid in favour of the plaintiffs.

The testatrix died on the 15th of August, 1876, and her said will was on the 7th of August, 1877, proved by the defendant Henry Ivimey and Turner.

The debts and funeral and testamentary expenses of the said testatrix had long since been paid.

The one sum of £450 was paid off in January, 1879, and the other sum in May, 1886. The first sum was reinvested upon an equitable mortgage in an undivided moiety in the Dowgas tenement and an undivided fourth share of and in Rock Hill tenement and certain china clay works, and two tenements all in Mollinis, all in the parish of St. Austell, in the county of Cornwall, and the property of Thomas Gill. The property was subject to certain leases.

The remaining £450 was subsequently advanced to Gill, and a legal mortgage of the premises before charged under the equitable mortgage was given by him to secure the whole £900. Ivimey, who was a solicitor and acted as such in the matter, was interested in some of the other undivided parts.

Ivimey informed Turner by letter that the mortgagor was a personal friend of his and that he could safely rely on the security. (The correspondence is fully set out in the judgment.)

The husband of the tenant for life died in 1881 and Turner died in 1892.

The property was estimated as worth about £620. Turner's executors delivered a third-party notice and claimed an indemnity from Ivimey.

Eve, Q.C., and Solomon, for the plaintiffs.—China clay works were an improper investment of trust moneys: In re Whiteley, Whiteley v. Learoyd, 36 W. R. 721, 12 App. Cas. 727. Further, the defendant Ivimey had a personal interest in the investment. Both trustees are equally liable to make good the loss. The Trustee Act, 1888, s. 4, sub-section 1, is no defence, as it is not merely a question of insufficient value: Blyth v. Fladgate, 39 W. R. 422, [1891] 1 Ch. 337.

H. Newson, for the defendant Ivimey.—The investment was not improper. In any case Turner's executors are not entitled to any contribution from Ivimey: Bahin v. Hughes, 34 W. R. 311, 31 Ch. D. 390.

Hopkinson, Q.C., and S. Strickland, for the defendants, the executors of Turner.—The security was proper, but insufficient, and Turner's estate is only liable to make good the sum advanced in excess. As to the tenant for life, section 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888, applies. The trustees ought also to be personally relieved under the Judicial Trustee Act, 1896, s. 3. Turner's estate is also entitled to be relieved against Ivimey: Lockhart v. Reilly, 4 W. R. 438, 25 L. J. Ch. 697.

Eve, Q.C., replied.

Section 3 of the Judicial Trustee Act, 1896, is as follows:

"3.—(1) If it appears to the court that a trustee, whether appointed under this Act or not, is or may be personally liable for any breach of trust, whether the transaction alleged to be a breach of trust occurred before or after the passing of this Act, but has acted honestly and reasonably, and ought fairly to be excused for the breach of trust and for omitting to obtain the directions of the court in the matter in which he committed such breach, then the court may relieve the trustee either wholly or partly from personal liability for the same.

"(2) This section shall come into operation at the passing of this Act."

BYRNE, J., after stating the facts as above: Section 8 of the Trustee Act of 1888 is relied upon by the defendants as a bar to the claim so far as the plaintiff tenant for life is concerned, and it is admitted that the section applies to bar the claim so far as the tenant for life is concerned. The defendant Ivimey is clearly liable to the plaintiff in respect of the breach of trust, but the defendants, the representatives of Turner, claim the benefit—first, of section 9, sub-section 1 of the Trustee Act, 1893; and, secondly, they say that under section 3 of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, they ought to be relieved from personal liability in respect of the breach of trust alleged, in case the court should be of opinion that they are personally liable for such breach of trust. I am of opinion that they are not entitled to the benefit of section 9, sub-section 1 of the Act of 1893, because I do not consider that the mortgage security in question was a proper investment in all respects for a smaller sum than was actually advanced thereon. See the observations of Stirling, J., in Blyth v. Fladgate. The defendants, the executors of Turner, say that the court ought to act on section 3 of the Act of 1896 having regard to the circumstances of this particular case, and they rely upon certain letters written by the defendant Ivimey to their testator Turner in the years 1879 and 1880.

The first of such letters is dated the 15th of January, 1879, and runs as follows: "Dear Sir,—

Mrs. J. M. Strong, deceased. A mortgage of £450 will be paid off in a few days. I have found another security for the amount at £5 per cent. for a year, and as the mortgagor is a personal friend of mine I can safely recommend the security. . . . When would it be convenient for you to call and execute the re-conveyance?" And in a letter of the 20th of January, 1879, Ivimey says: "Thursday next at 2 o'clock has been appointed to pay off this mortgage. Please, therefore, attend here at that hour." On the 6th of May, 1880, he writes: "Mr. Williams has paid off the £450 mortgage, and I have agreed to lend that sum to Mr. Gill, who borrowed the other £450 on an equitable mortgage. I have arranged that he now shall execute a legal mortgage for the whole £900 at £5 per cent. interest. The security is on freehold property. Please call at your convenience to execute the release to Mr. Williams." Another letter was written on the 8th of May, and on the 10th of May, 1880, Ivimey wrote: "I should be obliged by your signing the enclosed receipt on the back of the mortgage deed and the discharge to be entered on the copyhold rolls. Four o'clock on Wednesday I will fix for completing the mortgage. . . . Please return me the documents at once by registered post." Turner was a linendraper carrying on business at Hanwell. Ivimey was a solicitor carrying on business at Staple-inn, Holborn. I have no evidence beyond this to justify me in coming to the conclusion that I ought to relieve Turner's estate under section 3 of the Act of 1896. Turner was clearly guilty of a breach of trust, and I have no reason to suppose that he acted otherwise than with perfect honesty in relation to the matter, but I am asked to hold that he not only acted honestly, but also reasonably, and that he ought fairly to be excused for the breach of trust. There is one other fact which appears—viz., that he had been party to a prior breach of trust—the lending of £450 upon equitable mortgage, a fact which is recited in the legal mortgage subsequently given. I have literally no further knowledge as to the circumstances of the case or the business capacity of Turner, nor have I any evidence to show what communications passed between Ivimey and Turner beyond the letters which I have already referred to. I think that the section relied on is meant to be acted upon freely and fairly in the exercise of judicial discretion, but I think that the court ought to be satisfied, before exercising the very large powers conferred upon it, by sufficient evidence, that the trustee acted reasonably. I do not think that I have sufficient evidence in this case that he so acted; in fact it does not appear from the letters that Mr. Turner acted in respect of this mortgage as he would probably have acted had it been a transaction of his own. I think that if he was—and he well may have been—a businesslike man, he would not, before lending this money, have been satisfied without some further inquiry as to the name of the mortgagor and as to the nature and value of the property upon which he was about to advance his money. It is consistent with the evidence that he might actually have made further inquiries and have been actually told the nature of the security. It was alleged that Turner was entitled to rely on the statements of his co-trustee as contained in the letters I have referred to, and that I ought to infer that he did so rely without further inquiry. It was pointed out that Ivimey was a solicitor and a trustee appointed by the testatrix, and therefore a person upon whom she relied and upon whom Turner might consider himself entitled to rely, and that upon these facts alone his estate ought to be exonerated from the consequences of the breach of trust. It would be impossible to lay down any general rules or principles to be acted on in carrying out the provisions of the section, and I think that each case must depend upon its own circumstances. In the present case I do not consider that I have sufficient evidence to entitle me to apply it.

The next question is, What relief are the plaintiffs entitled to? I cannot say that the investment is outside the terms of the trusts, but it went very near being outside. It is perfectly true that trustees may invest on reversionary trust property, and it is true in this case that the solicitor-trustee was not interested in the property mortgaged, although he had an interest in undivided shares of the property, other shares whereof were mortgaged. [His lordship referred to In re Whiteley, and continued:] In re Salmon, 38 W. R. 150, 42 Ch. D. 351, Fry, L.J., says: "There is no case to shew that where trust money is improvidently invested on an insufficient security of an authorized description the trustee cannot be made liable unless an option is given him of taking to the security. I think that the liability of the trustee in such a case is to make good the loss occasioned to the trust estate by the improper investment. The mode of enforcing this liability depends on the circumstances of the particular case. In some cases justice will best be done by realizing the security and making him pay the deficiency; but in some cases it may be right to make him pay at once the whole sum improperly invested, and let him take the benefit of the security."

Having regard to this decision, I think that the proper relief to give here will be to direct a sale of the property, and to declare the trustees liable for the loss.

With regard to the third-party notice following the principles laid down in Lockhart v. Reilly, Thompson v. Finch, 22 Beav. 316, 5 W. R. Ch. Dig. 100, and Bahin v. Hughes, I declare that the defendants, the representatives of Turner, are entitled to indemnity for any loss they may sustain, including the costs of this action as between solicitor and client.

Bill of sale—Specific description—Substituted chattels—Plant—Cab-horse—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 6, sub-section 2.

Cab-horses are not "plant" within the meaning of section 6, sub-section 2, of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.

Yarmouth v. France, 36 W. R. 281, 19 Q. B. D. 647, distinguished.

Appeal from a judgment of a Divisional Court (Wright and Bruce, JJ.) on an appeal from a county court.

This was an interpleader issue.

The plaintiffs were the holders of a bill of sale given by one Roe, a cab proprietor, of certain horses and cabs therein specifically described. The defendant was the purchaser of two horses which, subsequently to the giving of the bill of sale, had been substituted by Roe for two of the horses specifically described therein. The sale of these two substituted horses took place at a repository to which they had been sent by Roe for the purpose of being sold. The plaintiffs having claimed the horses, the owner of the repository interpleaded, and this issue was directed to be tried.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The county court judge gave judgment for the defendant, and this decision was affirmed by the Divisional Court.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Lynden Bell, for the plaintiffs.—The property in the horses passed to the plaintiffs under the bill of sale. The effect of section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, is that substituted property is not to pass under a bill of sale. But section 6, sub-section 2, makes an exception in favour of a particular kind of substituted property—viz., any plant or trade machinery where such plant or trade machinery is used in, attached to, or brought upon any land, farm, factory, workshop, shop, house, warehouse, or other place in substitution for any like plant or trade machinery specifically described in the bill of sale. The question is whether these horses are "plant" within the meaning of that sub-section. In Yarmouth v. France, 36 W. R. 281, 19 Q. B. D. 647, it was held that a horse was "plant" within the meaning of the Employers' Liability Act, and the reasons given for that decision are applicable to this case. The words in collocation with which the word "plant" is used in the Employers' Liability Act are as little suggestive of horses as the words used in this sub-section of the Bills of Sale Act. Further, these horses have been brought upon and used in the premises in substitution for horses specifically described in the bill of sale. The sub-section therefore applies and operates so as to pass the property in these horses.

Clavell Salter, for the defendant.—Yarmouth v. France does not in any way govern this case. The meaning of the word "plant" in the Bills of Sale Act cannot depend on the meaning which has been put upon that word as used in the Employers' Liability Act. This Act contemplates local substitution of one thing for another. These horses cannot be said to have been locally substituted for other horses, neither can they be said to have been used in, attached to, or brought upon the premises within the meaning of the sub-section.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question is whether these horses, which have been substituted for horses described in the bill of sale, are such substituted plant as is mentioned in section 6, sub-section 2 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882. The sub-section does not speak simply of the plant used in a business, but of plant of a particular kind—viz., plant or trade machinery used in, attached to, or brought upon any land, farm, factory, workshop, shop, house, warehouse, or other place in substitution for plant or trade machinery specifically described in a bill of sale. The words "other place" cannot mean any place in the world; they must have some limited meaning put upon them. In the present instance I think the place must be the place where the grantor of the bill of sale carries on his business as a cab proprietor—i.e., his mews. In my opinion these horses cannot be said to be used in, attached to, or brought upon the mews. I suppose the real question is whether they are used in the mews. Cab-horses cannot be said to be used in a mews; they are used in the streets. Therefore I think that, although these horses might under some circumstances be called plant, they are not such substituted plant as is referred to in this sub-section.

The appeal must be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is, Were these horses plant within sub-section 2 of section 6? The sub-section deals with plant or trade machinery used in, attached to, or brought upon any land, house, or other place in substitution for any like plant or trade machinery. I do not think that these words can rightly be held to apply to horses.

CHITTY, L.J.—The case of Yarmouth v. France was, if I may say so, in my opinion, rightly decided, but it was a decision on the Employers' Liability Act. The language of the Bills of Sale Act, with which we now have to deal, is not the same as that of the Employers' Liability Act, neither is it equivalent to it. This sub-section does not speak of "plant used in the business," but it speaks of plant in some definite locality—plant "used in, attached to, or brought upon any land, shop, house, warehouse, or other place." Cab-horses are not used in stables, and, in my opinion, they cannot be said to be attached to or brought upon the stables within the meaning of this sub-section.

I think the judgment of the Divisional Court is right.

Appeal dismissed.

PLANT v. BOURNE. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Specific performance—Sale of land—Parcels—Statute of Frauds—Uncertainty—Extrinsic evidence.

The plaintiff and defendant signed a written agreement to respectively sell and purchase "twenty-four acres of land freehold and all appurtenances thereto at Totmonslow." In an action for specific performance of the contract the plaintiff proposed to call evidence to show that the land intended to be sold was a piece of that acreage which he owned at the place named.

Held, that there was no description in the agreement sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, and that such evidence could not be given.

Trial of action.

This was an action by the vendor for specific performance of the following written agreement between the plaintiff and defendant, signed by both parties, for the sale of land, and the question was whether there was a sufficient description of the land within the Statute of Frauds.

The agreement was as follows:—

"An agreement, made the 12th day of February, 1896, between Robert Plant, of Putney, in the county of Surrey, gentleman, of the one part, and Robert Henry Bourne, of Trentham, in the county of Stafford, station-master, of the other part. The said Robert Plant agrees to sell, and the said Robert Henry Bourne agrees to purchase, at the price of £5,000, twenty-four acres of land freehold and all appurtenances thereto at Totmonslow, in the parish of Dracott, in the county of Stafford, and all the mines and minerals thereto appertaining, possession to be had on the 25th of March next, the vendor guaranteeing possession accordingly. As witness the hands of the parties the day and year first above written.

(Signed) ROBERT PLANT.
ROBERT HENRY BOURNE.
(Witness) A. G. RAMSDALE,
Solicitor, Longton."

Upon the defendant refusing to carry out the agreement, the plaintiff brought this action.

The statement of claim contained the following allegations: That the plaintiff was owner of freehold land at Totmonslow containing 24a. 1r. 26p., which was shown on the plan annexed to statement of claim; that the defendant was at the date of the agreement well acquainted with the land, and that he had on the 12th of February, 1896, by appointment gone over and carefully examined the land with the plaintiff, and that afterwards the agreement was entered into. The map referred to showed the land lying in one piece. At the trial the plaintiff proposed to give evidence in support of the above statement. The defendant objected to any such evidence, and submitted that the contract was void for uncertainty.

Eve, Q.C., and J. Rolt, for the plaintiff.—A general description of the property is sufficient if it can be shown by parol evidence what was intended, and thus be subsequently reduced to a certainty—Id certum est quod certum reddi potest—Ogilvie v. Foljambe, 3 Mer. 53; McMurray v. Spicer, 16 W. R. 332, L. R. 5 Eq. 527; Wylson v. Dunn, 35 W. R. 405, 34 Ch. D. 569; Owen v. Thomas, 3 My. & K. 353; Bleakley v. Smith, 11 Sim. 150; Shardlow v. Cotterell, 30 W. R. 143, 20 Ch. D. 90; Waldron v. Jacob, Ir. R. 5 Eq. 131, 19 W. R. Ch. Dig. 116-7; Cowley v. Watts, 1 W. R. 218. When a man sells land he must be presumed to be the owner of it, and thus the present agreement is the same as if the words had been "my twenty-four acres," which would be sufficient: Cowley v. Watts. If these words had been contained in a devise they would have been sufficient: Doe d. Templeman v. Martin, 4 B. & Ad. 771, 785.

Astbury, Q.C., and A. J. Chitty, for the defendant.—The contract is quite indeterminate and cannot be rendered certain. In all the cases cited there was such which pointed to some particular property. Here there is nothing: Price v. Griffiths, 1 De G. M. & G. 80; Stuart v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 1 De G. M. & G. 721. It does not follow because a man agrees to sell land that he is the owner. He may generally be so, but is not so necessarily, and you cannot import the word "my" before the description of the land. The necessity for a definite as distinct from an indefinite description is shown by Rossiter v. Miller, 26 W. R. 865, 867, 3 App. Cas. 1124, 1140; Jarrett v. Hunter, 35 W. R. 132, 34 Ch. D. 182, 184.

BYRNE, J.—In this case the question I have to decide is whether there is a sufficient memorandum within the Statute of Frauds to enable the plaintiff to call evidence to show what the property really is which is comprised in the agreement of the 12th of February, 1896. It is clear that the memorandum contains some of the elements required by the statute; the parties are named, and the price is named. But more than this is required. There must be a description in words certain, or, if not certain, capable of being rendered certain. I have been referred to many cases where parol evidence was allowed to identify the property, but there is in all of these cases either something which enables you to connect the subject-matter of the memorandum with other acts or facts, such words of definition as "the," "my," or "these," or the like; or, on the other hand, words on the face of the document which refer to, and connect it with, some other documents or matters which enable you to determine with certainty what the property was about which the parties bargained. Now, in this memorandum I do not find any such words. Suppose the agreement had been simply that "the plaintiff agrees to sell and the defendant to purchase at the price of £5,000 twenty-four acres of land." It could not have been said that evidence could have been received to show what those twenty-four acres were, and I do not think that this description is at all assisted by the addition of the words which follow. The description still leaves out that which is the essential thing before you can admit parol evidence—namely, words of the kind I have before referred to, which are a key which enables you to determine with certainty directly the key is used what was contracted to be purchased. In the case of Shardlow v. Cotterell the memorandum there furnished this key upon the face of it; and so in the case of Bleakley v. Smith, which is perhaps the nearest decided case to the present. You have here many words of description, but nevertheless the memorandum fails to satisfy the requirements of the Statute of Frauds. I cannot, therefore, allow parol evidence to be given to show what property was intended to be dealt with.

In re BALD.
BALD v. BALD. (a.)

Conflict of laws—Scotch will—General power of appointment—English appointor—Assets for creditors.

The exercise by an Englishman of a general power of appointment conferred by the will of a Scotchman is governed by Scotch law, and consequently the fund appointed does not become assets for the payment of the debts of the appointor.

John Bald, of Monzie Castle, near Crieff, in Perthshire, made in 1879 a trust disposition and settlement in Scotch form which was of a testamentary nature, and was called throughout the case his "will."

He also made four codicils to this disposition and settlement at various times, the last being in the year 1884.

By this will and these codicils shares of the testator's residuary estate were vested in trustees upon trust to pay the income thereof to his children and with power to his said children to apportion the capital of their respective shares among their respective issue, and "with power to dispose by way of legacy to the extent of £2,000 sterling thereof to any other persons my said children may choose."

John Bald died in June, 1885, and his will and codicils were proved in England.

He was at the date of his will a domiciled Scotchman. He left several children, one of whom was Edward William Bald.

In 1887 E. W. Bald borrowed from his brother, the defendant R. B. Bald, a sum of £2,000, giving him at the time a written promise to provide for the loan by his will.

In January, 1889, he borrowed a sum of £500

from the defendant J. B. Harvey, upon a like promise.

In 1890 E. W. Bald made his will, and thereby, after referring to the above-mentioned loans and reciting the power of appointment conferred by the will of his father, he directed "that in the event of my being indebted to the said J. B. Harvey at the date of my death, and in the event of my general estate being insufficient to pay the amount of such indebtedness in full, the trustees or trustee for the time being of the will of my said father shall stand possessed of so much of the capital of my said share (not exceeding £2,000) as shall make up the amount by which my general estate shall be insufficient to pay my said indebtedness, in trust for, and I bequeath and dispose of the same to the said J. B. Harvey absolutely, in or towards the payment of my said indebtedness."

The testator gave a similar direction in favour of R. B. Bald.

E. W. Bald died in 1890, and his will was proved in England. His estate was insolvent, and the above-named debts were still owing at his death.

R. B. Bald and J. B. Harvey now claimed to have the legacy of £2,000 applied as directed by the will of E. W. Bald.

This claim was resisted by the Bank of Liverpool (Limited), who were also creditors of the estate of E. W. Bald, and who had been appointed to represent the other creditors, on the ground that his exercise of the power of appointment made the legacy assets for the payment of his debts generally. Thereupon the trustees of the will of John Bald took out this originating summons against the executrix of E. W. Bald, the appointees, and against the bank, asking for a direction as to whom the legacy was payable. There appeared to be some doubt as to whether E. W. Bald had, at the date of his will and of his death, a Scotch or English domicil; but it was admitted for the purposes of the argument that it was English. It was also admitted that, according to Scotch law, the exercise of the power of appointment by E. W. Bald did not make the legacy assets for this payment of his debts, and that this was the case whether he had a Scotch or English domicil. The appointees contended that even if the English law did apply they were entitled to the legacy as the appointment was for value; but this question did not need to be determined.

Hughes, for the trustees of John Bald.

H. Wace, for R. B. Bald and J. B. Harvey.—The appointment merely names the persons who are to take under the will of John Bald, and their rights are the same as if they were expressly mentioned as legatees in the will of John Bald. There seems to be no reported case covering this question.

Astbury, Q.C., and C. E. E. Jenkins, for the Bank of Liverpool.—The exercise of the power by an Englishman made the question one to be governed by English law.

Eve, Q.C., and Dauney, for other parties.

BYRNE, J.—Although the power of appointment was exercised by a domiciled Englishman, by a will in English form, yet, as the power was created by the will of a domiciled Scotchman, I think the law of Scotland applies, and that, consequently, the legacy goes to the appointees freed from the claims of the general creditors of E. W. Bald.

ANDREWS v. DENTON. (a.)

Licensing law—Conviction—Selling liquor without a licence—Protection order—Licensing Act, 1872, s. 3.

The licence-holder of certain licensed premises remained on the premises and continued to sell liquor after a protection order had been granted in respect of the premises to another person.

Held, that the licence-holder was not liable to conviction for selling liquor without having a licence under section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872.

Case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

An information was laid against the respondent charging him with selling beer, on the 6th October, 1896, without having a licence, contrary to section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872.

The respondent was the licence-holder of certain licensed premises under a licence granted in June, 1896. In pursuance of a bargain entered into with a person named Jocelyn for the sale of his interest in the premises, he joined with Jocelyn in giving notice of an intention to apply for a protection order in favour of Jocelyn. Notice was also given of an intention to apply at the next special transfer sessions for a transfer of the licence to Jocelyn. The protection order was made on the 3rd of October, 1896. The licence was at the same time indorsed by the respondent as follows: "I hereby assign all my right, title, and interest in this certificate to Theogene Jocelyn"; but it was not handed over to Jocelyn.

In consequence of a dispute having arisen, the respondent refused to vacate the premises, and continued to carry on the business till the 9th of October. Jocelyn then entered the premises and a transfer of the licence was duly made at the special transfer sessions.

The magistrate before whom the information was heard acquitted the respondent.

Danckwerts, for the appellant.—The effect of the protection order granted to Jocelyn was to preclude the respondent from further selling under the licence. It was not intended that two persons should be entitled to sell liquor under the same licence. Persons applying for a protection order must be in such a position as would have entitled them to a transfer of the licence had the transfer sessions been sitting. For that purpose it was necessary that the change should have taken place before the protection order came into operation: see Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), s. 4, and Reg. v. Liverpool (Justices of), 11 Q. B. D. 638. [WRIGHT, J.—Does not your argument go to show that the protection order is void?] The respondent, having joined in the application for the order, is not in a position to raise that objection.

Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Bodkin, for the respondent, were not called on.

HAWKINS, J.—The magistrate was right. The respondent was carrying on the business of a beer-house-keeper under a licence granted in June, 1896, which he contemplated transferring to Jocelyn. There had been no actual assignment, and the respondent kept the licence and continued in the house. He had been negotiating with Jocelyn to transfer the licence together with possession of the house. In the meantime the magistrate had power to grant a protection order. An order was accordingly granted. It may be that that order was bad. All I say is that the respondent had the licence and continued in the house, and there is no ground for saying that his licence was cancelled.

WRIGHT, J.—I agree. I do not assent to Mr. Danckwerts' point that the change must have taken place. The statute applies to cases where there is or is going to be a change. The respondent's licence was not cancelled, therefore the offence charged was not proved. The respondent was entitled to go on selling liquor under the licence.

LEEDS PERMANENT BENEFIT BUILDING SOCIETY v. MALLANDAINE. (a.)

Inland revenue—Income tax—Building society—Advances to borrowing members—Mortgage—Profits and gains—Borrowers' periodical repayments—Deductions—Liability of society to pay income tax under Schedule D on interest charged on loans—Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 100, and Act of 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), ss. 2, 40.

A building society received subscriptions from its investing members, and from the fund so raised advances were made to its borrowing members, secured by mortgage, and the advances were repaid to the society by instalments.

The Inland Revenue Commissioners claimed income tax under Schedule D. from the society on that portion of these repayments which represented the interest charged by the society on the respective loans.

Held, that the society was liable to pay income tax under Schedule D. upon the sums received by way of interest, although such sums were not "yearly" interest.

London County Council v. Grove, ante, p. 279, followed.

Case stated by the commissioners for special purposes of the Income Tax Acts on an appeal by the society against an assessment of £60,200 made upon them by the commissioners for general purposes, under Schedule D of the Income Tax Acts, for the year ended the 5th of April, 1895, in respect of interest received from its borrowing members.

The society was established in Leeds in 1848 under the provisions of the Building Societies Act, 1836 (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 42), and was in 1875 incorporated under the provisions of the Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42).

The objects of the society are to raise by subscriptions of the members a fund out of which to make advances to members upon security of freehold, copyhold, or leasehold estates by way of mortgage, such advances being made to members of the society only, and this alone constituted the business of the society. The constitution and course of business of the society are as follows:

The members are those persons who hold one or more shares, or one or more fifth parts of a share in the society, the shares being divided into two classes namely, investors' shares and borrowers' shares. The question as to shares held by investing members is not raised in this case. The borrowers are the members to whom money is advanced by the society upon the security of their property. A person desiring an advance gives particulars of the amount required and the security offered. If the loan is approved money is advanced so soon as a mortgage to the society is executed. In all cases the advance is made in respect of one or more shares or fifths of shares which the borrower takes in the society. Upon each share he pays 2s. 6d. a week. If the advance be a large one the repayment is spread over a great number of years. Hence, of the first instalment of 2s. 6d. per week a relatively large part would be appropriated to interest and a relatively small part to the repayment of the principal. If, however, the borrower elects to split up his loan into several smaller shares, then he would pay 2s. 6d. per week on each of these shares, and, since they would be payable in a relatively short time, the amount of 2s. 6d. appropriated to interest would be smaller and the amount appropriated to the repayment of principal larger.

In order to obtain the necessary funds for its staff, offices, and the like, the society charges a slightly higher rate of interest to borrowing members than it grants to depositors, or, generally speaking, to investing members. Whatever surplus accumulates out of the fund so brought into existence is from time to time divided among the members of the society. On the 6th of October, 1896, there were 2,468 borrowing members of the society, owing £1,367,724 to the society.

Dicey, Q.C. (with him Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., Lord Robert Cecil, and M. Macnaghten), for the society.—Income tax is only chargeable on interest when it is an annual interest, which this is not; in other cases interest must be charged, if at all, as profits, and the society admittedly has made no profits. The borrowing members should deduct whatever amount of income tax is payable in respect of the property. That they have already done, or ought to have done, under Schedule A, and the Crown has no right to levy a tax on the same property twice.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G. (with him Danckwerts and Peacock), for the Crown.—The tax claimed under Schedule D has nothing whatever to do with any tax paid on the same property under Schedule A. Admittedly the interest which is now sought to be charged in the hands of the mortgagees—that is, in the hands of the society—is not in the nature of "profits or gains," but is interest accruing to them in respect of loans. The borrowing members—that is, the mortgagors—are not entitled to deduct this tax from the instalments as they become due and payable to the society, inasmuch as it does not fall within section 40 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, under which the occupier of a house, for example, is entitled to deduct the property tax to be paid by the landlord. That section is as follows: "Every person who shall be liable to the payment of any rent or any yearly interest of money or any annuity or other annual payment, either as a charge on any property as a personal debt or obligation by virtue of any contract, whether the same shall be received or payable half-yearly or at any shorter or more distant periods, shall be entitled . . . to deduct and retain thereout the amount of the rate of duty then payable. . . . Provided always that no tenant or occupier of any property chargeable under Schedule A of this Act shall be entitled to deduct or retain out of the rent thereof any greater sum than the amount of the duty which shall have been assessed and charged upon or in respect of such property, and actually paid by such tenant or occupier." The commissioners have found as a fact that part of the instalments paid by the borrowers consists of interest, which is the subject-matter of the assessment, and they confirmed the assessment, being of opinion that, though the society did not carry on trade, the interest received by them was chargeable.

The following cases were referred to: London County Council v. Grove, ante, p. 279; Pugh v. Heath, 30 W. R. 553, 7 App. Cas. 235; Attorney-General v. Worrall, 43 W. R. 118, [1895] 1 Q. Sir Edward Clarke replied.

WILLS, J.—I think the principle which ought to determine our judgment in this case is perfectly clear, although it is not always so in revenue cases, which are not unfrequently extremely perplexing. Taxation is the creation of statute, and all we have to do in this case is to see how the broad principle of the statute applies to the facts before us. For the purpose of deciding that, it is immaterial (except on the question of alleged hardship) for the court to go into the question of whether or not property tax under Schedule A has been levied and paid on the property mortgaged to the company. One thing is certain, if it has been paid, it has been paid by the mortgagors—the borrowing members—and not by the society. For that reason it seems to me highly probable that a large portion of the mortgaged property has escaped taxation so far altogether, because by far the greater number of the borrowing members would be in a position to claim and would claim, exemption from liability to pay that particular branch of income tax by reason of the smallness of their incomes.

I feel clear on this point also that the payments made by the borrowing members are not yearly interest. I do not base my conclusion that this is not a yearly interest, on the fact that these repayments are made monthly. That does not affect the question at all; but the interest is so inextricably mixed up with principal, and the amount varies so from month to month under the system adopted by the society for these repayments that it cannot reasonably be regarded as an annual interest within the meaning of the statute. By that term is meant—speaking generally—a fixed sum per annum payable as interest on an amount outstanding, which can at all times readily be known.

Now, it is part of the appellants' contention that the interest paid to the society cannot be distinguished from what is capital in the instalments, and, therefore, that they are unable to furnish the return demanded by the commissioners. That is a view of the matter I do not agree with. On the other hand the persons who make these periodical payments, consisting as I have said of a variable amount of interest and of repaid capital, certainly cannot be expected to ascertain how much is interest and how much capital, and are therefore not qualified to make the deduction, if it were their duty to do so. Having decided that this is not an annual interest, the case comes down to the simple question of whether the payments are properly the subject of taxation under Schedule D of the Income Tax Acts. In my opinion they certainly are. It is obviously intended that money received by way of interest by a society should be taxed, and it makes no difference that the interest may last for less than one year, and may not properly be classed under the term "yearly interest." It is clear enough that the word interest is meant to include interest on money as it accrues, which is nevertheless not reserved or payable as yearly interest. The case of the London County Council v. Grove is very much in point, and there the Court of Appeal held that payments of interest were chargeable in the hands of the mortgagee. The Solicitor-General has amply satisfied me with regard to the powers given the commissioners to make this claim by the charging sections of the Act. Our judgment, therefore, must be for the Crown, leaving it to be ascertained how much of the gross sum is interest and how much principal.

CONROY v. PEACOCK. (a.)

County court—Practice—Employers' liability—Want of due notice of injury—Statutory defence—Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), s. 4—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 10, rr. 10, 18a.

In an action in the county court for compensation under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), the defence that the plaintiff has not given due notice of the injury as required by section 4 of that Act is a statutory defence within the meaning of the County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 10, r. 18a, and unless the defendant has duly filed a notice of his intention to rely upon such statutory defence he cannot avail himself thereof at the trial.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of the deputy county court judge (S. G. Lushington, Esq.) at Wandsworth.

The action was brought under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, by a bricklayer's labourer against the builder who employed him.

The facts of the case shortly were that the plaintiff on the 17th of June, 1896, was employed under the defendant's foreman as a hodman in the repair of a chapel at Camberwell, and whilst so employed he was injured by a portion of the scaffolding falling upon him owing to it not being properly secured. Immediately after the accident the foreman was informed of what had happened, and a few days afterwards the foreman told the defendant of the event.

On the 3rd of August, more than six weeks after the accident occurred, the plaintiff gave the defendant a written notice that he had sustained injury as above stated.

Section 4 of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), provides that "an action for the recovery under this Act of compensation for an injury shall not be maintainable unless notice that injury has been sustained is given within six weeks, and the action is commenced within six months after the occurrence of the accident causing the injury."

The plaintiff, however, commenced his action within the six months.

In the particulars of claim it was stated that the accident occurred on the 23rd of June instead of the 17th. At the trial, when it was proved that the accident had really happened on the 17th, counsel for the defendant objected that the notice of the injury had not been given within the six weeks as required by section 4, but the deputy judge ruled that the objection was a statutory defence, and that, therefore, the defendant could not avail himself of it without giving proper notice. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and judgment was entered accordingly for him.

From this judgment the defendant now appealed.

By the County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 10, r. 10, it is provided as follows: "Where the defendant intends to rely upon any of the grounds of defence mentioned in rules 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20 of this order, or upon any counter-claim, he shall file a notice, stating thereon his name and address, together with a concise statement of such grounds, five clear days before the return day. . . . Provided that, in case of non-compliance with this and the above-mentioned rules, and of the plaintiff's not consenting at the trial to permit the defendant to avail himself of such defence, the judge may, on such terms as he shall think fit, adjourn the trial of the action to enable the defendant to give such notice."

Rule 18a of the same order provides that "Where in any action the defendant relies upon any statutory defence, or any defence of which he is required by any statute to give notice, he shall in his statement set forth the year, chapter, and section of the statute, or the short title thereof, and the particular matter upon which he relies."

Stephen Lynch, for the appellant.—The judgment in the court below is wrong. The plaintiff cannot bring his action without giving notice as provided by section 4—in fact, the giving of such a notice is a condition precedent to the bringing of an action under the Employers' Liability Act, and it is immaterial whether the defendant does or does not give notice that he intends to rely upon the fact that the plaintiff has failed to comply with section 4.

Moyses, for the respondent, was not called upon.

CAVE, J.—I think this appeal must be dismissed. It seems to me this is a very clear case. The action is brought under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, section 4 of which provides that an action for the recovery under that Act of compensation for an injury shall not be maintainable unless notice that injury has been sustained is given within six weeks from the occurrence of the accident causing the injury. In the present case such notice was not given until three days after the six weeks had expired, and the defendant at the trial raised the objection that notice was not given in accordance with that section. That is clearly a statutory defence. Now it is provided by the County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 10, rr. 10 and 18a that where a defendant intends to rely upon any statutory defence he must file a notice with a concise statement of such grounds and set out in such statement the year, chapter, and section of the statute on which he relies.

The defendant, however, did not file any such notice, and the learned county court judge held, and rightly so, that he could not at the trial avail himself of the defence that the plaintiff had not given notice of the injury as required by section 4 of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, because he, the defendant, had not filed a notice that he intended to raise that defence.

Under the proviso to rule 10 the defendant might have applied for an adjournement so as to enable him to give notice of such defence, but, for reasons best known to himself, he did not do so. He now appeals to this court from the ruling of the learned judge. We are of opinion that his decision was perfectly right. This appeal must therefore be dismissed with costs.

LAWRANCE, J.—I entirely concur in what my learned brother has said.

PRATT v. SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway—Cloak-room—Article deposited—Ticket—Condition on ticket—"Not responsible for"—Meaning of.

The plaintiff deposited a gun of over £10 in value in the cloak-room of the defendants, and received a ticket which contained the condition that "the company will not be responsible for articles left at the station unless the same be duly registered and a ticket given in exchange; the company will not be responsible for any package exceeding the value of £10." When the gun was given back to the plaintiff it was found to be damaged through the careless handling of the company's servants.

Held, that the words in the condition, "not responsible for any package exceeding the value of £10," meant not responsible for either the loss of such article or any damage to it, and protected the company against not only the loss of such article, but also any damage to it, and that the plaintiff therefore had no right of action against the company.

Appeal by the defendants from the judgment of the learned deputy county court judge sitting at the Southwark County Court.

The plaintiff deposited his gun in the cloak-room of the defendants, and upon such deposit he received a ticket which he had to produce and give up on receiving the gun. On the face and back of this ticket were printed certain conditions, but as a matter of fact the plaintiff's attention was not called to these conditions, and he did not know what the particular conditions were, but the learned deputy judge considered that he was bound by the case of Van Toll v. The South-Eastern Railway Co., 10 W. R. 578, 12 C. B. N. S. 75, to hold that the plaintiff was bound by the conditions.

These conditions contained the following: "The company will not be responsible for articles left by passengers at the station unless the same be duly registered, for which a charge of 2d. per article will be made and a ticket given in exchange; and no article will be given up without the production of the ticket, or satisfactory evidence of the ownership being adduced. A charge of 1d. per diem, in addition, will be made on all articles left in the luggage room for a period longer than twenty-four hours. The company will not be responsible for any package exceeding the value of £10."

The plaintiff's gun exceeded in value £10, and when it was delivered by the company to the plaintiff it was found to be broken, and the learned judge found that it was so injured by the careless handling of the defendants' servants, and as he construed the condition upon the ticket that "the company will not be responsible for any package exceeding the value of £10" as having reference to the loss of the article only, and not to any damage it might sustain, he accordingly held that the company, although they would not have been liable for the loss of the gun, yet were liable for the damage to it; and as he estimated that damage at £5 5s., he gave judgment for the plaintiff for £5 5s. and costs.

The defendants, by leave, appealed.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

Reginald Brown (Archibald Willis with him) for the appellants.—The learned judge was wrong in holding that the company were protected against the loss of the gun only, but not against the damage to it. The words "responsible for" in the condition on the ticket mean that the company will not be liable or answerable for either the loss of the article itself or any injury or damage to it. The construction placed upon the condition by the learned judge was too narrow a construction, as it is unreasonable that the company should be protected by the condition against the loss of the article, but not against damage to it. In Van Toll v. The South-Eastern Railway Co. it was held that this very condition covered the loss of a part of the article deposited; and in Pepper v. South-Eastern Railway Co., 17 L. T. N. S. 469, it was held that the company were protected against delay in delivering the article. As the greater includes the less, so protection against the loss of the article includes protection against any injury or damage to the article.

Hume-Williams, for the respondent (the plaintiff).—The learned judge was right in his interpretation of the condition. We have here a finding of fact that the gun was injured owing to the careless handling of the company's servants. That is equivalent to a finding that the injury was caused by the negligence of the defendants. Does the condition protect the company from the negligence of their own servants? It would be a most unreasonable construction of the condition to hold that it did. The company are bailees of this gun for reward, and as such would be liable for any damage to the gun caused by their negligence. If they seek to exempt themselves from this liability then the onus is upon them to make the condition absolutely clear to the other contracting party, which they have not done in this case. This is not a reasonable condition, and even if it were, the company cannot by such condition escape from the consequence of their own negligence, as in this case.

CAVE, J.—I am of opinion that the judgment in this case cannot be supported. The learned judge took the view that the word "responsible" meant responsible for loss, and that it did not mean or include responsibility for damage. The result of that view would be that an article of very great value might be irretrievably damaged and the damage might be equivalent really to the loss, but because it was damaged and not lost the company would be responsible for the full amount. I cannot think that that is a reasonable interpretation of this condition. There are words in the earlier part of the condition which we cannot neglect altogether, which are that "the company will not be responsible for articles left by passengers at the station." "Responsible" there must mean responsible not only for the loss of the article, but also for damage to it. It seems to me that when we have the same word later on in the expression "The company will not be responsible for any package exceeding the value of £10," that means what it says—namely, that the company will undertake no responsibility for any article which is over the value of £10. If it is not over the value of £10 the company do undertake responsibility for it, and they are responsible either for the loss of the article or for damage to it; but if it is over the value of £10 they undertake no responsibility, and if the owner leaves it with the company under such circumstances as the present, he does so at his own risk, and he must not look to the company if the thing is either lost or damaged. That seems to me the proper construction to put upon this condition, though I cannot see why the company should not have made the matter more clear by saying, "We will not be responsible for loss or injury to the article." The question is, what is the meaning of the words "will not be responsible for"? I think, looking at the way in which the words are used in the former part of the ticket, the best way to construe them is to hold that they mean that the company will not be responsible at all, and that an article over £10 in value is taken in at the owner's risk, and not at the company's risk.

REG. v. PELLY AND ANOTHER, JUSTICES OF ESSEX. (a.)

Licensing Law—Closing hours—Person found drunk on licensed premises during closing hours—Penalty—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 12.

A person who is found drunk on licensed premises during closing hours when the premises are actually closed to the public, and who is neither a lodger nor inmate in the house, may be convicted under section 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872, of "being found drunk on licensed premises," as such premises do not cease to be licensed premises when they are actually closed to the public during closing hours.

Rule for a certiorari to quash a conviction whereby the applicant for the rule, Albert Lacey, was convicted by the justices of Ongar, in the county of Essex, of being found drunk on licensed premises.

At a court of petty sessions held on the 9th of January, 1897, at Ongar, Lacey was summoned on a charge of being found drunk on licensed premises—namely, the Bell Inn, Chipping Ongar, and he was convicted and fined 5s. with costs.

The defendant Lacey was in the Bell Inn on the evening of Sunday, the 20th of December, 1896. He did not leave the house at the closing time—namely, ten o'clock—when the other customers left, and when the house closed to the public.

The licensed premises having been closed at ten o'clock a police constable gained admission to the house at a quarter past ten o'clock, when he found the defendant Lacey drunk in the private bar and talking to the landlord. He gave as his reason for being there at the time that he had taken and paid for a bed in the house for that night, and the landlord made the same statement and said that Lacey was a lodger.

The justices disbelieved this statement, and found as facts that Lacey was found on the licensed premises during closing hours, that he was drunk when so found, and that he was neither a lodger nor inmate of the house on that night, and they convicted him of the offence of "being found drunk on licensed premises" within the meaning of section 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872, which provides that "every person found drunk . . . on any licensed premises shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding ten shillings."

The above rule for a certiorari was obtained, on the authority of Lester v. Torrens, 25 W. R. 691, 2

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

Q. B. D. 403, to bring up and quash the conviction on the ground that "licensed premises" in section 12 means premises which are open to the public and before closing time, and that as the premises at the time the defendant was found therein were closed to the public they were not "licensed premises" within the meaning of section 12, and that therefore the defendant could not be convicted of being found drunk on licensed premises.

Erle, for the justices, showed cause against the rule.—The justices have found as a fact that the defendant was neither a lodger nor inmate of the house on the night of the 20th of December, and therefore that point cannot be taken. The ground of this rule is that the licensed premises are no longer licensed premises when the closing hour has arrived and when they are closed to the public. The question therefore in this case is whether the licensed premises remain licensed premises after closing time, and when they are closed to the public, or whether they cease to be licensed premises at and after closing time when they are closed to the public. The case of Lester v. Torrens, upon the authority of which this rule was granted, is entirely different from the present case, and is no authority for the proposition that licensed premises cease to be "licensed premises" within section 12 when they are actually closed to the public during closing hours. In that case it was the landlord himself of the licensed premises who was charged with being found drunk on his own premises, and the court there held that as it was during closing hours, and as the house was actually closed to the public, and everybody excluded except the inmates, the landlord could not be convicted under section 12 of being found drunk on licensed premises. Here the defendant was not the landlord of the house, he was not a lodger or inmate of the house, and he had no right at all to be there except to use the house as a public-house. The cases are therefore different, and Lester v. Torrens is no authority for setting aside this conviction, or for saying that the licensed premises ceased to be licensed premises during closing hours. The defendant could also have been convicted under section 25 of being on the premises during closing hours. It would lead to many difficulties if licensed premises were held not to be licensed premises during closing hours. They remain licensed premises during the whole time the licence continues.

J. Ogle, in support of the rule.—The question is whether these premises remained "licensed premises" after they were actually closed to the public. Lester v. Torrens, is an authority that the premises ceased to be "licensed premises" within the meaning of section 12 as soon as closing time had arrived and the doors had been closed and bolted and the public excluded. Licensed premises are only licensed premises when they are open to the public to use as licensed premises, but when the public can no longer use them as licensed premises—namely, during closing hours, then the premises are not licensed premises; see the judgment of Mellor, J., in Lester v. Torrens as proving this. The defendant, therefore, being found on these premises during closing hours, was not found drunk on "licensed premises" within section 12, and therefore he ought not to have been convicted.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of opinion that this rule ought to be discharged. The conviction which we are asked to quash is a conviction under section 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872, which says that a person who is found drunk on any "licensed premises" shall be liable to a penalty. The applicant for this rule was found drunk on these licensed premises under the circumstances already stated. There is no reason to suppose he did not go there for the purpose of getting drink and using the premises as licensed premises; and unless there was some lawful excuse the landlord would be liable for his being there at all. The landlord gave the excuse that he was a lodger, an excuse which the justices found to be wholly untrue. Ten o'clock being the closing hour, it has been argued in support of this rule that if a man is found drunk on the licensed premises ten minutes before ten he is liable to this penalty under section 12, but that if he remains and is found drunk on the same premises ten minutes past ten o'clock he is liable to no penalty at all; and in support of this contention the case of Lester v. Torrens was cited. With regard to that case I may say that I entirely agree with the decision arrived at. That was a charge brought against the landlord of the licensed premises himself of being found drunk on his own licensed premises during closing hours, and when the house was clear of all outside persons. His day's work was over and the house was closed to the public; he lived on the premises, and it was his own private dwelling-house; and under those circumstances the court in effect said that it could not have been the intention of the Act to render the man liable to a penalty under this section. In my opinion it would be very unreasonable to construe the Act in any other way than the court did in Lester v. Torrens, as the defendant in that case was a private person in his own house, doing that which any private person may do in his own house.

In the present case the defendant went into this house for the purpose of getting drink. He was not the landlord, and the justices have found that he was not a lodger or inmate. To my mind, therefore, he was found drunk on licensed premises within the meaning of the section, and this construction of the section is fortified by looking at section 25. According to section 25, if, when premises are required to be closed, any person is found in them without lawful or reasonable excuse, such person is liable to a penalty of 40s. Now, if the contention for the defendant here be correct, then a person who is found on licensed premises sober and during closing hours is liable under section 25 to a penalty of 40s.; but if he is found drunk on the same premises during closing hours, then he is liable to no penalty at all. I think if a man goes into a licensed house and gets drunk and remains there after closing hours and is found drunk there, he is liable to be convicted under section 12. I think, therefore, that the justices were right, and that this rule must be discharged.

REG. v. THE LUNACY COMMISSIONERS. (a.)

Lunacy—Person detained as lunatic—Certificates that lunatic may safely be discharged—Discretion of

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

Lunacy Commissioners to act on such certificates—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 5), s. 49.

The Commissioners in Lunacy are not bound to act upon the certificates of two medical practitioners who have been authorized by them, under section 49 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, to make an examination of a person detained as a lunatic, and who after examination have duly certified that the person so detained may safely be discharged, but, notwithstanding such certificates, the commissioners have, under section 49, a discretion to grant or refuse an order for the discharge of the lunatic.

Rule for a mandamus to the Lunacy Commissioners commanding them to make an order, under section 49 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, for the discharge of a person detained in a private asylum as a person of unsound mind.

From the affidavits it appeared that the patient was in March, 1895, under an urgency order and upon the certificates of two duly qualified medical practitioners, removed as a private patient to the Holloway Sanatorium, in the county of Surrey, and that under a reception order he has since remained there and is still detained as a lunatic, though he has not been so found by inquisition.

Upon the instructions of the patient his solicitors wrote to the Commissioners in Lunacy stating that the patient wished to obtain his discharge from the sanatorium, and that they applied under section 49 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, for an order under that section for an examination of the patient by two medical practitioners approved and authorized by the commissioners, and they submitted the names of two practitioners who should make the examination, and they said that the facts which had indicated insanity had ceased to exist.

In January, 1897, the commissioners authorized the two medical practitioners whose names had been proposed to examine the patient, and these two medical practitioners examined the patient and duly certified that, in their opinion, the patient, though he still had unusual views on the subject of religion, did not require detention, and that he might safely be discharged without risk or injury to himself or the public, and they certified accordingly.

These certificates having been duly sent to the commissioners they refused to act upon them, upon the ground that, in their opinion after full consideration of the case, and in the opinion of the resident medical superintendent, the patient was still of unsound mind and ought not to be discharged, and that having regard to all the circumstances of the case they must decline to make an order under section 49 for the patient's discharge, as they had come to the conclusion that in this case they ought not to exercise the discretion vested in them of ordering the patient's discharge.

A rule for a mandamus was then obtained at the instance of the patient.

Section 49 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, provides: "An order for an examination by two medical practitioners authorized by the commissioners, of any person detained as a lunatic in any institution for lunatics, or as a single patient, may be obtained from the commissioners upon the application of any person, whether a relative or friend or not, who satisfies the commissioners that it is proper for them to grant such order; and on production to the commissioners of the certificates of the medical practitioners so authorized, certifying that . . . . they are of opinion that the patient may, without risk or injury to himself or the public, be discharged, the commissioners may order the patient to be discharged at the expiration of ten days from the date of the order."

Henry Sutton, for the commissioners, showed cause.—Throughout this Act the Legislature has left the question of the discharge of a person detained as of unsound mind to the discretion of the commissioners. They are not bound to act upon the certificates of the two medical practitioners whom they have authorized to examine the patient, but under the section they have a discretion either to order or to refuse to order the discharge of a patient. The words of the section are that the commissioners "may" order the discharge of the patient. This clearly confers upon them a power to act upon the certificates and order the discharge, but it does not impose upon them any obligation to do so: Julius v. Bishop of Oxford, 28 W. R. 726, 5 App. Cas. 214. If the commissioners had not a discretion in the matter it would be in the power of the two medical practitioners who might examine the patient, and who might have no knowledge of lunacy matters, to compel the commissioners to order the discharge. If the patient is dissatisfied with the decision of the commissioners an application can be made on his behalf, under section 90, to a judge at chambers, who can order that the question whether the patient is of sound mind or not should be tried by a jury.

Tindal Atkinson, in support of the rule.—As the patient can be detained under the certificates of two medical practitioners, so he can be discharged upon the certificates of two medical practitioners. It is discretionary with the commissioners whether they will authorize the examination of the patient by two medical men under section 49; but if they so authorize the examination and the two medical practitioners certify that the patient may safely be discharged, then the discretion of the commissioners is at an end, and they are bound to act upon such certificates and order the discharge. In such a case the word "may" in the section must be construed as equivalent to "shall," and as imposing an obligation: Julius v. Bishop of Oxford.

CAVE, J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. It is quite clear that section 49 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, does empower the commissioners to order the patient to be discharged. But what the applicant for this rule has to satisfy us of is, that the section not only empowers the commissioners to so order, but that it requires them to so order, and he has entirely failed to satisfy us of that. The management of lunatics is committed in great measure to the commissioners, and the Legislature has appointed these commissioners, with the assistance of their medical advisers, to look after the care and safety of lunatics. That being so, it would be an extraordinary construction of the Act to hold that the Legislature should have superseded the commissioners altogether in favour of two medical practitioners with regard to whose election no rules whatever were laid down, the only requirement being that they should be persons of whom the commissioners approve. That cannot mean that the commissioners are to refuse to approve of any medical practitioners when they are not satisfied that such practitioners will take their view of the matter, consequently it requires no man of any particular ability or note, but merely the ordinary medical practitioner, against whose character and qualification as a medical practitioner nothing can be said. Upon receiving a certificate from a practitioner of this kind, though he may have no knowledge of lunacy, it is said that the Legislature intended to upset all they had done in the Act, and to take away from the commissioners the discretion which they are peculiarly fitted to exercise, and to give the power of setting the lunatic free upon the world, not to the commissioners, but to these two practitioners chosen without precautions being taken as to what amount of knowledge they should have, or as to anything further than that they are medical practitioners of good character. I cannot conceive that could possibly have been the intention of the Legislature, and therefore it seems to me that Mr. Tindal Atkinson has entirely failed to show that there is a duty imposed upon the commissioners, as well as a power confided to them. If there is only a power confided to them it is one which they must exercise at their own discretion; and I entirely dissent from the view that, if it is a case of discretion the exercise of the discretion of the commissioners is to be brought for examination by this court before judges who know nothing about the matter in dispute, and who have no experience in dealing with lunacy matters. I am of opinion, therefore, that this rule ought to be discharged.

HOOD BARRS v. HERIOT. (a.)

Married woman—Restraint on anticipation—Costs—Appeal—Married Women's Property Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 65), s. 2.

The court has no jurisdiction under section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, to order the payment of costs of an appeal by a married woman, being the defendant in the action, out of separate property which she is restrained from anticipating.

Hood Barrs v. Cathcart (No. 3), 42 W. R. 633, [1894] 3 Ch. 376, approved.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff against two orders of Court of Appeal. The appellant had applied to the Court of Appeal for an order that respondent, a married woman, the defendant in the action, should pay the costs of an appeal by her from the High Court to the Court of Appeal, and that such costs should be payable out of her separate property, notwithstanding any restriction against anticipation pursuant to section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893; and had also appealed to the Court of Appeal against an order of Pollock, B., refusing an application by the appellant in chambers for an order that, pursuant to the final judgment of the House of Lords, the respondent should pay the costs of her appeal, and that such costs should be payable out of her separate estate, notwithstanding any restriction against anticipation according to the section in question. Both applications had been refused by the Court of Appeal.

Section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, is as follows: "In any action or proceeding now or hereafter instituted by a woman, or by a next friend on her behalf, the court before which such action or proceeding is pending shall have jurisdiction to judgment or order from time to time to order payment of the costs of the opposite party out of property which is subject to a restraint on anticipation, and may enforce such payment by the appointment of a receiver and the sale of the property or otherwise as may be just."

Appellant in person.—The court has jurisdiction under the 2nd section of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, for this is a proceeding instituted by her, it being her appeal. To hold otherwise would be a narrow construction. An action is pending so long as any proceeding can be taken in it. This is really an appeal from the decision in Hood Barrs v. Cathcart (No. 3), 42 W. R. 633, [1894] 3 Ch. 376.

Lord HERSCHELL.—The question in the present case is whether the court has jurisdiction to order payment of the costs of an appeal, notwithstanding a restraint on anticipation, in the case of a married woman. The question depends on the construction of section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893. In the present case the action was not brought by the married woman, but against her. Judgment having been given against her, she then appealed to the Court of Appeal, and the question relates to the costs of that appeal.

It is said that, although the action was not brought by her, yet the appeal in the action was a "proceeding instituted" by her within the meaning of the section. I should myself perhaps feel no indisposition so to construe the section, if it were possible, because there seems nothing unreasonable in the view that if an appeal is brought by a married woman which never ought to have been brought, and thereby costs are occasioned, the court should have jurisdiction to deal with the matter. The section does not compel them to exercise that jurisdiction in any particular way; the matter is left entirely to their own judgment. But however reasonable one might think such legislation would be, I do not think it is possible so to construe the section which your lordships are now considering. If we were to hold that an appeal presented by a married woman is a "proceeding instituted" by her, then I do not think it would be possible to avoid holding that any proceeding taken by a married woman in the course of an action against her would be a "proceeding" within the meaning of the section. The court, in each of those steps she might take in an action brought against her, would have jurisdiction to enter upon this enquiry and to deal separately and independently with the costs of each of those "proceedings" under the section. I do not think that was ever intended, nor do I think that the words which the Legislature has employed are apt to give the court any such jurisdiction. The words "in any action or proceeding instituted" refer, I think, to an action or some other litigation initiated by the married woman. Unless the proceeding is one which initiates litigation, it seems to me that it is not a "proceeding" within the true intent and meaning of the section upon which reliance is placed. If that construction be the correct one—and it is the construction adopted by the Court of Appeal in Hood Barrs v. Cathcart—it follows that the appellant's appeal must fail. In my opinion, that construction is a sound one, and it is the only one which it is possible to put upon the section, even though one might not have been unwilling, if one could, to embrace other cases within the section.

For these reasons I move your lordships that this appeal be dismissed.

WELTON v. SAFFERY. (a.)

Company—Shares—Issue of shares at a discount—Winding-up—Adjustment of rights of contributories inter se—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89)—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), ss. 24, 25.

Under no circumstances, and for no purpose whatever, can a company incorporated with limited liability under the Companies Acts issue shares at a discount, or on any terms relieving the shareholders from payment in full. The issue of such shares does not therefore constitute a contract between shareholders, even for the purpose of adjusting their rights among themselves, although this is expressly authorized by the articles of association, and the creditors and costs of winding up have been provided for.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 43 W. R. 117, [1895] 1 Ch. 255, affirmed; Lord Herschell dissenting.

Per Lord Davey.—The obligation to contribute to the assets of the company in one way or another the nominal amount of the shares, is part of the statutory constitution of every joint-stock company limited by shares embodied in its memorandum of association, and therefore not alterable by the company or by the unanimous consent of all the shareholders.

This was an appeal by Mr. Welton from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Halsbury, Lindley and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) made on the 21st of November, 1894, reported as In re Railway Time-Tables, &c., Co., 43 W. R. 117, [1895] 1 Ch. 255.

The facts are given at length in the judgments, and more particularly in that of Lord Herschell.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C. (Eve, Q.C., with him), for the appellant.—The shareholders can determine their position as to what are to be preferential shares, &c., in the winding up. Why not insert a clause determining the order and preference on distribution as to any calls they should make? Preference as to shares and capital is lawful, therefore it is a matter of drafting. The articles express these terms. Sections 6, 7, 8, 14, 15, 16, 18, 23, 25, 38, 102, 109, 133, sub-sections 9 and 10 of the Companies Act, 1862. It is a mere matter of language to carry out this object. Nothing in the Ooregum case, 41 W. R. 90, [1892] A. C. 125, is against the view I am presenting. In re Almada and Tirito Co., 36 W. R. 593, 38 Ch. D. 415, is no authority in present case. Nothing in Trevor v. Whitworth, 36 W. R. 145, 12 App. Cas. 409, is against my contention in this case. Maxwell's case, L. (a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord HALSBURY, C.—In this case a company limited by shares was duly registered in January, 1886. According to the memorandum of association its capital was to be £30,000, divided into 6,000 shares of £5 each. The memorandum also provided that there should be power to increase that capital and to issue fresh shares. Acting, apparently, on this power, in May and June of the same year the capital was increased to £40,000 and 2,000 additional shares of £5 each issued. One thousand four hundred of these shares were issued on terms which gave rise to the present litigation. Five hundred of these 1,400 shares were issued as fully paid up without having anything paid upon them at all, and 900 were issued as fully paid up when only 10s. per share was paid up. The company purported to do this under the terms of an article of association passed contemporaneously with the resolution itself, which provided that the directors might allot or otherwise dispose of the new shares thus created, to such persons, upon such terms and conditions, and at such times, as the directors thought fit, and either at a discount, premium, or otherwise. In March, 1892, the company was wound up, and Mr. Welton, who is the holder of a number of shares upon which nothing has been paid, and of shares upon which 10s. only has been paid, has been held liable to pay up the alleged existing liability on both classes of shares, notwithstanding they were issued to him pursuant to the authority purporting to be given by the 4th article above quoted, either as bonus shares because he subscribed for debentures, or as discount shares whereon 10s. each has been paid.

In respect of the liability to pay up the shares so far as it is necessary to satisfy creditors and the cost of winding up, I believe no doubt exists in the minds of any of this House. Since the Ooregum Gold Mining Co's case in this House it would be impossible to contend that that question is not covered by authority. But it is said that where the only object in making a call is to settle the rights of the shareholders inter se, the law laid down in the Ooregum case does not conclude the question.

I am unable to accede to that view. I think the Legislature, in permitting the existence of a company limited by shares and with limited liability, created a machinery out of which it is impossible by any expedient, either by company or shareholder, to act otherwise than in pursuance of the provisions of the statute. Whether for the purpose of settling the rights inter se, or for the purpose of satisfying creditors, it appears to me that the statute forces the company and shareholder alike to conform to the rule laid down, that a share for a fixed amount shall make the person agreeing to take that share liable for that amount. I think that is the decision in the Ooregum case, and though I am aware that a different view has been suggested where the question is not the payment of the debts of the company, but the settlement of the rights of the shareholders inter se, I am unable to see how this artificial creation, limited within its sphere of action by the statute under which it is created, can do anything contrary to the provisions of the statute. It is not a question for what purpose it is done. Dealing with it as I think it must be dealt with, as an artificial creation, it can only act as a company or as shareholder in either of those characters within the fetters created by the Act of Parliament.

It is said, and I think justly said, that people have been invited to take shares under an article of association which expressly provided that shares might be issued at a discount. It is, I think, hard for persons who have relied upon that assurance to find out that the article which authorized the issue of the shares at a discount was ultra vires of the company, because it is in conflict with the memorandum of association which by the statute itself must determine the rights in that respect, but not the less on that account must one insist that the statute must be obeyed. If one were to suppose that the whole 6,000 original shareholders or persons who became shareholders by purchase in the market were to have agreed that these shares should only be regarded as having 10s. due upon them, each of them might perhaps against himself establish some contract by which the person agreeing with him in his individual capacity might have rights, but it would not be in his capacity as shareholder, it would be in his capacity as individual. The liquidator can only recognize shareholders, and their relation to the company of which they are shareholders must be regulated by the Act of Parliament.

The right to have a call made where it is necessary to adjust the rights between the different shareholders themselves, appears to me not less imperative than if only the creditors were in question. The supposed bar to such a proceeding is the agreement not to ask more than 10s. per share upon the discount shares, but the whole question goes back to the same point if the Legislature has prohibited that. There is no such agreement. The directors have no power to make such an article. The company qua company have no power to agree to such an article, and those who have taken shares and paid for them in pursuance of the Act of Parliament I think have a right to have the other shares paid up which the Act of Parliament has enacted shall be liable to that payment.

In truth, though in form reserved by the discussion in the Ooregum case, I think the Ooregum case does decide the question now in debate, and whether they were bonus shares upon which nothing was paid, or discount shares upon which 10s. only was paid, the holders of those shares are, in my judgment, liable to make good for any company purpose, the amount of the money which, upon the face of the share, they undertake to pay. I confess it seems to me, however hardly it may operate upon individuals, to be a just and right thing that those who have completely discharged their statutory obligations should have a right to call upon the other shareholders to do as the former have done and pay what is due upon the shares.

No question as to the preference shares is really in debate.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the order appealed from ought to be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed with costs.

Lord WATSON.—I need not refer in detail to the facts of this appeal, which are fully explained in the judgments which are yet to be delivered by my noble and learned friends. But I find it necessary to indicate briefly the considerations upon which my decision rests, because I apprehend that they are not altogether the same with the reasons which have influenced some of the noble and learned lords with whom I agree in result.

In dealing with the questions which arise for our decision, there appear to me to be two points which must be kept in view. The first of those, which is now beyond the range of controversy, is that the provisions of the Act of 1862, as they have already been interpreted by the House, make it unlawful for a company incorporated with limited liability to issue at a discount any of its shares, whether ordinary or preference. The second point, which has not, in my opinion, been definitely settled by authority, involves the construction of the enactments of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. The decision of the House in the Ooregum Gold Mining Co.'s case carries that construction thus far, that no member of a limited company who is not protected by a proper contract, duly registered in terms of section 25, can have a good defence against payment of such proportion of the nominal amount of his shares as has not been paid in cash, when payment is required by the liquidator for the purpose of meeting the claims of creditors of the company or the cost of liquidation.

The appellant is the holder of preference shares, which were issued at a discount, in pursuance of a power reserved to the company by its memorandum of association "to issue any shares in the original or in any new capital as preferential or guaranteed or deferred shares," and of power conferred upon the directors by its articles of association to issue new shares "upon such terms and conditions, and with such rights and privileges annexed thereto, as the directors shall determine, and in particular such shares may be issued with a preferential or qualified right to dividends, and in the distribution of the assets of the company, and with a special or without any right of voting." I need hardly observe that a power expressed in these wide terms could give the directors no right to issue shares at a discount—a right which would be contrary to statute, even if it were expressly conferred by the memorandum of association. That proposition is not disputed by the appellant, who admits that if the call which is sought to be enforced in this case had been made upon him by the liquidator for the purpose of paying creditors or cost of liquidation, he would have been liable, notwithstanding the immunity purporting to be attached to the issue of his shares. But the call is not made upon him for either of these purposes. The creditors of the company have been paid in full, and the cost of liquidation has been provided for out of the assets of the concern and of calls made upon and responded to by the ordinary shareholders. In these circumstances the appellant maintains that the condition of immunity from calls, although ineffectual in law to the extent which he concedes, constitutes a contract valid inter socios, and binding upon the company and its ordinary members in all questions between them and the holders of these preference shares. Upon that ground he contends that he is not liable in any contribution in respect of his preference shares, because it is an admitted fact in the case that the sole object of the liquidator in making a call upon him is to repay to the ordinary shareholders money which they were under an obligation to pay so as to keep him indemnis.

I am not prepared to affirm that the enactments of section 25 of the Companies Act of 1867, which were certainly meant to give further security on payment to the creditors of the company, were also intended to take away, or even impair, any right to make future arrangements between ordinary and preference shareholders, through the medium of the company, in regard to the privileges to be borne by preference shares, which could have been lawfully made under the previous Companies Acts. No such arrangement can now be made, or, so far as I am able to judge, could ever have been lawfully made, to the effect of relieving preference shareholders of any part of their statutory liabilities to the creditors of the company. The rights and liabilities inter se of the members of different classes of shareholders, in relation to matters which do not concern or affect the interests of creditors, do not appear to me to stand in the same position. I can find no provision in the statute which either expressly or by implication enacts that ordinary shareholders desiring to raise additional capital by the issue of preference shares may not through the company undertake that the sum required to pay creditors in liquidation, and the costs of liquidation, shall be charged primarily upon the unpaid capital which they are liable to contribute, and that no contributions shall be required from the preference shareholders for the purpose of reimbursing them, or for any other purpose than meeting debts and costs of liquidation. Assuming always that proper means are employed for accomplishing that object, it is, in my opinion, perfectly lawful. It is true that no arrangement can be made which trenches upon the rights conferred by statute upon creditors. But, in so far as concerns what may be described as the free assets of the company, meaning by that expression its surplus assets remaining after paying all debts and costs of liquidation, the sole interest is in the members who are the units of the incorporation. It has never, so far as I am aware, been disputed that a condition may be lawfully attached to the issue of preference shares to the effect that in the event of their being at any time funds available for the declaration of a dividend, these shares shall carry a higher, or it may be a lower, dividend than the original shares. And in like manner it is, according to my apprehension, a lawful condition that in the event of there being surplus assets when the company is wound up, such surplus shall be apportioned, according to any rule which may be agreed on, amongst the different classes of shareholders. The truth is that all these are domestic matters, in which neither creditors nor the outside public have any interest, and with which, in my opinion, it is the policy of the Legislature not to interfere. I desire to add that, in my judgment, when conditions for which due provision is made in the constitution of the company are sanctioned by its shareholders, and are inserted in the contract under which a preference shareholder accepts his shares, such conditions, if they be of the character which I have just indicated, will form an integral part of the contract, and be enforceable by the shareholder either against the company or its liquidator.

The difficulty which I have felt in this case is one which I casually encountered, without requiring to solve it, in Ooregum Gold Mining Company's case. In the present case my difficulty assumes this form: Do the three contracts under which the appellant's shares were issued and accepted contain a severable and valid condition that the holders of such shares shall not, in the event of the company going into liquidation, be liable to make any payment for the purpose of equalizing the contribution of ordinary and preference shareholders? In all these cases the resolution of the shareholders giving authority for the increase of capital and the issue of shares by the directors in pursuance of such authority are in practically the same terms. The authority given was to issue the shares at a discount, and, although part only of their nominal amount had been paid, they were issued by the directors as fully paid up. It does not therefore admit of doubt, and it is not disputed, that the issue of the shares on these terms, and the resolutions authorizing it were ultra vires of the shareholders, the directors, and the company. Viewed in its integrity, the condition that partly paid shares should be issued as fully paid-up was an absolute nullity, and so was the authority given to issue them on these terms. But the appellant argues that the condition, when resolved into its compound elements, must be held to comprise not a single stipulation but a whole nest of stipulations, one of which only—that which exempts the shareholder from liability for debts and costs of liquidation—is ultra vires, and therefore contrary to law. He accordingly maintains that whilst the condition must be disregarded in so far as it involves any stipulation which can be shown to be ultra vires, it must be treated as a valid and subsisting contract, protecting him against any and every kind of liability in respect of his shares from which the company, with the sanction of its members, could have given him exemption in express terms and by a separate and substantive condition.

I entertain considerable doubts whether, having regard to the terms of the condition and to the vice by which it is affected, it is capable of being dealt with in the manner proposed by the appellant; but I do not consider it necessary to determine that point. Apart from the rule of ultra vires, it appears to me that the contract is not one which can be so severed into parts. I find it impossible to speculate what form the arrangement might have assumed if the parties had at the time known and believed that the issue of shares at a discount was contrary to the statute law. The position of the appellant is no doubt a hard one, but it results from the original allottee of his shares having relied on a mistaken view of the law; and I am apprehensive that an attempt to sever the condition in the manner proposed might result in making a contract for the parties which they had not in their contemplation.

For these reasons I concur in the judgment moved by the Lord Chancellor.

Lord HERSCHELL.—The questions which arise in this case are of far-reaching importance. They concern not only the parties to this litigation, but the shareholders in many other public companies. The facts are somewhat complicated, because they relate to three different classes of shares held by the appellant. On the 5th of January, 1886, the Railway Time-Tables Publishing Co. was registered as a company, with limited liability. The original capital was £30,000, divided into 6,000 shares of £5 each. All the shares, with the exception of ten issued to the persons signing the memorandum of association, which were paid for in cash, were under a duly registered agreement allotted to the vendor to the company or his nominees, as the consideration for the transfer of the copyright, goodwill, plant, and stock-in-trade of his business. By a special resolution of the company, confirmed on the 11th of June, 1886, the capital was increased to £40,000 by the creation of 2,000 shares of £5 each. Of these, 600 were issued and paid for in cash, 500 as bonus shares, and 900 as discount shares. A second special resolution was confirmed on the same day, substituting new articles for those contained in Table A. To some of those it will be necessary presently to direct particular attention.

In July, 1886, the directors determined, for the purpose of raising funds which were required to carry on the affairs of the company, to issue debentures of £10 each to the amount of £3,000, bearing interest at six per cent., and to issue to the subscriber for each of those debentures two fully paid-up shares of £5 each. At an extraordinary meeting of the company held on the 29th of July, the action of the directors with reference to the issue of debentures was approved, and they accordingly issued debentures to the extent of £2,500, and two fully paid-up shares to each subscriber of £10. Contracts were entered into as to 490 of the 500 bonus shares, providing for their issue as fully paid-up, and such contracts were duly filed. By a special resolution duly confirmed on the 29th of November, 1886, the capital was further increased by £25,000 by the creation of 5,000 additional shares of £5 each. These shares were, in the first instance, offered to the existing shareholders at the price of £1 per share. This proposal not having met with a satisfactory response, they were again offered at the reduced price of 10s. a share, and on those terms not only these 5,000 shares but also the 900 above alluded to as discount shares were allotted. By another special resolution of the company duly confirmed on the 10th of February, 1888, the capital of the company was further increased to £100,000, by the creation of 7,000 additional shares of £5 each entitled to a preferential dividend of seven per cent.; 1,680 of these shares were allotted to a Mr. Hoare, who was a creditor of the company in respect of debentures and otherwise; only a portion of these debentures, however, represented a present debt; it has therefore been held that no more than 1,112 of the shares can be regarded as fully paid, that 567 must be treated as wholly unpaid, and one with £2 10s. paid.

At the time when an order was made to wind up the company, the appellant was the holder of 215 of the bonus shares, as to 205 of which an agreement had been duly filed. He was the holder of 4,460 discount shares, as to 640 of which there were registered contracts. He also held 1,680 of the preference shares. Two calls have been made, amounting together to £2 15s. on the bonus, discount, and preference shares, for the purpose of satisfying the liabilities of the company and of paying the costs, charges, and expenses of and incidental to the winding up. As to these calls no question arises. Another call has, however, been sanctioned on these shares of £2 5s., the balance remaining uncalled, to enable the liquidator, by means thereof, to adjust the rights of the contributories inter se; in other words, to provide funds for the purpose of making repayment to the ordinary shareholders.

Before proceeding to consider what are the rights of the contributories inter se, it will be expedient to call attention to some of the provisions to be found in the memorandum and articles of association. By the former, power was taken to increase the capital and to issue any shares in the original or in any new capital as preferential or guaranteed or deferred shares. By the 4th article it was provided that the shares should be under the control of the directors, who might allot or otherwise dispose of the same to such persons, on such terms and conditions, and at such times, as the directors thought fit, and either at a discount, premium, or otherwise. By the 42nd article new shares were to be issued upon such terms and conditions, and with such rights and privileges annexed thereto, as the directors might determine, and in particular such shares might be issued with a preferential or qualified right to dividends and in the distribution of assets by the company. The 140th article is in these terms: "If the company shall be wound up, and the surplus assets shall be insufficient to repay the whole of the paid-up capital, such surplus assets shall be distributed so that as nearly as may be the losses shall be borne by the members in proportion to the capital paid up, or which ought to have been paid up, on the shares held by them respectively at the commencement of the winding up. But this clause is to be without prejudice to the rights of the holders of shares issued upon special conditions."

I will consider, in the first instance, the case of the shares issued at a discount—that is to say, the £5 shares which were issued as fully paid-up in consideration of the payment of 10s. per share. There can be no doubt after the decision in the case of the Oregum Gold Mining Co.'s case that the issue of the shares at a discount was so far invalid that it did not prevent the holder of them from being liable to contribute to the full amount of the shares for the purpose of paying the creditors of the company. Whatever the dicta bearing on the point, that case did not determine the question what was the effect of such an issue as regards the shareholders inter se in the case of a winding up of the company. The decision was mainly founded on the 8th and 38th sections of the Act of 1862 and on section 25 of the Act of 1867. A careful consideration of these provisions is essential to a correct view of the limits of the decision referred to.

The 8th section prescribes that in the case of a company formed on the principle of having the liability of its members limited to the amount unpaid on their shares, the memorandum of association shall state, inter alia, the amount of the capital with which the company proposes to be registered divided into shares of a certain fixed amount. This fixed amount is by section 38 to be the limit of their liability in case the company is ordered to be wound up. I think it very important to observe that the statement in the memorandum of association just mentioned, as prescribed in section 8, and to which so much weight was attached in the Ooregum Gold Mining Co.'s case, applies only to companies with limited liability. By the express terms of section 10 of the Companies Act, 1862, where a company is formed on the principle of having no limit placed on the liability of its members, the memorandum of association need not contain any such statement. This appears to me to show that the provision contained in section 8, sub-section 5, was enacted for the purpose of protecting the creditors of a company, the liability of the shareholders of which was limited. They were not to be liable beyond the fixed amount stated, but they were to be liable to that amount, and the design was that the memorandum should give notice to all who trusted the company of the extent of the members' liability. The enactment, in my opinion, does not and was not intended to determine the rights or liabilities of members of the company inter se. So far as regards the members of the company inter se, there were no more reasons for hampering them in any arrangements they might choose to make as to the interest they should have in the capital or assets of the company or as to the proportion in which they should share its profits or discharge its liabilities in the case of a limited than of an unlimited company. The 38th section provides that in the event of a company being wound up every member of such company shall be liable to contribute to the assets of the company to an amount sufficient for the payment of the debts and liabilities of the company and the costs, charges, and expenses of the winding-up, and for the payment of such sums as may be required for the adjustment of the rights of the contributories amongst themselves, with certain qualifications, of which the following is one: (4) "In the case of a company limited by shares no contribution shall be required from any member exceeding the amount, if any, unpaid on the shares in respect of which he is liable as a present or past member." It is to be observed that, apart from the qualifications, the enacting part of section 38 applies equally, whether the liability of the member is limited or unlimited. What the rights of the contributories amongst themselves are, for the adjustment of which members are to contribute the sums required, is not determined by any enactment of the Companies Act. It is not provided that, for the purpose of such an adjustment, every member shall be liable to contribute to the assets of the company such a sum as will make the payment of each member the same in respect of each share which he holds. How, then, are the rights of the contributories inter se to be ascertained? I reply, from the terms of the articles of association of the company and the acts done by the company under the powers conferred by them.

In the absence of any provision to the contrary, it would no doubt be right to assume that every shareholder was intended to contribute an equal sum in respect of his share, and calls would be rightly made for the purpose of enforcing this equality. The statute, however, does not provide that the liquidator shall make calls for the purpose of equalizing the payments made by the contributories in respect of their shares, but only that he shall make them for the purpose of adjusting the rights of the contributories. What those rights are, and what payments must be made to adjust them, are left undetermined by the statute. It no more requires that, inter se, every shareholder shall contribute alike to the funds of the company, or share alike in the distribution of its surplus assets, than it does that shareholders who have contributed the same amount to its capital shall take the same share of the profits it earns. In the absence of any provision to the contrary, each shareholder could, no doubt, claim a share of the profits proportionate to the share in which he had contributed to the capital. But it is, of course, everyday experience that the articles of a company provide for preference shareholders who are to receive a certain payment out of the profits before the other shareholders receive anything.

I think, then, it is a fallacy to assume that the liquidator may in all cases make calls upon shareholders in order to equalize the payments in respect of all the shares. I can find no warrant for such proposition in the provisions of the statute; and for the reasons I have given it does not seem to me in the least to follow from the circumstance that every shareholder is, under the statute, liable to pay the amount unpaid on his share. What calls may be made in order to adjust the rights of the contributories inter se is, in my opinion, in no way determined by the decision in the Oorequm Gold Mining Co.'s case, that the holder of every share in a limited company is liable to pay in cash the amount of his share. It no more determines to what extent this liability may be enforced in a particular case to adjust the rights of contributories than it does to what extent it can be enforced for the purpose of paying the debts of the company and the expenses of the litigation. In the latter case the amount of calls which can be made, within the limit of liability, depends upon the amount of the debts and expenses; in the former upon the rights of the contributories inter se, whatever they may be. But the liability to pay the amount of the share fixed by the memorandum no more ascertains what those rights are than it does the amount of the debts and the expenses of the liquidation.

I have already drawn attention to the fact that the provision we are considering applies alike to unlimited and limited companies. How are the rights of the contributories any more determined by the fact that in the latter companies there is liability only to a certain amount than they are in the former case by the fact that the liability is without limit; or why in the one case more than in the other must calls be made, independently of the provisions of the articles for the purpose of equalizing the payments of the members?

Section 16 of the Act of 1862 provides that the articles of association, when registered, shall bind the company and the members thereof to the same extent as if each member had signed his name and affixed his seal thereto, and there were in such articles contained a covenant on the part of himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, to conform to all the regulations contained in such articles subject to the provisions of this Act. The articles thus become in effect a contract under seal by each member of the company, and regulate his rights. They cannot, of course, diminish or affect any liability created by the express terms of the statute, but, as I have said, the statute does not purport to settle the rights of the members inter se, it leaves these to be determined by the articles (or the articles and memorandum together), which are the social contract regulating those rights.

I think it was intended to permit perfect freedom in this respect. It is quite true that the articles constitute a contract between each member and the company, and that there is no contract in terms between the individual members of the company, but the articles do not any the less, in my opinion, regulate their rights inter se. Such rights can only be enforced by or against a member through the company, or through the liquidator representing the company; but I think that no member has, as between himself and another member, any right beyond that which the contract with the company gives.

It is for this reason that I cannot agree with the view taken by the Court of Appeal in In re Weymouth and Channel Islands Steam Packet Co., and which was pointedly put by Bowen, L.J., that, in order to maintain the proposition for which the appellant here contends it is necessary to imply a contract between the individual members apart from the provisions to be found in the articles. Nor can I agree that the contract made by those who take shares issued at a discount is an "illegal" contract, though it is no doubt ineffectual to enable the holder to escape from further calls for all purposes for which by section 38 of the Act contributions may be enforced.

It was not denied by counsel for the respondent that the articles might provide for different classes of shareholders having different rights—that, for example, members might be entitled to a preference in respect of dividend or in the distribution of the assets of the company. I can see nothing in the statute to prevent the articles of a company providing for any such differences in the rights and liabilities of the members inter se as may be thought expedient. Indeed, to take an example, section 24 of the Companies Act, 1867, expressly recognizes that a company may make arrangements, on the issue of shares, for a difference between the holders of such shares in the amount of the calls to be paid and in the time of payment of such calls.

There is nothing, in my judgment, in the 25th section of the same Act which militates against the view I have expressed. It provides that every share in a company shall be deemed and taken to have been issued, and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by a duly filed contract. I do not question that the shares issued at a discount in the present case must be deemed to have been issued and to be held on those terms, but this does not determine the amount of contribution which the liquidator is entitled to require from a member. That must be ascertained by inquiring how much beyond what is necessary to pay the debts of the company and the expenses of winding-up is requisite in order to adjust the rights of the members inter se. The argument for the respondent involves the assumption that after the debts and expenses of winding-up are provided for, every member must be bound in respect of each share he holds to contribute an equal sum to the funds of the company in order to adjust their rights, an assumption for which I can see no warrant in the statute. I have, therefore, arrived at the conclusion that there is nothing to prevent company providing by its articles that certain members or a certain class of members shall as between themselves and other members be entitled to equal share in the assets of the company, although they have made smaller payments in respect of their shares, and that they shall not be bound to contribute more than a specified amount, although this may be less than the amount which they are liable to contribute for the purpose of paying the debts of the company and the expenses of winding-up.

The next questions which arise are, have the company done so in the present case, and how ought the rights of the members amongst themselves to be adjusted? The articles of the company distinctly authorized the directors to issue the shares at a discount—that is to say, on the terms that on payment of less than their full amount they should be treated as fully paid up; and they were issued on the terms that the person taking them should not be liable to pay more than 10s. per share in respect of them. At the time this was done there was judicial authority for the view that this could lawfully be done even to the extent of exonerating the holder from further liability for the purpose of satisfying the debts of the company. There can be no doubt that both those who took the shares and the other members of the company intended and anticipated that no further call should be made upon them. In so far as the claims of creditors are concerned, it has since been held that the provisions of the statute render the attempt thus to limit the liability to something less than the amount of the shares nugatory, even though all the members of the company had expressly determined that this should be done. But is there anything to prevent its being binding so far as the members themselves are concerned? If I am right in thinking that a company might be constituted with articles providing for this result, I can see no reason why the article providing for the issue of shares on which no more than a special sum was to be paid, should not be binding in respect of shares issued on those terms upon all members of the company. Why should members who have become as much bound by the articles as if they had executed them under seal, in accordance with the provisions of which shares have been taken on the terms that no more than 10s. should be paid in respect of them, be allowed to say that, to adjust their rights and to diminish their loss, or even put money in their pockets, further payment should be required? It would be, I think, much more consonant with recognized principles to hold the members bound, and the transaction valid, in so far as the statute does not invalidate it. Any other conclusion would lead, in many cases, to grievous injustice where companies and their members have acted in good faith, but under an erroneous view of the law. In the present case, for example, it may be that the original shares, or some of them, are still held by the vendor to the company to whom they were allotted as fully paid up, so that a member who has come in when the affairs of the company were desperate would be compelled to find money to provide for a cash payment to the vendor, whose business turned out so unprofitable. Or, again, the shares may have been bought by the present members for 10s. a share, and the contribution of the holder of discount shares might more than recoup this amount. If the statute compels such results, we must not shrink from construing it correctly because this construction would lead to injustice. But if, without violating any legal principle, this can be avoided, I think it ought to be done.

I may here observe that the clause of the articles which provides for the distribution of the surplus assets, and which requires that they shall be distributed so that the losses should be borne by the members in proportion to the capital paid up, or which ought to have been paid up, on the shares held by them, was "to be without prejudice to the rights of the holders of shares issued upon special conditions."

I do not think that if the holders of discount shares are right in their present contention, it follows that they would be entitled to be recouped out of the contributions of the other members the sums they have been compelled to pay for the discharge of the debts of the company. It is one thing to say that they are not bound to make a contribution merely for the benefit of the other members, that these possess no rights for the adjustment of which this is necessary, and another thing to imply an obligation on the part of the other members to make good any sums which the discount shareholders are, under the provisions of the statute, held bound to pay.

I do not feel pressed by the difficulties which it is suggested would flow from such a conclusion. It is part of the social contract that the holder of a discount share should be entitled to participate in the assets of the company equally with shareholders who have fully paid up their shares or become the holders of fully paid-up shares. No shareholder can be compelled to pay more than the nominal amount of his share. But if at the time of the winding up there be shares with a liability upon them, I cannot see why this liability should not be enforced to the full before the holders of these shares are entitled to participate equally in the distribution of surplus assets with those whose shares are, by the contract inter socios, to be treated as fully paid up. I cannot see what wrong will in any case be done to the shareholders other than the discount shareholders by the conclusion, which I think logically sound. On the contrary, they might in certain cases even obtain an advantage for which they did not bargain.

I have hitherto confined my consideration to the discount shares, but all that I have said is, in my opinion, equally applicable to the bonus shares allotted to the subscribers for debentures. The allotment of such shares was part of the consideration of a loan to the company, without which it would not have been made. Granting that in spite of this the holders are liable to contribute up to the amount of their shares for payment of the debts of the company, why should the other members be able to say that in order to adjust their rights as against these holders they should be compelled to make a further contribution?

I do not think that the preference shares issued as part of the consideration for the extinction of a debt of £13,402 can stand on a different footing. The directors had power under article 4 to issue shares on these terms so far as the members could give it.

I think the judgment ought to be reversed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—In the liquidation of the Railway Time-Tables Publishing Company, Limited, the position of affairs is this: The list of contributories has been settled, and there is no application before the court seeking to have it rectified. By means of calls made in the winding up all the debts of the company have been paid, and costs and expenses of the liquidation have been provided for. And now it is proposed to make a further call for the purpose of adjusting the rights of the contributories amongst themselves.

The original capital of the company was £30,000, divided into 6,000 shares of £5 each. On three occasions additions were made to the capital until, at last, it reached £100,000. All the shares were of the same nominal amount, and all were ordinary shares except those of the last issue, which were intended to carry a preferential dividend. With the exception of ten shares taken by the subscribers to the memorandum of association, the whole of the original capital was issued as fully paid-up under a duly registered contract in consideration of property made over to the company; 600 shares of the second issue were paid up in cash. The remainder of the capital was dealt with in a less regular manner. To induce persons to take debentures two ordinary shares, nominally paid up in full, were offered by way of bonus with every £10 debenture. Other shares were issued at a discount of ninety per cent., so that a £5 ordinary share, nominally paid up in full, was to be had for 10s. Then, in July, 1890, more than a year and a half before the liquidation commenced, a circular was sent by the directors to the holders of discount and bonus shares, calling their attention to recent decisions "under which," it was stated, "it would appear that certain liabilities are, in law, attached to these shares." The holders of discount shares were recommended to exchange them for preference shares at the rate of ten discount shares for one preference share; the holders of bonus shares were advised to surrender them to the company. These suggestions, however, were not adopted by the appellant, who was a large shareholder holding bonus shares and discount shares, as well as preference shares. All his shares were entered on the register as fully paid, and he continued to hold them all until the winding up. Upon the facts being then investigated, he was placed on the list of contributories in respect of 215 bonus shares, as the holder of shares on which nothing had been paid, and in respect of 4,460 discount shares, as the holder of shares on which there remained a liability of £4 10s. per share. There were, besides, 1,680 preference shares standing in his name. The chief clerk certified that they were all fully paid. Kekewich, J., however, decided that only 1,112 were fully paid, and that of the rest one was paid to the extent of £2 10s., while 567 were wholly unpaid. The appellant, having duly paid the former calls, objects to the call now proposed, on the ground that the shares standing in his name ought, by reason of the terms on which they were issued, to be treated as fully paid-up to the extent not required for the payment of the company's debts and the costs and expenses of liquidation.

Whatever colour there may be for the appellant's contention in regard to his bonus and discount shares, there can be none, it seems to me, in regard to his preference shares. They were not issued on special terms at all. They were meant to be paid for in full in the ordinary way. But it was held by the learned judge that the consideration for which they were issued could not be treated as payment in cash, and that if it amounted to payment in any other form there was no registered contract to satisfy the requirements of the Act of 1867.

As regards the shares which the directors purported to issue on special terms, it would perhaps have been more regular, and certainly it would have raised the question more plainly, if, instead of merely resisting the liquidator's summons, the appellant had made a substantive application asking the court to rectify the list of contributories or to make a declaration in his favour controlling its effect. Anyhow, the burthen lies upon him. It is for him to show that he has some equity clear enough and strong enough to relieve him from the ordinary consequences of his present position.

In the present state of things the application of the liquidator would seem to be a matter of course. It stands unchallenged on the records of the court that some of the contributories have discharged in full their obligation to the company, while others have not done so. Why should not those who have paid more than their proportionate share of the general liability call upon those who are behindhand for contribution? It was said that the statute does not in terms provide that calls are to be made for the purpose of equalizing the payments of members. That is quite true. The right to contribution does not depend on statute any more than it depends on contract. It is one of the plainest of equities; and although no doubt in the case of limited companies where there are successive issues of capital it may sometimes operate unexpectedly, and perhaps even harshly, on shareholders who come in at the very last moment, the apparent hardship is really due to their own want of prudence.

Why, then, I ask, is the appellant to be relieved from the obligation of contributing his proportionate share of the losses of the undertaking? It was said that there was a "social contract" to which effect ought to be given now that the rights of creditors are out of the way. There, as it seems to me, lies the fallacy. How was the supposed contract made? Who gave the requisite authority for making it? Not the company, nor the shareholders, nor any representative body of shareholders. It is beyond the powers of a limited company to limit the liability of shareholders in a manner inconsistent with the conditions of the memorandum of association. The directors, therefore, had no authority from the company to issue shares at a discount, or on any terms relieving the shareholder from liability to pay in full. The shareholders had no power to authorize the directors to do on behalf of the company that which the company itself could not authorize them to do. The articles of association no doubt empower the directors to issue shares on such terms as they think fit; but that must mean, of course, on such terms as they think fit consistently with the provisions of the Companies Acts. The articles in express terms purport to authorize the directors to issue shares at a discount. That provision, however, is in contravention of the Companies Act, 1862, and simply void; neither the company nor the shareholders, even if they had been unanimous, could have empowered the directors to do anything of the kind. If the directors acted without authority, how can their action bind those who are supposed to have given them authority, but who, in fact, gave them none? The truth is, as it seems to me, that there never was a contract between the company or the shareholders, on the one hand, and the persons to whom these discount shares were offered, on the other. There was an offer by the directors purporting to act on behalf of the company; but it was an offer of that which the company could not give, because the law does not allow it. There was an acceptance by the discount shareholders of that offer. But that offer and acceptance could not constitute a contract. Both parties acted under a misconception of law; and the whole thing was void. The company, however, improperly placed the names of the discount shareholders on the register, and they allowed their names to remain there until their remedy against the company was gone; and now they cannot be heard to say that they were not shareholders.

Your lordships were reminded that there was a judicial decision, for several years unreversed, which sanctioned the issue of shares at a discount. That is so. But it must be remembered that at the time when that decision was pronounced the current of authority had drifted somewhat away from the true principles of the Act of 1862. As soon as those principles were re-asserted and re-established by your lordships' House in Trevor v. Whitworth, it became clear again—clear, I think, beyond argument—that the shares of a company limited by shares could not be issued at a discount. The issue of shares at a discount is just as much an unauthorized reduction of capital as the purchase by a company of its own shares. And so it was held by the Court of Appeal in the Almada and Tirito case, and afterwards in this House in the Ooregum Gold Mining Co.'s case. Speaking for myself, I must say I do not think that the Ooregum case laid down any new law. It was no new departure. The governing principle is stated as plainly and as emphatically in Dent's case, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 768, in 1873 by the Lord Chancellor (Lord Selborne), as it was by any of the noble and learned lords who took part in the Ooregum case in 1892.

Holding, as this House afterwards held in the Ooregum Gold Mining Co.'s case, that the memorandum of association of a limited company has the effect of prescribing as well as of limiting the liability of it members, Lord Selborne points out, as has been pointed out over and over again, that, with certain exceptions not material for the present purpose, section 12 of the Act of 1862 forbids any alteration in the conditions contained in the memorandum. "It is," says his lordship, "quite certain that, under that clause, if there be found anything in the articles limiting the liability of the shareholders in a way inconsistent with the memorandum—anything tending to reduce the liability of the shareholders thereby prescribed—it is simply void." Nothing can be more to the point than that. So far the Ooregum Gold Mining Co.'s case goes: but it was not, I think, meant to go further. And, indeed, several of the noble and learned lords who took part in the judgment in that case guarded themselves against being supposed to determine or prejudice the present question. It may be that the principle on which the decisions in Dent's case and the Ooregum case proceed leaves little room for the appellant's contention. Still, if it could be shown that the appellant has any equity to be relieved from further liability—if the court could be "satisfied of the justice of the case," to use the words of the Act of 1862—I do not think the decision in the Ooregum case would be a fatal bar. Nor, with all deference to the view thrown out by the Court of Appeal in the case of In re Weymouth and Channel Islands Steam Packet Co., would it be a sufficient objection that the contract, if there be a contract, was one with the company and not with the shareholders. If directors, being duly authorized in that behalf, invite persons to take shares on certain terms varying the rights of members inter se, acceptance of the invitation must, I think, establish a contractual relation between the members themselves. But really all the arguments urged on behalf of the appellant, however they may be presented—and they were presented in various ways—must go back to contract as the foundation and starting-point. It was said, and said truly, that the directors might have issued shares with a preferential right as regards capital in the event of winding up, in which case the ordinary shareholders would have had no right to contribution, and then it was urged that to that extent, at any rate, effect should now be given to what was described as the intention of the parties. I could have understood that argument if I could have found a contract. It may well be that one party to a contract cannot escape from his obligations by pleading incapacity to perform them in full if the other party is willing to take something less than that which he bargained for. But if there is no contract, but only an agent acting without authority, I cannot see what equity there is to compel a principal to submit to one set of conditions because his agent has attempted ineffectually to bind him to another and a different set; nor is the case of the party disappointed by reason of the agent's want of authority, bettered by the circumstance that the relief he is seeking is not only different from but inconsistent with the position he would have occupied if the authority of the agent had been sufficient.

Some things were introduced into the discussion which are hardly matters of argument. It was said that if effect were to be given to the view of the Court of Appeal it would lead to great hardship in many cases. Perhaps it may. There is plenty of hardship in almost every case of winding up. But I must say I cannot see any particular hardship in the present case. The appellant was warned in time, but he chose to disregard the warning. If a man will remain on dangerous ground after he has been told of the risk, I do not think he has much reason to blame the persons who invited him there, especially when those who gave the invitation did their best to set things right by giving warning in time. Then it was said that some of the members now claiming contribution may have bought their shares in the market for less than the price asked from the discount shareholders. But surely the owner of a thing, whether he has paid much or little for it, is entitled to all the rights attached to it. It was said, further, that some of the claimants were the very persons who sold to the company the property which has turned out such a disastrous bargain. Can your lordships go into that matter? There is no evidence that the company gave too much for the property they bought. The failure of the company proves nothing. Is it not enough that the shares were, in fact, fully paid, and the honesty of the transaction is not impeached? These are small matters, and hardly, I think, worth noticing. But the question before the House is very serious and very important. It would be, I think, much to be regretted if your lordships were compelled to yield to the arguments of the appellant. These companies are the creature of statute, and by the statute to which they owe their being they must be bound in regard to shareholders as well as in regard to creditors in all matters coming within the conditions of the memorandum of association. Shareholders in these companies require protection just as much as creditors, perhaps even more; shareholders are not partners for all purposes; they have not all the rights of partners; they have practically no voice in the management of the concern. Their security in a great measure depends on the directors adhering to the requirements of the Act. A limited company cannot in matters within the conditions of its memorandum go on leading, as it were, two lives, one strict and precise and regular, and the other a life of greater freedom and laxity, substituting the easier yoke of "social contract" for the rigour of statutory directions. The confusion would be hopeless. Take the present case as an example. The questions are comparatively simple when you get to a winding-up; but in the meantime, what is the position of a so-called discount shareholder? Can calls be made upon him? If so, can calls be made to develop the business or only to meet the demands of creditors? Has he any right of recourse against the other shareholders? Then how about transfer? The directors could not allow these shares to be transferred on a certificate stating that they were fully paid, or they—see Hirsche v. Sims, [1894] A. C. 654, 43 W. R. Dig. 36—would be the only persons liable for the breach of trust in issuing them as fully paid. It is not necessary, I think, to pursue this point further. It seems to me that you would be met by practical difficulties at every turn if you were to accede to the view presented by the appellant.

I am of opinion that the judgment must be affirmed.

Lord MORRIS.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

I see nothing to limit the application of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, to the case of a creditor and the company—it applies as much to a shareholder or sets of shareholders and the company. It is general in its terms, applying to all cases of the issue of shares. Any agreement or resolution of the company to issue shares on terms short of full payment was consequently illegal—and the liquidator is bound to bring the appellant's shares to the same level of payment as the other shareholders by making a call for the purpose of levelling up. This appears to me clear on the statute, and to be the principle decided in the Ooregum case.

I entirely agree with the full reasons for arriving at this result which my noble and learned friend Lord Davey is about to read, and which I have had the advantage of seeing.

Lord DAVEY.—The Railway Time-Tables Publishing Co. (Limited) was registered on the 4th of January, 1886, under the Companies Acts as a company limited by shares. The memorandum of association contains the following clause: "The capital of the company is £30,000, divided into 6,000 shares of £5 each, with power to increase the capital and to issue any shares in the original or in any new capital as preferential, or guaranteed, or deferred shares." I do not know what was meant by "guaranteed shares," as distinguished from "preferential," and no explanation of that term has been offered at the Bar. No articles were registered with the memorandum. The regulations adopted for the conduct of the affairs of the company were, therefore, in the first instance, those contained in Table A in the first schedule to the Companies Act, 1862. All the original shares (except the ten subscribed for in the memorandum) were issued to the vendor as fully paid up under a registered contract, and it is not disputed that they were rightly so issued. They have been dealt with, and large numbers of them are in the hands of the general public.

By a special resolution passed and confirmed on the 25th of May and the 11th of June, 1886, the capital was increased to £40,000 by the creation of 2,000 additional shares of £5 each. Of these shares 600 were issued and paid up in cash, 500 were issued as what is called "bonus shares," and the remaining 900 were issued as what is called "discount shares." By a second resolution, passed and confirmed on the same dates, new articles of association were adopted in place of Table A. The material articles for the present purpose are those numbered 4, 41, 42, and 140, which are in the following terms:

4. "The shares shall be under the control of the directors, who may allot or otherwise dispose of the same to such person on such terms and conditions, and at such times, as the directors think fit, and either at a discount, premium, or otherwise."

41. "The company may from time to time increase the capital by the creation of new shares of such amount as may be deemed expedient."

42. "The new shares shall be issued upon such terms and conditions, and with such rights and privileges annexed thereto, as the directors shall determine, and in particular such shares may be issued with a preferential or qualified right to dividends and in the distribution of assets of the company, and with a special, or without any, right of voting."

Article 140 provides for the distribution of surplus assets in course of a winding-up in a manner not apparently differing from the usual way, and concludes with these words: "But this clause is to be without prejudice to the rights of holders of shares issued upon special conditions."

The bonus shares were issued to subscribers for debentures in the company as fully paid-up, without any consideration in money or money's worth except the subscription for the debentures. The discount shares, after being offered to the existing shareholders at the price of £1 per £5 share, were issued to Mr. Henry Hoare as fully paid up, in consideration of the payment of 10s. per share, or (in other words) at a discount of £4 10s. per share. Mr. Welton, the present appellant, is the holder of 215 discount shares, which he acquired for a nominal consideration from Hoare. As to 205 only of these shares agreements were duly filed in accordance with section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. The appellant has been placed on the list of contributories for the whole of these 215 shares as wholly unpaid. The appellant is also the holder of 4,460 discount shares which he also acquired from Hoare for a nominal consideration. As to 460 only of these shares agreements were filed. The appellant has been placed on the list of contributories as the holder of 4,460 shares, upon which £4 10s. remains unpaid. There was a further issue of preference shares, some of which were held by the appellant, but as to these the question is a different one, and I will mention it later.

Calls have been made in the course of winding-up on the bonus and discount shares, the proceeds of which (it is assumed) are sufficient for the payment of the debts of the company and the costs of winding-up. The liquidator now proposes to call up the balance of £2 5s. per share on the bonus and discount shares, for the purpose of adjusting the rights of the contributories inter se.

The appellant disputes the right of the liquidator to make the call for that purpose, and contends that, as between him and the other shareholders, his shares should, by reason of the terms on which the same were issued, be treated as paid up to the extent not required for payment of debts or costs of winding-up. This contention has been rejected by Kekewich, J., and by the Court of Appeal, following the previous decision of the latter court in the Weymouth Steam Packet Co.'s case.

The appellant's case was argued with great ability, and, as presented by his counsel, it had not only an appearance of plausibility, but an attractive air of fairness and good faith. He argued that, as between themselves, the shareholders were bound to give effect to the contract upon which the appellant had become a shareholder so far as they legally could do so, and although that contract could not have effect given to it as against creditors, there was no legal principle which should prevent the court from giving effect to it in a question inter socios; and, further that the rights of contributories inter se must be determined with reference to that contract. A full consideration of the case since the argument, has satisfied me that we cannot accede to the appellant's contention consistently with what has been decided by this House in the Ooregum Gold Mining Co.'s case and the settled principles of law applicable to joint stock companies incorporated with limited liability. The question now before the House was, it is true, left open in the Ooregum case, but the solution of it seems to me logically and necessarily to follow from what was decided in that case.

Let us ask what is really meant by the issue of a share at a discount? It means that although less than the nominal amount, or even (as in the case of the bonus shares) nothing whatever, has been paid up on the share, it is to be treated for all purposes of the company, and to be placed on the same footing as regards the rights of the shareholders, as if it had been fully paid up in cash. The consequence as regards the distribution of surplus assets in case of a winding-up would seem to be that the discount shareholder would have the right (a) if all the other shares were fully paid up to participate in the surplus in proportion to the shares; or (b) if some of the other shares were not fully paid up, to require a call to be made upon them, and to have the proceeds of such call distributed as surplus assets, or (which is the same thing) to have the difference between the amount considered as paid up on the discount shares and the amount actually paid up on the cash shares paid to the discount shareholder before any distribution of the residue of the surplus assets. In the present case, the appellant is resisting a call upon him, but the extent to which his argument must necessarily go in other conceivable cases should be considered. If the contract that no call shall be made upon the discount shareholders is valid as against shareholders, although not as against creditors, the result would also seem to be that the discount shareholder would be entitled to be recouped the calls which he had been obliged to pay contrary to the contract out of surplus assets before distribution, and then to participate pari passu in the ultimate residue (if any). If this be not so, the amount of calls which the holders of discount shares have to pay would depend on the promptness with which the liquidator might be able to realize the assets and pay the debts out of them, instead of making a call. Counsel for the appellant, in answer to a question which I took the liberty to ask, said that the company might make calls on the discount shares while the company was a going concern. But why? If he had had the courage of his argument, he would have replied "No," because the creditors have no rights whilst the company is a going concern except to sue the company, and the question is then entirely one inter socios. In short, the argument (in my judgment) must be that, except for the purpose of payment of debts and costs on a winding up, no call can be made upon a discount share beyond the specified amount, and, as between themselves, the contract is that no calls shall be made on the shares in question.

Now let us see what was decided in the Ooregum Gold Mining Co.'s case, and what was the basis of the decision. It was, in the first place, held in this House that the capital mentioned in the memorandum was intended to be the real capital of the company—that is, the capital represented by money or money's worth, and not merely the nominal capital for the purpose of fixing the proportionate rights of the members inter se. And it was further held that section 8 of the Companies Act, 1862, requiring the memorandum to contain the amount of the capital divided into shares of a fixed amount, combined with the statutory limitation of liability in section 38 (a), is equivalent to a statutory requirement that such fixed amount shall be payable in money or money's worth. "It seems to me," says the Lord Chancellor, "that the system thus created, by which the shareholder's liability is to be limited by the amount unpaid upon his share, renders it impossible for the company to depart from that requirement, and by any expedient to arrange with the shareholders that they should not be liable for the amount unpaid on their shares, although the amount of their shares has been in accordance with the Act of Parliament fixed at a certain sum of money."

It is, therefore, in my opinion, conclusively decided that the obligation to contribute to the assets of the company in one way or another the nominal amount of the shares is part of the statutory constitution of every joint-stock company limited by shares, embodied in its memorandum of association, and therefore not alterable by the company or by the unanimous consent of all the shareholders. It is a liability which the company cannot release or relieve the shareholder from. On the one hand, there is the liability to pay; and on the other hand there is the correlative right of every shareholder to insist on the due performance of the conditions of the memorandum.

It is familiar law that no article can be valid or binding upon the shareholders which is in conflict with the memorandum or with the general law. Nor does it admit of doubt that shareholders equally with creditors have the right to invoke the conditions contained in the memorandum and resist any infraction of them; and, in fact, until the winding-up takes place a creditor has no right to do so. That was the principle on which both the cases of Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co. were decided. Doubts have been entertained as to the correctness of the decision in those cases, and it has been thought that the priority between existing shareholders and the holders of new share capital created under a power is one of those matters of internal management which, if not expressly settled by the memorandum, may be settled by the articles. Dissent from the decision in the second case of Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co. has been expressed by one of your lordships in this House—Lord Macnaghten, in the British and American Trustee and Corporation v. Couper, 42 W. R. 652, [1894] A. C. 416, 417—and it has recently not been followed in the Court of Appeal—Andrews v. Gas Meter Co., ante, p. 321, [1897] 1 Ch. 361. In this case there is no doubt, after the decision in the Ooregum case, that the obligation to pay up the amount of the shares flows from and is part of that which the Act requires to be stated in the memorandum, and the shareholders have a right to the performance of that condition.

The social contract is to be found not in the articles alone, but in the memorandum and articles, and as much in the former document as in the latter. Therefore, in the ultimate adjustment of their rights inter se, which takes place before the final dissolution of the company, regard must be had to the primary obligation of every contributory to contribute the amount of his share to the assets of the company, and according to the ordinary principle of equity the contributories have the right to have the adjustment made on the basis that all have satisfied or will satisfy their primary obligation to the company. I do not think that any article or regulation of the company which ignores that primary liability or purports to provide for the adjustment of their rights on any other basis could validly be made, because it would be inconsistent with the memorandum as interpreted by this House. This opinion, I should observe, is perfectly consistent with a regulation being made for priority to certain shareholders on the distribution of surplus assets when ascertained and got in. But no contributory can take or retain anything out of the surplus assets until he has satisfied his primary obligation either by payment of or being debited in account with the amount remaining unpaid on his shares.

If this reasoning is sound, there is, in my opinion, an end of the appellant's case, because so much of article 4 as purported to empower the directors to issue shares at a discount is ultra vires the company altogether, and everything purporting to have been done under it is a nullity as against both shareholders and creditors in a winding-up. Article 140 must be read as applying only to special conditions which the company could legally attach to shares. No shareholder can derive any right as against his co-shareholders, or to have assets distributed otherwise than in accordance with law from an act of the directors or the company which is ultra vires.

But it is argued that the company might have done the same thing in another way—for example, if they had conferred on the bonus and discount shares a preference in distribution of capital which was within their powers. My present opinion is that in the particular circumstances of this case such a provision would probably have worked out the same result, although by a different road, as issuing the shares at a discount, but liable to calls for payment of debts. But I have already shown that in other perfectly conceivable circumstances the result would have been widely different, and the holders of the discount shares (if valid) might be entitled not only to be preferentially recouped out of surplus assets the calls they had paid, but also to participate in any remaining assets on the footing that their shares were paid up in full, or to have calls made upon other shareholders for the purpose of adjusting their rights, although they had not themselves, in fact, contributed towards the company's assets. I cannot, therefore, agree that the company could have done the same thing as issuing the shares at a discount inter socios in another way, and I think they could not. However, the company did not make the contract for attaching a priority to the shares. What the directors purported to do was to issue these shares free from liability for calls (altogether or beyond 10s. per share), and they no doubt believed they could do so, and intended to do so. It appears to me that it would be contrary to principle and unsound to split up a contract made alio intuitu, and convert it into a very different contract which the parties never thought they were making, because the contract as made cannot be carried into effect, but a similar result might in certain circumstances, and to a limited extent, be arrived at in a different way. Such a proceeding would not be giving effect to the contract, but making a new contract.

Of course, individual shareholders may deal with their own interests by contract in such way as they may think fit. But such contracts, whether made by all or some only of the shareholders, would create personal obligations, or an exceptio personalis against themselves only, and would not become a regulation of the company, or be binding on the transferees of the parties to it, or upon new or non-assenting shareholders. There is no suggestion here of any such private agreement outside the machinery of the Companies Acts. The parties interested in opposing the appellant seem to be the present holders of the original shares and of the new shares issued for cash. They may or may not be the same persons as were holders of shares at the time of the issue of the bonus and discount shares.

In the view that I take it is not necessary to decide the point; but I am of opinion, having regard to the language of section 25 of the Act of 1867, that the appellant could not have succeeded according to any view of the law as regards those bonus and discount shares, in respect of which no agreements have been filed.

There is a third class of shares mentioned in the case as preference shares. These shares were apparently issued as cash shares, and the contest has been whether they were in fact paid up. By an order of the 14th of June, 1893, some of the appellant's preference shares were declared to be fully paid, others wholly unpaid, and one to be paid to the extent of £2 10s. There is no appeal against this order, and I fail to understand what question can now arise respecting these preference shares.

I am therefore of opinion that the appellant has failed to show any special conditions attached to the issue of any of the three classes of shares held by him of which the court can take cognizance, and the rights and interests of himself and his co-contributories must be determined and adjusted on the basis that the appellant as well as the other contributories have contributed or will contribute the full amount of their shares to the company's assets. The appeal should, in my opinion, be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

PEARCE v. GARDNER. (a.)

Contract—Memorandum in writing—Letter—Envelope—Statute of Frauds, s. 4—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), s. 4.

Where a letter, which is relied on as a memorandum in writing of a contract to satisfy section 4 of the Statute of Frauds or section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, does not itself contain the name of the person to whom it is written, but is proved to have been sent enclosed in an envelope addressed to that person, the letter and the envelope ought to be considered as one document.

Application for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Grantham, J., and a jury.

The plaintiff sought to recover damages for breach of an alleged contract on the part of the defendant to sell to the plaintiff a bed of gravel for £60.

The question was whether there was a sufficient memorandum in writing of the contract to satisfy section 4 of the Statute of Frauds or section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

The plaintiff relied on a letter signed by the defendant and received by the plaintiff through the post. It commenced with the words "Dear Sir," and did not contain the plaintiff's name, but it was sent enclosed in an envelope addressed to the plaintiff. The jury found that the letter contained all the material terms of the contract.

Grantham, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendant applied for a new trial or judgment.

Blake Odgers, Q.C., and H. A. Forman, for the defendant.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question is whether the letter and the envelope can be considered as one document. I adopt that which is said in Dart on Vendors and Purchasers (6th ed.), p. 253: "In the case of a letter, if the name of the party to whom it is addressed appear in an indorsed direction, or be written at the foot of the letter, no difficulty on the above point can arise: if an envelope be used, the name may often not appear in the letter; but the court, it is conceived, would receive evidence connecting the envelope with the enclosure." In my opinion we must hold that the letter and the envelope constitute one document. There is, therefore, a sufficient memorandum in writing, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES and CHITTY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

In re WILLIAMS.
WILLIAMS v. WILLIAMS. (a.)

Will—Construction—Absolute gift in confidence—Precatory trust—Condition.

Where a testator gave his residuary estate to his wife absolutely in fullest confidence that she would carry out his wishes—viz., during her life pay the premiums on a policy on her own life (which was her own property), and at her death bequeath the moneys arising therefrom, and also from another policy on the testator's life, to his daughter,

Held (Rigby, L.J., dissentiente), that the words "in fullest confidence" were only an expression of desire on the part of the testator, and that the wife therefore took the residuary estate free from any obligation either by way of precatory trust or of condition.

Appeal from a decision of Romer, J.

The question involved was whether, on the construction of the testator's will, his widow was bound to bequeath the moneys arising from two policies therein mentioned to her daughter, or whether she had a discretion in the matter.

The will is fully stated in the judgment of A. L. Smith, L.J., and it is enough to say here that the testator gave his residuary estate to his wife absolutely, in the fullest confidence that she would carry out his wishes—namely, keep up the premiums on a policy of £1,000 on her life, and which was her own policy, and by her will bequeath to their daughter all moneys payable on the same as well as the moneys payable on a policy of £300 on the testator's life. The testator's own policy, apart from the £300, was worth more than the moneys payable on the £1,000 policy.

On the death of the testator his wife took possession of his property. She died in 1896, having by her will bequeathed the £300 policy to her daughter, but left the £1,000 policy away from her. The daughter claimed the money from her mother's executors.

Romer, J., held that there was no obligation on the mother to leave the £1,000 policy to her daughter, and from this decision the daughter appealed.

Neville, Q.C., and Arthur Rutherford, for the appellant.—This is a precatory trust. The law is well settled: Wright v. Atkyns, 1 T. & Russ. 143, at p. 157; Wood v. Cox, 2 My. & Cr. 684; Re Hamilton, 43 W. R. 577, [1895] 2 Ch. 370. [LINDLEY, L.J.—After all it comes round to this: What is the intention, and what is the true construction?] No man can betray the confidence reposed in him by a will, and then take a benefit under the will: Jarman, last ed., p. 415; Re Adams and Kensington Vestry, 32 W. R. 883, 27 Ch. D. 394; Mussoorie Bank v. Raynor, 31 W. R. 17, 7 App. Cas. 321; Re Diggles, Gregory v. Edmondson, 39 Ch. D. 253; 37 W. R. Dig. 205. Here you have the strongest imperative words that can be used—"in fullest confidence."

Levett, Q.C., and F. J. Lewis, for the executors of Mrs. Williams's will.—There is no trust. In the only case in which it was held that there was a trust to leave by will it was held that the trust was equivalent to a power to appoint. [RIGBY, L.J.—If a testator gives something to A., and directs A. to leave it by will to B., is that a trust or not?] It is; but in that case B. takes under the testator's will, and A.'s will has no effect at all. Here the testator begins with an absolute gift to his wife. He then expresses a confidence that she will pay premiums, but makes no provision for the payment of these premiums. He then expresses a confidence that she will make a will and leave the property to their daughter. To constitute a trust you must have imperative words. Wright v. Atkyns is in our clients' favour. [RIGBY, L.J.—In that case the persons to benefit were not ascertained.] If you apply the principle laid down in Wood v. Cox it is in favour of the respondents: Lambe v. Eames, 19 W. R. 659, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 597; Re Hutchinson and Tenant, 26 W. R. 904, 8 Ch. D. 540. [RIGBY, L.J.—The principle in all those cases was that if you made a power override an absolute gift the wife got nothing.] Here, if you make a power to leave by will override an absolute gift the wife cannot leave by will at all: Re Adams and Kensington Vestry. Here the testator creates no obligation, but simply expects that his widow will leave the policy to his daughter: Re Diggles, Gregory v. Edmondson; Re Hamilton; Hill v. Hill, ante, p. 371, [1897] 1 Q. B. 483. Here we are not dealing with a will which creates a trust in regular words, but with one which in one part creates a trust and in another employs the words "in fullest confidence." If these words create a trust you must in effect strike the word "absolute" out of the will. If there be a trust at all it only affects the £300 policy, and the widow has given this to her daughter. Then, as to the other property, the testator gives his own property to his wife in trust that she will give hers to her daughter. This is not a case of election at all. The doctrine of precatory trusts has never been applied to a case where a valid direct trust would not have been created.

Medd, for the surviving trustee of the testator's will.—There is no trust on my client. If there is a trust at all it affects the widow only: Re Diggles, Gregory v. Edmondson.

Neville, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 5.—LINDLEY, L.J.—The question to be determined is whether the testator's widow had a discretion reposed in her or an obligation imposed upon her with respect to the £1,000 policy if she accepted the property bequeathed to her by her husband's will. This depends on the language of the will.

There can be no doubt that equitable obligations whether trusts or conditions can be imposed by any language which is clear enough to show an intention to impose an obligation and is definite enough to enable the court to ascertain what the precise obligation is and in whose favour it is to be performed. There is also abundant authority for saying that if property is left to a person in confidence that he will dispose of it in a particular way as to which there is no ambiguity such words are amply sufficient to impose an obligation. Nothing can be plainer than Lord Eldon's statement to this effect in Wright v. Atkyns, 1 T. & Russ, at p. 157. The books are full of cases decided in accordance with the doctrine—see Shovelton v. Shovelton, 32 Beav. 143; Curnick v. Tucker, L. R. 17 Eq. 320, 22 W. R. Dig. 275; Le Marchant v. Le Marchant, 22 W. R. 839, L. R. 18 Eq. 414, in all of which the devise or bequest was to the devisee or legatee absolutely; see also other cases cited in Lewin on Trusts, 1310, ed. 8. But still in each case the whole will must be looked at, and unless it appears from the whole will that an obligation was intended to be imposed no obligation will be held to exist. Moreover, in some of the older cases obligations were inferred from language which in modern times would be thought insufficient to justify such an inference. It would, however, be an entire mistake to suppose that the old doctrine of precatory trusts is abolished. Trusts and equitable obligations to deal with property in a particular way can be imposed by any language which is clear enough to show an intention to impose them. The term "precatory" only has reference to forms of expression. Not only in wills, but in daily life, an expression may be imperative in its real meaning, although couched in language which is not imperative in form. A request is often a polite form of command. A trust is really nothing except a confidence reposed by one person in another and enforceable in a court of equity. In one sense it is true to say that a trust of property cannot be created by a person who is not entitled to that property. But there is no difficulty is disposing of one's own property upon condition, express or implied, that the person who takes it shall do something himself—e.g., shall dispose of his property in a particular way indicated by the owner of the property which he accepts. Moreover, a condition of this kind is enforceable in equity and need not amount to a common law condition—i.e., a condition involving a forfeiture of the property taken subject to the condition, if that condition is not performed.

Instances of conditions enforceable in equity will be found in Messenger v. Andrews, 4 Russ. 478; Re Skingley, 3 Ma. & G. 221; Wright v. Wilkin, 9 W. R. 161, 10 ibid., 403, 2 B. & Sm. 232, 259. The whole equitable doctrine of election, when a testator disposes of property not his own, is based upon the principle that a court of equity will enforce performance of implied conditions on which property is given and accepted.

Having made these preliminary observations I return to the testator's will. He has in terms given his property to his wife absolutely in confidence that she will herself leave the policy moneys by her will to her daughter, and he has appointed his wife and another person to be executors and trustees without indicating any duty which they are to perform as trustees, as distinguished from executors. These circumstances show, and I think conclusively show, that he did not intend his wife to be tenant for life only of the £300 policy. The £1,000 policy not being payable until her own death she could not be tenant for life of that.

The legal effect of a devise of real estate to a person in fee in confidence that he will leave it by will to somebody else was considered, and to a great extent settled by the House of Lords, in the celebrated case of Wright v. Atkyns, a full account of which will be found in Sugden's Law of Property, pp. 376 et seq. There property was devised to a Mrs. Atkyns in fee in confidence that she would leave it by will to the testator's "family." Sir Wm. Grant (17 Ves. 255) and Lord Eldon (19 Ves. 299) held that family meant heir-at-law, and that Mrs. Atkyns took only an estate for life. It followed from this that she was not entitled to commit waste. The House of Lords reversed this decision, and held that Mrs. Atkyns took an estate in fee and could not be restrained from committing waste. The injunction which had been granted pending the appeal (see 1 V. & B. 313) was, of course, dissolved. The case came again before Lord Eldon upon an application to restrain Mrs. Atkyns from applying the proceeds of the sale of any timber she might cut to her own use (see T. & R. 143). Lord Eldon there stated that on reconsideration he had no doubt that the House of Lords was right in deciding that Mrs. Atkyns took an estate in fee and not for life (1 T. & Russ. 154); but he nevertheless directed that the proceeds of any timber cut by her should be preserved until it could be decided to whom they would belong on Mrs. Atkyns' death. She again appealed from this decision to the House of Lords; and the House of Lords reversed it and held her entitled to those proceeds for her own benefit. The House did not decide who would be entitled to the property on her death, and did not decide whether she was under an obligation to devise the property to the testator's heir-at-law, or to any member of his family, if that word included other persons. But the House did decide that whatever "family" meant and whatever Mrs. Atkyns' obligations might be she took the property in fee simple; and that whoever might take the property under her will would take it as her devisee and not, as I understand the case, as an appointee under a power conferred on her by the testator. (See Sugden's work, above quoted, at pp. 381, 385, 387.) This point is extremely important.

This case goes far to show that the widow of the testator in the present case took his property absolutely and not for life only; and I am of opinion that she did so take. I have, moreover, no doubt that she took it absolutely in the sense of taking it free from the control of her co-trustee. But, further, I think that James, L.J., was right when he said in Irvine v. Sullivan, 17 W. R. 1083, L. R. 8 Eq. 673, that absolutely may refer to extent of interest, but it may mean a great deal more, and that its natural grammatical meaning is unfettered and unlimited—i.e., unlimited in point of estate, and unfettered in respect of any condition or trust.

Lord St. Leonards in his work on the Law of Property, published in 1849, wrote as follows (see p. 375): "The law as to the operation of words of recommendation, confidence, request, or the like, attached to an absolute gift, has in late times varied from the earlier authorities. In nearly every recent case the gift has been held to be uncontrolled by the request or recommendation made or confidence expressed. This undoubtedly simplifies the law, and it is not an unwholesome rule that if a testator really means his recommendation to be imperative he should express his intention in a mandatory form, but this conclusion was not arrived at without a considerable struggle." The more modern authorities, from Lamb v. Eames to In re Hamilton, show how strong the tendency now is to recognize this sensible rule.

The particularity with which the testator has stated what his wishes were, removes all difficulty in giving effect to those wishes if they are expressed in language which is shown by the will to be intended to be imperative, but such particularity does not supply the want of imperative language. The testator has employed the same language with respect to his own policy as with respect to his wife's. He has shown no intention of imposing an obligation on her in respect of one of them, and not in respect of the other. I feel great difficulty in holding that he has not left his own policy to her absolutely free from all trust and condition, and the difficulty of making any distinction between the two policies forces me to the conclusion that the widow is not put to her election as regards her own policy. I might not have come to this conclusion if he had not dealt with both policies in the same way, for to put her to her election as to her property does not fetter her enjoyment of his. The case is, in my opinion, one of great difficulty, and I am quite aware that there are decisions in the books which, if followed, would be in the daughter's favour. But our task is to construe the will before us, and other cases are useless for that purpose except so far as they establish some principle of law. There is no principle except to ascertain the intention of the testator from the words he has used, and to ascertain and give effect to the legal consequences of that intention when ascertained.

Having given the case my best attention, I have arrived at the conclusion that the testator has not used language sufficiently clear to impose upon his widow an obligation to leave either policy to his daughter. I believe, further, that he refrained from language imperative in its terms, such as upon trust or upon consideration, and that he used the language which he did because he really intended to trust his widow's discretion with respect to his daughter, and not to provide for his daughter himself by putting a legal fetter on his widow's power of disposition of her own policy or of the property which he left her. I read the will as expressing a wish that his daughter should have both policies unless his widow should see reason for otherwise disposing of them; but I do not find in the will a command to his widow to leave the policies to his daughter if his widow should think right to dispose of them otherwise.

The appeal ought, I think, to be dismissed.

SMITH, L.J.—I agree with the judgment of my brother Romer, and will state as shortly as I can why I do so. I have to construe the will of a testator according to its language, in view of the surrounding circumstances known to him when he made his will. The circumstances were these. The testator, who was a doctor at Mold, had a wife, two sons, and a daughter Lucy. He had property worth, we are told, about £2,000, including therein a policy upon his own life for £300, and his wife had in addition a policy running upon her life for £1,000 which belonged to her. In these circumstances the testator made his will. As regards his two sons, he left them nothing but his medical books and instruments equally between them. As regards his wife, as it seems to me, he left her everything he had in the world to leave, excepting the books and instruments above mentioned. The first material part of the will is this: "And as to all the rest and residue of my estate and effects, both real and personal, including chattels real, subject to the payment thereout of my debts, personal and testamentary expenses, I devise, give, and bequeath the same unto my wife Lucy, her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns absolutely."

I take it that clearer words of gift, showing a testator's intention that his wife should take for her own benefit all that he had, could not well be found in a will. It is said, however, that, notwithstanding this clear and explicit gift to the wife absolutely, that the words which follow show an intention to cut down these clear words of gift and to impose an obligation, as distinguished from a discretion, upon the wife, either by way of a precatory trust—that is, an implied trust—or by way of implied condition, that the wife was to leave by will her £1,000 policy and also the proceeds of the testator's £300 policy to their daughter Lucy.

The words are these, and this is the second material part of the will: "In the fullest confidence that she will carry out my wishes in the following particulars—namely, that she pays the premiums due and to become due during her life in respect of the policy for £1,000 on her own life, and that she by her will leaves the moneys to become due and payable under such policy, and also the moneys to become payable . . . under the £300 policy on my life to my daughter Lucy if she survives my wife, in trust for her sole and separate use, . . ." and he appointed his wife and the Rev. Mr. Williams executors and trustees of his will.

In my opinion no distinction can be drawn as to what the testator meant as regards the £1,000 policy belonging to his wife and the £300 policy belonging to himself, for each are placed in one and the same category. What the testator intended as to the one, in my judgment, he intended as to the other.

It should be noticed that, when the testator wished to create a trust, he does so by apt words, "in trust for her sole and separate use," and he appoints trustees, obviously well knowing what the words "trust" and "trustees" mean.

Why am I to hold that the testator, after such a clear gift to his wife absolutely, as I read it, for her own absolute benefit, when he used the words "in the fullest confidence that she will carry out my wishes in the following particulars," meant and intended the same thing as if he had said "in trust for my daughter Lucy"? It seems to me erroneous to say that each expression meant the same thing. Why use different words? It would not, I think, be in accordance with the ordinary canons of construction to hold that the different expressions meant one and the same thing. That the testator had implicit faith in his wife appears to me clear, for he left her everything in the world which he had to leave, with the meagre exception of the medical books and instruments, and that he placed full reliance in her carrying out his wishes I do not doubt, but that he imposed a trust precatory or otherwise upon her I cannot think. If he had intended an obligation by way of trust why did he not say so, and instead thereof merely express a confidence—that is, a reliance or hope—that she would carry out his wishes.

In the will the words "confidence" and trust are used in contrast to each other.

Moreover, how could the testator have meant to impose a trust as regards property which did not belong to him but to her.

In my judgment the testator imposed no implied trust upon his wife in favour of his daughter Lucy either as regards the £1,000 policy or the £300 policy, the proceeds of which last, as before stated, he left absolutely to his wife to deal with as she pleased.

I come now to the other alternative—viz., that the testator left his wife his property upon an implied condition that if she took his property she was to do the following acts: (1) Pay the premiums becoming due during her life upon her £1,000 policy; (2) that she should leave this policy so kept up to the daughter Lucy; (3) that she should leave the proceeds of the £300 policy which fell in to her upon the testator's death also to the daughter Lucy.

Where is the obligation to be found in the will that the wife after receiving the £300 under the policy upon the death of the testator, and which was left to her absolutely to do as she pleased with, was nevertheless to leave the £300 to the daughter Lucy? Why was the widow not entitled to spend the £300 if she desired to do so, and where is the obligation to lay by the equivalent, if she spent it, for Lucy?

Again, assume the widow became unable to pay the premiums falling due upon the £1,000 policy during her life. Why then, was the testator's property represented by the £2,000 to go over and away from the widow, or what was to happen to it?

Where is all this to be found in the will? I cannot think that the testator left his property to his wife upon any implied condition at all any more than he left it clogged with a precatory trust. In my opinion he left his property to his wife wholly unfettered by either.

Lindley, L.J., has reviewed the authorities and I agree in his judgment, but I wish to add a few remarks upon some of the cases which have occurred during the last quarter of a century, for it is said that I am bound by authority to hold contrary to what I am doing, and I think these cases show I am not so bound.

I first refer to the case, in 1871, of Lambe v. Eames, wherein James, L.J., used this notable language when dealing with a case of precatory or implied trust: "In hearing case after case cited, I could not help feeling that the officious kindness of the Court of Chancery in interposing trusts where, in many cases, the father of the family never meant to create trusts, must have been a very cruel kindness indeed." This is a remarkable statement coming from the source it does.

I will next take the case, in 1878, of In re Hutchinson and Tenant; there a testator gave all his property to his wife "absolutely, with full power for her to dispose of the same as she may think fit for the benefit of my family, having full confidence that she will do so."

Sir George Jessel followed Lambe v. Eames. [His lordship read the judgment, and continued:] This judgment of Sir George Jessel exactly expresses my view of the true construction of the will in the present case, and I adopt it and agree with it. It is said that I am wrong because the daughter Lucy in the present will is a definite individual, and therefore the object of the implied trust is well defined, whereas the word family in the case before Sir George Jessel was not so, and the object of the trust was therefore too uncertain to imply a trust. This does not appear to me to have been Sir George Jessel's view, for he said family meant children and therefore the object was sufficiently defined, yet, though this was so, he held there was no trust.

Again in 1884, in Re Adams and the Kensington Vestry, the court certainly approved of what James, L.J., had said in Lambe v. Eames, and of what Sir George Jessel had said in In re Hutchinson and Tenant. Cotton, L.J., saying: "But undoubtedly, to my mind, in the later cases, especially in Lambe v. Eames and In re Hutchinson and Tenant, both the Court of Appeal and the Master of the Rolls shewed a desire really to find out what, upon the true construction, was the meaning of the testator, rather than to lay hold of certain words which in other wills had been held to create a trust," and the learned lord justice expresses his opinion "that some of the older authorities went a great deal too far in holding that some particular words appearing in a will were sufficient to create a trust." I do not say that a precatory or implied trust may not still be created and exist, for I apprehend it may, or that an estate may not be left upon an implied condition, or in other words, subject to election, but I do say that, acting with a desire to find out what the will in the present case means, I cannot say that there is any implied trust or implied condition, and I cannot believe that such was the true intention of the testator.

In the case of In re Hamilton the court affirmed, and followed Adams and Kensington Vestry. In the case of Hill v. Hill in the other division of this court, although no authority upon the will in hand, there are observations by the lords justices therein which are by no means antagonistic to the judgment I have arrived at. For the reasons above I think that this appeal should be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—In this case the court is called upon to determine whether, on the true construction of the will of the testator, his wife, to whom, in the first instance, he gave his residuary real and personal estate in the following terms, "I give, devise, and bequeath the same unto my wife Lucy, her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, absolutely," was or was not by the words which followed made subject to a condition in favour of his daughter Lucy as to a policy of life assurance for £1,000 on the life of and belonging to the wife; in other words, whether she is subject to the doctrine of election as to the policy. A great deal has been said in argument and a great many cases cited as to what are awkwardly and, in my opinion, incorrectly called "precatory trusts." As I understand the law of the court, this phrase is nothing more than a misleading nickname. When a trust is once established it is equally a trust and has all the effects and incidents of a trust whether declared in clearly imperative terms by a testator or deduced upon a consideration of the whole will from language not amounting necessarily and in its primâ fâcie meaning to an imperative trust.

In the present case the question is one of condition or election, not of trust, as the testator could not declare a trust of his wife's property, but the cases as to trusts are so closely analogous that they must be examined, and it will be seen that the same doctrine has been laid down as to conditions and trusts. In theory I do not think that there ever has been, at any rate for a century, any doubt as to the principles on which a trust or condition should be deduced, if at all. If in some cases those principles were departed from, such cases must be treated as inconsistent with and overruled by the general current of authority. No authoritative case ever laid it down that there could be any other ground for deducing a trust or condition than the intention of the testator as shown by the will taken as a whole, though, no doubt, in older cases that intention was not unfrequently inferred on insufficient grounds. The general intention was always treated as the matter to be ascertained, but it was from very early times pointed out that there could be no imperative obligation unless the subject-matter and the objects were both clearly ascertained.

On these fundamental points there never has, in my opinion, been any real difference, though the application of them to particular instances has not always been satisfactory.

As early as 1782, in Harland v. Trigg (a leading case on this subject), 1 Bro. Ch. Cas. 142, Lord Thurlow said: "I think every will ought to be construed according to the intention of the testator where it can be collected"; and again, "I had a doubt whether the family could not claim some interest in the subject, but when I came to consider I take the rule of law to be this, that two things must concur to constitute these devises, the terms and the object." In that case the subject was clearly defined.

In the second suit of Wright v. Atkyns, hereafter dealt with particularly, Lord Eldon lays down the same law. First, that the words must be imperative; secondly, that the subject must be certain; thirdly, that the object must be as certain as the subject.

Again, Lord Langdale in Knight v. Knight, 3 Beav. 172, says: "As a general rule it has been laid down that when property is given absolutely to any person, and the same person is, by the giver who has power to command, recommended, or entreated, or wished to dispose of that property in favour of another, the recommendation, entreaty, or wish is held to create a trust. First, if the words are so used, that upon the whole they ought to be construed as imperative; secondly, if the subject of the recommendation or wish be certain; and thirdly, if the objects or persons intended to have the benefit of the recommendation or wish be also certain. In simple cases there is no difficulty in the application of the rule thus stated. If a testator gives £1,000 to A. B., desiring, wishing, recommending, or hoping that A. B. will, at his death, give the same sum or any certain part of it to C. D., it is considered that C. D. is an object of the testator's bounty, and A. B. is a trustee for him. No question arises upon the intention of the testator, upon the sum or subject intended to be given, or upon the person or object of the wish."

In the instance so given by Lord Langdale it is to be assumed that there is nothing in the will to prevent the words of request from being imperative. Very slight indications throwing doubt upon this might be sufficient to lead to a contrary conclusion. Lord Langdale can have had no doubt arising from the fact that the death of A. B. may be taken as the time when the gift is to take effect, or he would not have called this a simple case.

I have carefully examined all the authorities cited in argument, and many others, with the view not of comparing the words of one will with those of another, but of ascertaining whether any doubt has been thrown upon the principles so enunciated, and I cannot find a single case binding upon this court, or, indeed, any other, since the date of Wright v. Atkyns, in which they are in any way called in question. I find, indeed, repeated and, having regard to older decisions, most salutary warnings that the intention, having regard to the whole will, must always prevail, and statements that the doctrine must not be extended, but nothing to impeach the principles themselves. This, of course, is a different thing from saying that the principles have always been rightly applied, which I should not like to affirm, though I do not know any case binding on this court in which they have not.

The careful discussion of authorities contained in Lord St. Leonards' work on the law of property as administered in the House of Lords (1849, pp. 375-400) seems to me to be important as containing the most exhaustive examination of these cases, and particularly as showing that the obligation, if any, may as well take the form of a condition as a trust.

The first case dealt with is Wright v. Atkyns. There the testator gave "all his leasehold, freehold, and copyhold estates" (a mixed property descendible according to different rules) unto his mother and her heirs for ever in the fullest confidence that after her decease she would devise the property to his family. There were two suits, the first by the testator's uncle and heir-at-law at his death, the main object of which was to establish an incumbrance, though incidentally a question as to timber arose. The second was by the devisees of the uncle and a lady who became the testator's heir-at-law on the uncle's death, and the main object in that suit was to ascertain the rights of the devisee as to timber. No final decision as to the construction of the will was arrived at except as to the estate taken in the first instance by the wife and her power to cut timber and apply the proceeds for her own use. Incidentally points of importance were decided on two appeals to the House of Lords.

In the second suit I may at once state that the only unsolved difficulty depended, in my opinion, on the question whether the objects were described with sufficient certainty by the word "family." Sir Wm. Grant held (but wrongly, as was decided by the House of Lords, and afterwards admitted by Lord Eldon) that the wife was tenant for life impeachable for waste, and Lord Eldon, though with much hesitation, declined to reverse his decision. Both judges treated the question as to the meaning of the word "family" as creating the real difficulty, and the reports of the appeals by Lord St. Leonards to the House of Lords shows that the same question was really treated there as the material one. Lord St. Leonards was counsel for the wife throughout, and gives at p. 377 the principal reasons on each side in the first appeal, which may be summarized as follows: For the appellant (1) No trust or trusts for descendants and not for heir-at-law only; (2) That if by construction Mrs. Atkyns was in equity bound to leave the estates at her death to the testator's family, she was entitled to all rights incident to an owner in fee simple. For the respondents (1) Trust for heir-at-law of testator; (2) Appellant simply tenant for life in equity, therefore impeachable for waste. From the elaborate note of the argument of Lord St. Leonards, pp. 377 to 381, it appears that the first point raised for the defendant turned entirely upon the uncertainty of the meaning of the word family. This point was not decided. Lord Redesdale said in his opinion (p. 381) that Mrs. Atkyns was tenant in fee not impeachable for waste (p. 382), but went on to say that the "question ought not to be prejudiced, no person being before the House properly to contest it." Those persons are, he said, "those capable under a will executed by Mrs. Atkyns. There may be no such persons." He also said, "court may hold the words only recommendatory." From the context it appears that the last words had reference to the uncertainty of the objects. Lord Redesdale's opinion on these points was not so obscurely expressed, but it was extra judicial, and not intended to prejudice any question.

The only decision of the House of Lords on this first appeal was that Mrs. Atkyns was not tenant for life, and that the injunction order so far as it depended on the assumption of her being only tenant for life must be reversed (p. 382). The testator's uncle and heir-at-law was by this time dead and could not take under a will of Mrs. Atkyns. In a suit brought by his devisees and the heiress-at-law of the original testator (p. 384), Lord Eldon allowed Mrs. Atkyns to cut timber in a husbandlike manner, directing an account and security for the sale moneys or payment into court. Lord Eldon adopted the view that she was owner in fee subject to a trust or condition (inclining to the view that it was a trust but not deciding the point), and expressed his own opinion (at p. 163 of 1 T. & Russ.) that the wife was entitled to keep the timber money, but did not see how he could avoid keeping the money in medio to abide the decision on the construction of the will which would be given on the wife's death. He got at length into the difficulties which would attend the interpretation of the words "my family," but, of course, decided nothing. A second appeal was then brought to the House of Lords. Lord St. Leonards gives (at pp. 385-388) a note of the opinions of the noble and learned lords, from which I make the following extracts:

Lord Redesdale (p. 385): "Not imperative where the objects are uncertain or the thing is unascertained. Here persons very inaccurately ascertained 'his family.' Mrs. A. has at law the fee. It may be said subject to a condition, but that cannot be fully decided till her death" (p. 385). "No person has now or during her life can have more than a possibility of benefit, for the persons taking must take by her devise, and must be living at her death," and, again; "Supposing the words to be imperative (in the book the word is printed inoperative, but this must be a mistake), yet the interest vested in Mrs. A. is precisely the same as if the gift was upon condition." "In case of such a condition the property remains in the party till the condition is performed, and if it becomes impossible the fee remains." "Though the question cannot now be decided as to the fee simple, yet with respect to the enjoyment of the property during her life she has a right to have her rights declared." In this last point Lord Erskine and Lord Eldon concurred, and it was the only point actually decided on the second appeal. It is impossible, however, to read the opinions of the Lords without seeing how far they had advanced as to the construction. See Lord Redesdale, p. 387: "Can anyone have a doubt of the testator's intention in giving her the fee. Under subsequent words the persons are to take by her devise. They take out of her fee simple, which fee simple is only controlled by the condition, &c." I do not say that it was finally decided that assuming family to ascertain the objects sufficiently, the will operated by way of condition, and not in creation of a trust, but the legality of such a construction was clearly recognized and acted upon. Lord St. Leonards in his final comments on the case said (p. 388): "The great question was left undecided —viz., whether a trust was created and for whom. It was treated as clear that the words were sufficient to create a trust, if the object were clearly ascertained." If this meant that no condition was involved it is obviously in contradiction with almost all that Lord Redesdale said. It must have referred to the state of things after the death of the wife if she died without devising in favour of the objects indicated by the testator, in which case her heir-at-law or devisees would be trustees for such objects.

The next case dealt with by Lord St. Leonards is that of Meredith v. Heneage, which he characterizes (at p. 391) as one of the most embarrassing cases that ever called for judicial decision. The case was decided in the Court of Exchequer in Equity before Richards, C.B., and Graham, Wood, and Garrow, BB., and is very elaborately reported in 10 Price 230. Richards, C.B., and Garrow, B., held that there was no obligation imposed upon the devisee, Graham and Wood, BB., that there was, but as Wood, B., held that the trust which he inferred had been complied with by a will made by the devisee of the original testator there was a majority of three to one in favour of that will. The case was appealed to the House of Lords and the judgment confirmed, and a short report is given in 10 Price p. 306; but it is not possible from this report to ascertain the grounds on which the decree was supported. The will to be construed was very special in its terms. I refer to the report to show the principles on which such cases ought to be decided were stated in substantially the same manner as above. At p. 264 Richards, C.B., says on the question whether the words used were imperative, "It must be admitted that it is purely a matter of intention to be collected from the words of the instrument as in all other cases upon wills where no rule of law interferes." The subject of gift, supposing the directions to be imperative, did not appear to be in doubt; it was "the whole of my said estate together and entire." After dealing with the question whether on the whole will there was an imperative obligation on the devisee and deciding it in the negative on grounds mentioned below, the Chief Baron proceeds (p. 273) to deal with the question whether the objects are sufficiently pointed out and comes to the conclusion that they were not. Garrow, B., merely concurred in the judgment pronounced by the Chief Baron. The other learned judges, though they arrived at different conclusions, did so by applying in their own way the same principles. What appears to have led Lord St. Leonards to the opinion which he expressed as to the difficulty of the case (an opinion fully shared by all the judges who gave judgment in it) was no doubt the strong contrast between the words which seemed to give the devisee the entire control and those which seemed to impose an obligation. They occurred in the same sentence, and were "unfettered and unlimited in full confidence and the firmest persuasion that," &c. The learned Chief Baron from a careful consideration of the context came to the conclusion that it was intended that the devisee should be entirely free to do as she pleased, but very great importance was attached to the fact that in an earlier part of the will what primâ facie would have been a trust could not by reason of a discretion being given to the devisee as to the amount to be settled be so treated.

I have dealt with these authorities at length in order to show that a substantial agreement as to principle had been arrived at long before the decisions beginning with Lambe v. Eames, which have been cited as though they in some way altered the law on this subject. Without going through these seriatim, I may say that in every case the conclusion that the words relied upon did not create an imperative trust was based, as I think, upon some uncertainty, either as to the subject or as to the objects of the supposed trust. Many learned judges (no one more clearly than Lord Eldon in Wright v. Atkyns) have expressed regret that they could not free themselves from the effect of previous decisions; but the fact that they nevertheless felt themselves bound shows that those decisions, when properly understood, cannot be departed from. Of course, the Court of Appeal cannot, in recent cases, be assumed in any way to alter the settled law on the subject, or to have assumed a jurisdiction to deal with the question as if it were independent of authority.

The cases of Wright v. Atkyns and Meredith v. Heneage are further important, the first as making it clear, in my judgment, that a condition that a devisee or legatee shall give by will may be established on the same principles as a trust, and if established is a perfectly good condition, notwithstanding that it could only operate through a gift by the devisee or legatee, and not through the operation of the will of the original testator; the second, because, in my judgment, it carries the case against the daughter, and in favour of the wife's contention, as far as any case to be found in the books. In the words of Lord St. Leonards (p. 391): "It amounts to a decision that clear words of gift to a devisee for his own benefit free from control shall not be cut down by subsequent words which may operate as an expression of a desire without disturbing the previous devise." I know of no better guide to the construction of the will before us. In the application of these or any other words to the construction of a particular document, different minds will often arrive at different conclusions, and whatever confidence I have in the enunciation of principles above set forth, I cannot feel so sure, in the face of the opposite conclusion arrived at by Romer, J., that my construction is the right one. My confidence in the result at which I have arrived is, of course, much further shaken by the fact that my learned brothers differ from me. I have, however, come, after much consideration, to a conclusion contrary to theirs, for the following reasons:

I ask, first, is it clear that the testator intended his wife to have the free control in the wide sense required for the decision of the case of the property given to her? All depends upon the word "absolutely." That word certainly implies that she was to take and have vested in her the whole property independently of control on the part of the other person named in the will as a trustee or anyone else, and, indeed, as I think with reference to the present case, free from any trust in her. But does the word as here used fairly involve that she was to be free from any condition? We cannot decide this apart from the context, but certainly though the word may, it does not necessarily, involve this conclusion. I take it only to mean (in strict analogy to what James, V.C., in Irvine v. Sullivan decided it to mean in the will before him) that she takes beneficially though not unconditionally as to the entire property, but subject so far as necessary to any condition afterwards imposed. (2) Are the words which follow the gift words which independently of any context may operate as an expression of a desire only? I think not. The words are "in the fullest confidence that she will carry out any wishes in the following particulars, viz." Then follow words as precise and clear as words can well be with reference both to the subject-matter, the object, and the way in which that object is to take and enjoy the moneys under the two policies belonging, the first (as to which alone our decision is required) to the wife, the second to himself. If the will had mentioned the wife's policy only I should have thought that not only the gift but the form and manner of the gift was completely explained. The testator must be taken to have known that he could not impose a trust, properly so called, on his wife's property, but he might wish to make it plain that whilst he intended all his own property to go to his wife, he equally intended that part of hers should go to his daughter if a will of the wife would give it. In my judgment the words used are quite sufficient to express that intention, and to operate legally by subjecting the wife to the equitable condition called an election. I do not think that this could fairly be said to be inconsistent with the full gift of his own property before made to the wife.

Passing on to the policy for £300 on his own life, and observing that it is dealt with in precisely the same manner as the other policy, it seems to me that as there is no reason to the contrary, and the will must necessarily be construed as giving rise to a condition with reference to the £1,000 policy, it would be a strained and unreasonable construction to imply a trust instead of a condition with regard to the other when a condition would at least be equally apt for carrying out the presumed intention of the testator. The will would then amount to this: "I give my wife all my property absolutely—that is to say, for an unlimited interest at law and in equity—but I make it a condition that she shall by will leave the money arising from the two policies to our daughter Lucy or make compensation for not doing so." Under this Lucy could only take if she survived Mrs. Williams, and owing to the way in which the provision is made for her, she could only take the policies for £1,000 and £300 as a legatee of Mrs. Williams. In fact she does so as to the £300. No question arises with regard to it. But as to the £1,000 policy, Mrs. Williams having elected to take against the will with reference to it, must make compensation out of the interest taken by her under the will.

This appears to me to be the conclusion most in accordance with principle and authority. Above all, it has the advantage of carrying out what to me appears to be the plain intention—that the daughter should, if capable of taking under the wife's will, have the right to do so, being to that extent as much an object of the testator's bounty as the wife herself.

High Court of Justice.

Q. B. Div. (Wright, J.) — May 8.

WILKINSON AND WIFE v. DOWNTON. (a.)

Tort—Practical joke—False statement causing injury to health—Cause of action.

The defendant, by way of a practical joke, made a false statement to the female plaintiff to the effect that her husband, the male plaintiff, had met with a bad accident. The female plaintiff was thereby seriously injured in her health.

Held, that an action for damages would lie.

Trial of action by Wright, J., and a jury.

The plaintiffs, who were husband and wife, sought to recover damages in respect of a false statement made by way of a joke by the defendant to the female plaintiff to the effect that the male plaintiff had been severely injured in an accident, whereby the female plaintiff suffered a severe shock and injury to her health.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment:

The jury in answer to questions left to them found that the defendant spoke the words alleged; that he meant them to be heard and acted upon, and that they were heard and acted upon; that they were false to his knowledge; and that the illness of the female plaintiff was the effect of the shock from the words.

The jury found that the damages caused by the illness of the female plaintiff amounted to £100, and that certain expenses, apart from the illness, to the amount of 1s. 10½d. had been incurred.

Warburton and A. N. Talbot, for the plaintiffs.

Abinger, for the defendant.

WRIGHT, J., after stating what was the cause of action as set out in the statement of claim, proceeded as follows: The defendant, in execution of what he seems to have regarded as a practical joke, represented to the female plaintiff that he was charged by her husband with a message to her to the effect that her husband had been smashed up in an accident, and was lying at the Elms public-house at Leytonstone with both legs broken, and that she was to go at once in a cab with two pillows to bring him home. All this was false. The effect of the statement on the female plaintiff was a violent shock to her nervous system, producing vomiting and other more serious and permanent physical consequences, at one time threatening her reason, and entailing weeks of suffering and incapacity to her, as well as expense to her husband for medical treatment of her. These consequences were not in any way the result of previous ill-health or weakness of constitution, nor was there any evidence of predisposition to nervous shock or of any other idiosyncrasy. In addition to these matters of substance there is a small claim for 1s. 10½d., the cost of the railway fares of persons sent by the female plaintiff to Leytonstone in obedience to the pretended message. As to this 1s. 10½d. expended on railway fares on the faith of the defendant's statement, the case is clearly within Pasley v. Freeman, 3 T. R. 51. It was a misrepresentation which was intended to be acted on to the damage of the plaintiff, and which was in fact acted on.

The real question is as to the £100, the greatest part of which was given as compensation for the female plaintiff's illness and suffering. It was argued for her that she was entitled to recover this as being damage caused by fraud, and therefore within the doctrine established by Pasley v. Freeman, and Langridge v. Levy, 2 M. & W. 519. I am not sure that this would not be an extension of that doctrine, the real ground of which appears to be that a person who makes a false statement, intending it to be acted on, must make good the damage naturally resulting from its being acted on. Here there was no injuria of that kind. I think, however, that the verdict may be supported on another ground.

The defendant has, as I assume for the moment, wilfully done an act calculated to cause physical pain to the female plaintiff—i.e., to infringe her legal right to personal safety, and has in fact thereby caused physical pain to her.

That proposition, without more, appears to me to state a good cause of action, there being no justification alleged for the act. This wilful injuria is in law malicious, although no malicious purpose to cause the harm which was caused nor any motive of spite, was imputed to the defendant.

It remains to consider whether the assumptions involved in the proposition are made out. One question is, whether the defendant's act was so plainly calculated to produce some effect of the kind which was produced that an intention to produce it ought to be imputed to the defendant. Regard being had to the fact that the effect was produced on a person proved to be in an ordinary state of health and mind, I think that it was. It is difficult to imagine that such a statement, made suddenly and with apparent seriousness, could fail to produce grave effects, under the circumstances, upon any but an exceptionally indifferent person, and therefore an intention to produce such an effect must be imputed, and it is no answer in law to say that more harm was done than was anticipated, for that is commonly the case with all wrongs.

The other question is whether the damage was, to use an ordinary phrase, too remote to be in law regarded as a consequence for which the defendant is answerable. Apart from authority I should give the same answer, and on the same ground, as to the last question, and say that it is not too remote. Whether, as the majority of the lords thought in Lynch v. Knight, 9 H. L. Cas. 577, 10 W. R. H. L. Dig. 4, the criterion is in asking what would be the natural effect on reasonable persons, or whether, as Lord Wensleydale thought, the possible infirmities of human nature ought to be recognized, it seems to me that the connection between the cause and effect is sufficiently close and complete.

It is, however, necessary to consider two authorities which are supposed to have laid down that illness through mental shock is a too remote or unnatural consequence of an injuria to entitle the plaintiff to recover in a case where damage is a necessary part of the cause of action. One is the case of Victorian Railway Commissioners v. Coultas, 37 W. R. 129, 13 App. Cas. 222, where it was held in the Privy Council that illness, which was the effect of shock caused by fright, was too remote a consequence of a negligent act which caused the fright, there being no physical harm immediately caused. That decision was treated in Pugh v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co., 44 W. R. 627, [1896] 2 Q. B. 248, as open to question. It is inconsistent with an earlier decision in the Court of Appeal in Ireland (see Bell v. Great Northern Railway Co., 26 L. R. Ir. C. L. 428, 39 W. R. Dig. 137, where the Irish Exchequer Division declined to follow Victorian Railway Commissioners v. Coultas), and it has been disapproved in the Supreme Court of New York (see Pollock on Torts, 4th ed., p. 47).

On these grounds it seems to me that the case of Victorian Railway Commissioners v. Coultas is not an authority on which this case ought to be decided.

A more serious difficulty is the decision in Allsop v. Allsop. 8 W. R. 449, 5 H. & N. 534, which was approved in the House of Lords in Lynch v. Knight. In that case it was held by Pollock, C.B., and Martin, Bramwell, and Wilde, BB., that illness caused by a slanderous imputation of unchastity in the case of a married woman did not constitute such special damage as would sustain an action for such a slander. That case, however, appears to have been decided on the ground that in all the innumerable actions for slander which had occurred there were no precedents for alleging illness to be sufficient special damage, and that it would be of evil consequence to treat it as sufficient, because such a rule might lead to an infinity of trumpery or groundless actions. Neither of these reasons is applicable to the present case, nor can such a rule be adopted as of general application without results which it would be difficult or impossible to defend. Suppose that a person was in a precarious or dangerous condition, and another person falsely told him that his physician had said that he had but a day to live. In such a case if death ensued from the shock caused by the false statement, I cannot doubt that the case might be one of criminal homicide, or that if a serious aggravation of illness ensued, damages might be recovered. I think, however, that it must be admitted that the present case is without precedent. Some English decisions, such as Jones v. Boyce, 1 Stark. N. P. 493; Wilkins v. Day, 32 W. R. 123, 12 Q. B. D. 110; Harris v. Mobbs, 27 W. R. 154, 3 Ex. D. 268, are cited in Beven on Negligence as inconsistent with the decision in Victorian Railway Commissioners v. Coultas; but I think that these cases are to be explained on a different ground—namely, that the damage which immediately resulted from the act of the passenger or of the horse was really the result, not of that act, but of a fright which rendered that act involuntary, and which, therefore, ought to be regarded as itself the direct and immediate cause of the damage. In Smith v. Johnson (unreported), decided in January, 1897, by Bruce, J., and myself, we held that where a man was killed in sight of the plaintiff by the defendant's negligence, and the plaintiff became ill, not from the shock of fear of harm to himself, but from the shock of seeing another person killed, this harm was too remote a consequence of the negligence; but that was very different from the present case.

There will be judgment for the plaintiffs for £100 1s. 10½d.

REG. v. THE GENERAL MEDICAL COUNCIL. (a.)

Dentist—Medical practitioner—Registration—Pupil—

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Declaration—Dentists Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 33), s. 37.

A person who, at the date of the passing of the Dentists Act, 1878 (22*nd of July*, 1878), was a pupil to a dental practitioner, but whose articles as a pupil expired in October, 1878, is not entitled to be registered under section 37 of the Dentists Act, 1878, unless he has complied with section 7.

Rule nisi for a mandamus against the General Medical Council commanding them to show cause why they should not place the name of Isidore Spero upon the register of dental practitioners under the Dentists Act, 1878.

Section 6 of the Act describes the persons who are entitled to be registered under the Act. These include (c) "any person who is at the passing of the Act bonâ fide engaged in the practice of dentistry or dental surgery."

Section 7 prescribes the steps to be taken by those seeking registration with a proviso that "a person shall not be registered under this Act as having been at the passing thereof engaged in the practice of dentistry unless he produces or transmits to the registrar, before the first day of August, 1879, information of his name and address, and a declaration signed by him in the form in the schedule to this Act, or to the like effect."

Section 37 provides that "Any person who has been articled as a pupil and has paid a premium to a dental practitioner entitled to be registered under this Act in consideration of receiving from such practitioner a complete dental education, shall, if his articles expire before the first day of January, 1880, be entitled to be registered under this Act as though he had been in bonâ fide practice before the passing of this Act."

The applicant was a pupil at the date of the passing of the Act (22nd of July, 1878). He was articled to a person entitled to be registered under the Act. His articles commenced in April, 1875, and expired in October, 1878. He did not make any application to be registered, nor did he sign the declaration required by section 7 before the 1st of August, 1879. He did not, in fact, make his application till some years afterwards. The General Medical Council refused to place his name upon the register. Whereupon this rule nisi was obtained.

Muir Mackenzie showed cause.—The applicant not having complied with the requirement of section 7 was not entitled to be registered.

Willes Chitty, in support of the rule.—Persons applying to be registered under section 37 are not bound by the provisions of section 7. The Legislature could not have intended this to be the case, because there would be a difficulty in the case of persons whose articles expired before the 1st of January, 1880, but after the 1st of August, 1879. It could not be supposed that those persons were entitled to be registered while yet in a state of pupilage. The form of declaration given in the schedule is not so framed as to be applicable to the case of persons applying to be registered under section 37.

HAWKINS, J.—The rule must be discharged. It is certain that it was not at first intended that anyone should be entitled to be registered who was not in bonâ fide practice at the passing of the Act. That being the case, it was afterwards thought fit for, no doubt, good reasons to make an exception in favour of a number of persons who intended to embark on the career of dentistry, and whose articles would not expire till a considerable time after the passing of the Act. It was thought fair to let them in under certain restrictions—to admit them as though they had been persons entitled to be registered under the Act. Accordingly section 37 was passed. The applicant paid a premium to a person entitled to be registered under the Act and his articles expired before 1880, so that he was within section 37. He therefore became entitled to be registered under the Act, not absolutely, but as though he had been in bonâ fide practice at the passing of the Act. That is to say that he was put in the same position as a person who was in bonâ fide practice at the passing of the Act. What would have entitled such a practitioner to be registered? That is to be found in section 7. What reason is there why a person who is put in the same position for the purposes of registration as though he came within section 6 (c) should not be under the same obligations? I confess I can see none. The object of the Act was that there should be a declaration containing the name and address of the person to be registered. The declaration was to be in the form given in the schedule "or to the like effect." I agree that without alteration it is not applicable. But under the authority of the words "to the like effect" it might be framed by the use of different words so as to meet the case. I see no reason why the words should not be added: "I am pupil of So-and-so. My articles expired before 1880."

WRIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion. The natural meaning of section 37 is that persons applying to be registered under it must submit to the same conditions as persons desiring to be registered under section 6 (c). I wish to say that I express no opinion as to persons whose articles expired after the 1st of August, 1879.

DERBYSHIRE (Appellant) v. HOULISTON (Respondent). (a.)

Adulteration — Food — Butter — False warranty — Scienter—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 27.

By section 27 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, every person who shall give a false warranty in writing to any purchaser in respect of an article of food or drug sold by him as principal or agent shall be guilty of an offence under this Act and be liable to a penalty.

Held, that no offence was committed within that section by D., who had given a warranty in writing that butter sold by him was pure, although in fact it was adulterated, because it was not proved that at the time D. gave the warranty he had reason to know or knew that it was false.

This was an appeal by case stated from a conviction under section 27 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875.

The case set out the following facts: On the 22nd of August, 1896, the appellant, who traded at Manchester as a provision merchant, purchased from a person named Maloney a quantity of butter, with a warranty in writing that it was pure butter. On the 8th of September one Martin Hopkins bought some of this butter from the appellant and received from him a similar warranty as to its quality. On the 16th the respondent, who was an inspector under the statute, purchased from Hopkins a sample of this butter, which was exposed for sale in his shop and marked "Pure butter, 10d." Upon analysis the butter was found to contain 23 per cent. of water.

The inspector thereupon instituted proceedings against Hopkins under section 6 of the Act of 1875 for having sold butter "not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded." Hopkins proved that he had purchased the butter in question from the appellant with a written warranty, and the summons was dismissed.

The inspector then took proceedings against the appellant under section 27 of the Act for having given a false warranty in writing in reference to an article of food sold by him. The appellant proved that he had purchased the butter from Maloney with a written warranty that it was guaranteed "pure Irish butter," and had been sold by him in the same condition as he received it, and he pleaded this as a defence under section 25.

The summons was heard by F. J. Headlam, Esq., a stipendiary magistrate for the city of Manchester, who was of opinion that the proof of warranty would have been a good defence to these proceedings had they been instituted by a purchaser, but he held that in proceedings like the present by an inspector it was unnecessary to prove that the accused when he gave the warranty to Hopkins knew that it was false; and that on the facts proved the appellant's defence failed.

C. A. Russell, Q.C. (with him F. H. Mellor).—The conviction ought to be quashed, for the magistrate found that the appellant had no reason to believe that the warranty was false at the time he sold the butter to Hopkins. By sections 6 and 9 two offences (both of the same class) are created—namely, selling an adulterated or altered article to the prejudice of the purchaser, and under those sections it is unnecessary to show that the seller knew at the time that the article was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded by the purchaser: Betts v. Armstead, 36 W. R. 720, 20 Q. B. D. 771; Pain v. Boughtwood, 38 W. R. 428, 24 Q. B. D. 353. The offence of giving a false warranty is a different class of offence, and guilty knowledge must be proved. For the purposes of this case it is immaterial to consider whether the defence given by section 25 is applicable to the giving by mistake of a false warranty or not, but I submit that it is, at any rate where the inspector himself has purchased from the defendant. [WRIGHT, J.—The defence is only applicable when the charge is that of having sold the informant an article not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded.]

Lawson Walton, Q.C. (Reginald Brown with him).—An unlawful intent is no part of the offence of giving a false warranty. If it were, the word "wilfully" would be found in the sub-section of section 27 under which these proceedings are instituted. It is as reasonable to assume that the word "wilfully" was purposely omitted by the framers of the statute as to contend it was a mere accidental omission. At any rate no word requiring the proof of scienter occurs in this sub-section, and as it ought to be construed strictly, the conviction should stand. If the conviction be quashed the effect will be to render the Act inoperative to a great extent. A man then could with impunity sell adulterated food and drugs so long as he took care to refrain from ascertaining whether the warranty he received with the goods from the foreign exporter was true or false. Nor could the exporter be brought to book owing to the expense and difficulty in most cases of enforcing any penalty obtained against him.

HAWKINS, J.—The question we have to determine is an important one, and it is this: Has the appellant been rightly convicted under section 27 of having given a false warranty in writing as to the quality of the butter he sold, when there was no evidence before the magistrate that at the time he sold the butter under that warranty he knew or had reason to believe the warranty was false? [His lordship then read the 27th section, and continuing, said:] Now, it is sub-section or paragraph 3 of this section that applies to this case, and it is quite clear to my mind that the meaning of the sub-section is that every person who shall wilfully give a false warranty shall be liable to the fine; in other words he shall be liable only if it is proved that he did so with an unlawful intent. In the 2nd and 4th sub-sections the framers of the Act were careful to put in the word "wilfully," and, therefore, had the appellant been charged with either of the offences set out in the other sub-sections, he could not have been convicted unless it was shown he "wilfully" did it.

But the question we have to decide is, What is the true construction to be placed upon the words as they stand in sub-section 3 of this 27th section? Can a man be convicted of giving a false warranty when he honestly believes, and upon reasonable grounds, that it was true, or can he only be convicted if it is proved that at the time he gave the warranty he knew that it was false? It seems to me clear that the framers of the statute intended that to constitute the offence of which the appellant here was charged, the false warranty must be proved to have been falsely given. The offence is associated in the same section with three other offences, in each of which an unlawful intent is an element. It is true that there are cases—for instance, under the Explosive Act—where guilty knowledge is presumed against the accused unless the contrary is shown, but that is never done except in cases where the Legislature has very clearly indicated that it intends to punish a man for a particular offence of which he was not morally guilty. I am of opinion that under this section 27 a man cannot be convicted of the offence of giving a false warranty unless it is proved that he knew at the time he did so that the warranty was in fact false. That guilty knowledge has not been shown to have existed in the present case, and consequently the case must be sent back to the magistrate, for the conviction to be quashed.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion. In my judgment given in the case of Sherras v. De Rutzen, 43 W. R. 526, [1895] 1 Q. B. 918, which was a case where a conviction had been improperly obtained against a licensed person, who had supplied liquor to a constable on duty under the bonâ fide belief that he was not on duty, I collected the various authorities for future easy reference in support of the proposition that a mens rea—evil intention or knowledge of the wrongfulness of the act—is an essential in every offence of this character, unless that presumption is clearly displaced by the language of the statute itself. That a guilty knowledge is a necessary element in the offence with which the appellant is here charged is indicated by the use of the word "false," which implies a knowledge of falsity of the warranty. It is moreover, further indicated on the principle of noscitur a sociis, since the offence is set out in the same section with several other offences, all of them requiring a guilty knowledge to be proved. It was argued that this construction of the meaning of the language of the section was opposed to the intention of the framers of the Act, whose object was to protect the buyer. I cannot say what the intention of the framers of the Act was, and all we have here to do is to decide the effect of the language used according to the ordinary rules of construction. On that principle it seems to be beyond doubt that the conviction was wrongly obtained, and must be quashed.

FORTESCUE v. MERCANTILE BANK OF LONDON. (a.)

Solicitor—Remuneration—Sale of property subject to incumbrances—Sale by second mortgagee—Scale fees—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44)—General Order, Schedule I., Part I., r. 9.

Rule 9 of Schedule I. to the General Order made under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, which provides that, where a property is sold subject to incumbrances, the amount of the incumbrances is to be deemed a part of the purchase-money, held to apply to a sale by a second mortgagee.

Appeal by the defendants from the refusal of Bruce, J., to order a review of taxation of a bill of costs.

The owner of a rent-charge, having mortgaged it to secure a sum of £3,800, granted a second mortgage thereon to the defendant bank to secure a sum of £100. The defendants realized their security by selling the rent-charge, subject to the first mortgage, for £185. The solicitor who conducted the sale for the defendants delivered his bill of costs containing an item of £35 for negotiating the sale, and an item of £40 for deducing title and completing the conveyance.

The plaintiff having brought this action as assignee of the mortgagor to recover from the defendants the balance of what was due from the defendants to the mortgagor, the defendants sought to deduct from the gross balance the amount of the costs incurred by them in respect of the sale.

The plaintiff thereupon obtained an order for the taxation of the bill of costs, and upon such taxation the master disallowed £30 out of the item of £35, and disallowed £35 out of the item of £40.

The question was whether the present case was within rule 9 of Schedule I., Part I., to the General Order made under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881. That rule is as follows: "Where a property is sold subject to incumbrances, the amount of the incumbrances is to be deemed a part of the purchase-money, except where the mortgagee purchases, in which case the charge of his solicitor shall be calculated upon the price of the equity of redemption."

The master was of opinion that the rule did not apply to a sale by a second mortgagee, and that in the present case the scale fees ought to be calculated on the sum of £185 only.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants carried in the following objections to the taxation:

"The defendant bank objects to the disallowance by the master of £30 out of an item of £35, and £35 out of item of £40, scale fees charged in the bill of costs herein, on grounds following:

"Because where, as here, the property is sold to some third party subject to an incumbrance, the amount of the incumbrance is to be deemed a part of the purchase-money;

"Because the master was wrong in law in introducing an exception to such rule in case a property is sold by a second mortgagee, and in restricting such rule to the case where the property is sold by the mortgagor personally or by his trustee in bankruptcy;

"Because the solicitor for the second mortgagee selling the freehold rent-charge subject to a prior incumbrance for £3,800 is entitled to the scale fee both for negotiating and for deducing title, calculated on purchase-money of £3,985, and not on £185 only, and the master has no power (except in the special case provided for by rule 9, which is not this case) to calculate the solicitor's scale fees on the price of the equity of redemption only instead of on the total purchase-money."

Bruce, J., disallowed the objections.

English Harrison, for the plaintiff.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—We must construe the words of rule 9 of this schedule according to their ordinary meaning. The rule says that "where a property is sold"—that must mean sold by anybody—"subject to incumbrances," then "the amount of the incumbrances is to be deemed part of the purchase-money"—i.e., part of the money paid by the purchaser for the property purchased. Here the property purchased was the rent-charge, and the purchaser gave for it, not merely £185, but he became liable to pay also £3,800—i.e., he has given by way of purchase £3,985. The vendor's solicitor is therefore entitled under the rule to payment based on the sum of £3,985. This construction seems strange at first sight, but on consideration there is nothing unreasonable in it. He found a purchaser who was willing to give for the property £3,800 plus £185. We cannot depart from the plain words of the rule, and the appeal must be allowed.

Held, that the proviso included the temporary residence of a patient in a hospital, and was not limited to cases of compulsory confinement.

Decision of the Divisional Court (ante, p. 302) affirmed.

Appeal of the respondents from the decision of the Divisional Court (ante, p. 302) on a case stated by the Recorder of Canterbury.

On the 1st of April, 1896, Edward James Farr, aged nine years, became chargeable to the respondent union.

On the 24th of April, 1896, an application was made to two of the justices of the city of Canterbury for an order for the removal of the pauper from the respondent union to the appellant union, and an order was that day made on such application adjudging the pauper to be legally settled in the parish of Rotherhithe, in the appellant union. From this order the appellants appealed.

The pauper was the lawful son of Arthur Farr and Ellen Farr and was born on the 1st of April, 1887, in the Greenwich union.

Ellen Farr died on the 22nd of June, 1888, and shortly after her death Arthur Farr sent the pauper to live with a relative in the respondent union, with whom he remained till he became chargeable.

On the 23rd of July, 1892, Arthur Farr remarried, and on the same day went to reside in the parish of St. Mary, Rotherhithe, in the appellant union, not having previously resided there. From that time until his death he continued to have his residence and home in the appellant union.

On the 1st of May, 1895, Arthur Farr was admitted into the Brompton Hospital for Consumption, situate outside the appellant union, where he remained until the end of June. He then went to a convalescent home in connection with the hospital at Sandgate (also outside the appellant union) where he remained until the 29th of July, 1895, when he returned to his home in the appellant union. He remained there until his death on the 15th of April, 1896.

Arthur Farr went to the hospital intending to return to his home in the appellant union as soon as he was well enough to do so. During his temporary absence his wife remained in his house and kept his home together by means of an allowance which his employer made to him.

The recorder confirmed the order of removal subject to this case.

The Divisional Court allowed the appeal.

The respondents appealed.

By the Poor Removal Act, 1846, s. 1, "No person shall be removed, nor shall any warrant be granted for the removal of any person from any parish in which such person shall have resided for five years (reduced to one year by 28 & 29 Vict. c. 79) next before the application for the warrant. Provided always that the time during which such person shall be a prisoner in a prison or shall be serving her Majesty as a soldier, marine, or sailor, or reside as an inpensioner in Greenwich or Chelsea Hospitals, or shall be confined in a lunatic asylum or house duly licensed or hospital registered for the reception of lunatics, or as a patient in a hospital, . . . shall for all purposes be excluded in the computation of time hereinbefore mentioned."

By the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, s. 34, "Where any person shall have resided for the term of three years in any parish in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as would, in accordance with the several statutes in that behalf, render him irremovable, he shall be deemed to be settled therein . . ."

Dickens, Q.C., and Hohler (Joseph with them), for the present appellants.—The period of voluntary residence in a hospital, such as in this case, is not to be excluded from the computation of period residence. The words "as a patient in a hospital" in the proviso in section 1 of the Poor Removal Act, 1846, are governed by the word "confined," and refer only to cases of compulsory detention in a hospital, as, for example, the detention of a woman in a hospital after her confinement under 13 Geo. 3, c. 82, ss. 14, 15. But assuming that the proviso does apply to this case, the residence of the pauper's father in hospital did not prevent the father acquiring a settlement in the appellant union. The time spent in the hospital is to be excluded "for all purposes" in the computation of time; that means that it shall neither tell in making up the three years nor shall operate as a break in the residence, if altogether residence has continued for three years, as is the fact here. The Divisional Court held that they were bound by Dorchester Union v. Weymouth Union, 16 Q. B. D. 31, 34 W. R. Dig. 135, but that case is inconsistent with Hartfield v. Rotherfield, 17 Q. B. 746, and was wrongly decided. During the time that the pauper's father was in the hospital he always had the intention to return to his home in the appellant union as soon as he was well enough to do so, and this animus revertendi made him constructively a resident in the appellant union: Reg. v. Abingdon Union, 18 W. R. 981, L. R. 5 Q. B. 406.

Macmorran, Q.C., and Harper, for the present respondents.—The proviso in section 1 of the Poor Removal Act, 1846, is not restricted to cases of compulsory confinement in hospitals. Secondly, it was rightly decided in Dorchester Union v. Weymouth Union that the three years' residence referred to in section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, must be consecutive. That case was approved of by the House of Lords in Reigate Union v. Croydon Union, 38 W. R. 295, 14 App. Cas. 465.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In my opinion the term of three years mentioned in section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, must mean three consecutive years. Settlement is to be acquired by a residence in each of such years, which would render the person residing irremovable. Unless there is such a residence in each of the years the condition is not fulfilled. In order to ascertain what circumstances would render the person irremovable, it is necessary to refer to the Poor Removal Act, 1846; and if we read into that Act the effect of the later statutes, we find that residence for one year next before the application for a warrant is to make a person irremovable. Then there is a proviso that the time during which a person is in hospital is not to be counted. It is said that the words used in the section are "confined . . . as a patient in a hospital," and that this means compulsorily confined. I do not agree with this reading of the section. I think that the governing word applicable to the case of a patient in a hospital is to "reside" and not "confined," and in my opinion that is how the statute should be read. Then it was said that Lord Campbell had decided in Hartfield v. Rotherfield, 17 Q. B. 746, that in such a case as this, the time when the father was in hospital was to be treated as if it never existed, and that, therefore, there was a three years' residence in the appellant union sufficient to satisfy section 34 of the Act of 1876. I do not think that Lord Campbell gave any such decision, but even assuming that he did, the reasoning in Dorchester Union v. Weymouth Union is more satisfactory to my mind. I find it impossible to differ from the conclusion arrived at in that case, and it is admitted that if that decision is to be upheld, the judgment of the Divisional Court must be affirmed. As to the other point, whether Arthur Farr while in the hospital had any animus revertendi, I think that, for the reasons which I have given, that question is excluded in the construction of the section. The appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—The question in this case is as to the meaning of the expression "term of three years" in section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, and the question is whether it means three consecutive years. It was held in the Dorchester Union v. Weymouth Union that it does mean three consecutive years. It was contended by Mr. Dickens that that case was wrongly decided, and that it ought to be overruled. It is important to observe that that case has in effect been adopted by the House of Lords in Reigate Union v. Croydon Union, in which Lord Watson, referring to section 34, treats it as meaning a residence of three consecutive years. Then section 34 provides that the residence must be under such circumstances as would, in accordance with the several statutes in that behalf, render the person irremovable. In order to ascertain what these conditions are we must refer to the Poor Removal Act, 1846. Section 1 of that Act deals with certain breaks in the residence which are to be deducted from the qualifying period, one of which is the time during which the person is a patient in a hospital, and it is contended that the use of the word "confined" in the section shows that the period of residence in a hospital is only to be deducted when the person is compulsorily confined there. I think that the section ought to be read in the way the Master of the Rolls has suggested. I think it would be altogether contrary to the intention of the section if we held that there was no disruption, unless the detention in the hospital is compulsory. Otherwise a person might reside for three years in a hospital at the public expense, and thereby acquire a settlement. Therefore, excluding the time Arthur Farr spent in the hospital it follows that he did not acquire a settlement in the appellant union, and that his son has no derivative settlement in that union. I do not think the question of an animus revertendi applies in this case at all.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. With reference to the question arising on section 34, I think that the decision in Dorchester Union v. Weymouth Union is correct, and that the three years' residence must be consecutive. The expression "term" imports a continuous residence, and the words "in each of such years" confirm that view. I entertain no doubt on the question, and Lord Watson in the House of Lords treated it as a matter beyond doubt.

With regard to section 1 of the Poor Removal Act, 1846, I think that even if a strict grammatical construction requires that the word "confined" should be read with the words "as a patient in a hospital," I do not think that it would have the effect contended for. To my mind it would be extraordinary if the Legislature had been directing its attention to the isolated case of compulsory detention in a hospital which has been referred to—namely, a woman in a lying-in hospital. I think the word "reside" in the earlier part of the section is applicable to the case of a patient in a hospital. I agree with what has been said as to the animus revertendi.

The appellant was the owner of a house and park at which he was carrying out building and other operations. Before any materials were ordered by the appellant samples were submitted to him, and if approved the person proposing to supply the material was asked to quote a price for it delivered free at the park. Orders were then given from time to time to the person who was to supply the material to deliver it at the park in such quantities as were required, but before giving such orders there was no contract entered into for the supply of any specified quantity of materials, nor was the appellant bound to take any materials at all. The persons to whom the orders were given employed and paid traction-engine owners to haul the goods to the park. The appellant neither directed nor had any control over the mode of carriage of the materials, though he knew that the delivery would be by traction engines. The carriage of the materials along the road was extraordinary traffic within section 23 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, and damage was thereby caused to the road.

Appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Cave and Wills, JJ.) upon a special case stated by quarter sessions for the Eastern Division of the County of Kent.

The appellant was summoned in July, 1895, by the respondents, who were the authority liable to repair the main roads in the county, under section 23 of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878, to answer a claim for damage done to the Faversham and Ashford main road by conducting excessive weight and extraordinary traffic along the same to the lodge-gate at Eastwell-park, the residence of the appellant. The justices at petty sessions adjudged that the appellant was liable to pay for the extra expenses thereby caused. The quarter sessions reversed this order, subject to a special case.

The appellant was the owner of a mansion-house and park known as Eastwell-park, and in 1893 and 1894 building and other operations on an extensive scale were carried on there by his order. Several firms of contractors were employed on different portions of the work. Besides the work so done by contractors a considerable amount of work in the park was done by the appellant himself under the superintendence of a servant named Kavanagh. With regard to the supply of materials for the work executed for the appellant, before any materials were ordered, samples were submitted to and approved by the appellant, or by the architect or clerk of the works on his behalf, and when the sample was approved, the person proposing to supply the material was asked to give a price for it, the price in every case being an inclusive price for the material delivered free at Eastwell-park. When a sample of any materials had been approved and an inclusive price agreed on, orders were from time to time given to the person who was to supply the material to deliver it at Eastwell-park in such quantities as were from time to time required. In no case was any contract entered into for the supply of any specified quantity of materials, nor was the appellant bound to take any materials at all. The materials consisted of bricks, brick rubbish, cement, and gravel, and the persons to whom the orders were given for the supply of the materials employed and paid traction-engine owners to haul the materials to Eastwell-park.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that he was not liable for any part of the expense incurred in repairing the road, as he was not the person by whose order the traffic was conducted, as the materials were ordered at a price which included delivery, and as he neither directed nor had any control over the mode of carriage of the materials, and neither engaged nor paid the persons by whom such carriage was conducted.

It was contended on behalf of the respondents that the appellant was the person by whose order the traffic was conducted, the orders given by him for the materials being the effective orders which set the traffic in motion.

The quarter sessions found that the traffic was extraordinary traffic, and that such traffic had done damage to the road; that the materials ordered for the work were all ordered upon the terms of their being delivered at the park at prices which included delivery, and that the appellant neither directed nor had any control over the mode of carriage of such materials, though he knew that the delivery would in fact be conducted by traction engine, and that it would not have been practicable to deliver in any other manner at the price named.

Upon these findings the quarter sessions held that the appellant was not the person by whose order the traffic was conducted, and reversed the order of petty sessions, and dismissed the summons.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether, having regard to the above findings, the quarter sessions were right in law in holding that the appellant was not a person by whose order the extraordinary traffic was conducted.

The Divisional Court held that the quarter sessions were wrong, and restored the order of the petty sessions.

The appellant appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 17.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question before the quarter sessions was whether there had been extraordinary traffic along this road, and whether damage had been caused by that traffic, and the sessions decided that in the affirmative. The next question was whether that traffic was conducted by the order of Lord Gerard so as to make him liable for the extra expense so caused. The sessions answered that question in the negative. The Divisional Court came to a contrary conclusion. The case raises the question, what is the true construction of section 23 of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878; and then, what is its proper application to the facts of this case?

I will first state my view of the true construction of section 23 of the Act, that is, what is the meaning of the words "by whose order" the extraordinary traffic is conducted? Upon the one hand, it seems clear to me that those words cannot mean merely the person for whose advantage the traffic is conducted. If there were nothing more than that it could not be said that the traffic was conducted by his order. Upon the other hand, I do not think it can be said that the words are confined to an order given to a servant who is bound to obey. It must be larger than that. Therefore, we must find an explanation between those two extremes. I think the best explanation is that the person by whose order the traffic is conducted may comprise the person by whose decision and determination the traffic in question has been brought along the road in question. If, therefore, that person makes up his mind that the traffic which is to be sent to him shall go along a certain road, and makes a contract with the tradesman to convey the goods or materials along that road, and, if the tradesman accepts that contract, the person so making that contract with the tradesman is a person by whose decision and determination that traffic has been carried along that road. The mere fact that he has contracted with a tradesman to do it for a certain price does not prevent it being done by his order. But, supposing a landowner lets certain land on building leases and enters into an agreement with a contractor whereby the contractor is to build houses on the land, and to pay the landowner certain ground-rents, the materials which the contractor carries along the road would be carried, in one sense, for the benefit of the landowner, as the latter would be entitled to certain ground-rents, but the contractor would be the person to determine what materials should be carried, and along what roads the materials should be carried, and it is impossible to say that that traffic would be conducted by the order of the landowner. It is impossible to exhaust all the cases. We can only lay down the rule, and the application of that rule to the facts of the particular case will be a question of fact in each case.

I desire to make two further observations. There may be extraordinary traffic conducted along a road and no one liable for the damage caused thereby. People who go independently to a race meeting form an instance. The persons who have established the racecourse are not persons by whose order that extraordinary traffic is conducted. Each person who passes along that road to the racecourse does not cause that extraordinary traffic. There would be extraordinary traffic along that road, and yet no one would be liable. Again, there may be more than one person liable for conducting extraordinary traffic along a road. For instance, if a person like Lord Gerard is having a house built and enters into a contract by which the contractor is to bring the materials along a particular road, if the contractor brings the materials along that road and thereby causes extraordinary traffic along it the contractor would be liable, and, in my opinion, the person who was having the house built would also be liable as having directed the materials to be brought along that road.

That being my view of the law, it becomes necessary to apply it to the facts stated in the special case. If the question as to who gave the order to conduct this extraordinary traffic is dealt with as a question of fact—that is, who, in fact, gave the order within the interpretation I have given of the section—the quarter sessions must themselves draw the inference of fact, and can not ask this court to do so. Here the quarter sessions have drawn the inference of fact, because they have found that Lord Gerard was not the person by whose order the traffic was conducted. But I do not think it advisable in this case to treat the matter so strictly, for the magistrates have found other facts and have asked the court in effect whether in law they were prevented from coming to that conclusion on the facts. I think the court should give its decision as to the meaning of the statute, and should decide the application of that law to the facts of this case. Lord Gerard was having certain alterations made at his mansion-house at Eastwell-park and also some improvements made in the park. He entered into a contract with certain persons, who, it is clear, were not Lord Gerard's servants, but persons entering into a contract with him, to supply certain materials at prices inclusive of delivery. The contracts were made with contractors and not with servants. If a mere servant had given the order for conducting the traffic, the order would be his master's order. But a contractor is in a different position. The quarter sessions arrived at certain findings, and upon those findings they held that Lord Gerard was not the person by whose orders the materials were carried along the road in question. There is no finding as to what roads there were in this district. But taking Eastwell-park as the centre of the district, if the materials could be sent from any direction, it is impossible to say that Lord Gerard determined the road along which the materials were to come. Lord Gerard deliberately declined to have anything to do with the place from which the materials were to be brought. The contractor had to determine that. There was no contract obliging the contractor to bring the traffic along the road in question. The contractor had to bring the materials to Eastwell-park, and he had power to determine from what place and along what road they should be brought.

That being so, the quarter sessions were right in holding that there was no determination or decision by Lord Gerard that the traffic in question should come along the road in question, and, if so, it was not by anything he did that the traffic was conducted along this road. The decision, therefore, of the Divisional Court must be reversed, and the order of quarter sessions restored.

LOPES, L.J., read the following judgment: I have not arrived at the same conclusion as the rest of the court in this case. The question upon which the opinion of the court is asked is whether, having regard to the findings, the justices in quarter sessions were right in law in holding that Lord Gerard was not a person by whose order the extraordinary traffic caused by the carriage of the materials ordered for the works at Eastwell-park was conducted. The justices were of opinion that the traffic caused by the carriage of materials for the works carried out for Lord Gerard, under the superintendence of one Kavanagh, was extraordinary traffic, and they found that such traffic had done damage to the road, and assessed the amount of such damage at £750. They found that as regards such work Kavanagh was not a contractor but a servant of Lord Gerard. They found as facts that the materials ordered for the work were all ordered upon the terms of their being delivered at the park at prices which included delivery, and that neither Lord Gerard nor Kavanagh directed or had any control over the mode of carriage of such materials; but that they knew that the delivery would, in fact, be conducted by traction engines. They held on these findings that neither Lord Gerard nor Kavanagh was a person by whose order the traffic was conducted, and that neither was liable for what was done by the persons who actually conducted such traffic.

The question is an important one. We are bound by the facts as found by the justices, but by section 2 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 16), in appeals like the present power is given to the court hearing the appeal to draw any reasonable inference of fact which might have been drawn by the court of quarter sessions. I infer from the facts stated that Lord Gerard knew that the materials in question would be brought by the nearest and most convenient road, and that the nearest and most convenient road was the one in respect of which the present claim is made against him. The court below reversed the decision of the court of quarter sessions, and held that Lord Gerard was the person liable.

In the years 1893 and 1894 Lord Gerard, the owner of a mansion-house and park known as Eastwell-park, was carrying on building operations on an extensive scale. A portion of the work was done by independent contractors, but besides such works a considerable amount of work in the park was done by Lord Gerard himself under the superintendence of Kavanagh, who, in superintending the work, was acting as a servant to Lord Gerard, and was paid a commission by Lord Gerard on the amount expended. Before any materials were ordered samples were submitted and approved by Lord Gerard, and when a sample was approved the person proposing to supply the materials was asked to give a price for it, such price in every case being an inclusive price for the materials delivered free at Eastwell-park. It was left to the person supplying the materials to bring them to Eastwell-park in any way he thought fit. The case may be illustrated thus: A person who is proposing to build a large mansion himself, without employing any architect or contractor, orders from a large number of different tradesmen the materials requisite for the work, the materials to be delivered at a price inclusive of carriage, and the tradesmen to be at liberty to deliver the materials in any way they think best. The different tradesmen deliver the materials, and in so doing cause damage to the roads by conducting excessive weight or extraordinary traffic along the same. In such circumstances can it be said that such damage is not caused by the order of the person who is building the house? Is he not the person by whose order such excessive weight or extraordinary traffic has been conducted over the roads in question? It is not the case of an independent contractor who undertakes the work and who has everything under his control, and over whom the building owner can exercise no dominion. About such a case I express no opinion, though I think there is much to be said in favour of the view taken by Wills, J., of the case of such independent contractor in the court below.

The case of Lapthorn v. Harvey, 49 J. P. 709, was a case of an independent contractor, and does not govern this case. In Williams v. Davies, 44 J. P. 347, a different view seems to have been taken from that taken in Lapthorn v. Harvey as to the person liable when there was a contract for the carriage of goods. There Williams purchased certain timber near a railway station, and contracted with one Davies for the carriage of a portion of the timber. No particular route was prescribed, nor any particular mode of carriage. Davies duly performed his part of the contract with Williams, and was duly paid therefor. The highway was greatly damaged, and Williams was summoned for the extraordinary expenses incurred in consequence. The justices made an order against Williams, and the court (Lush and Bowen, JJ.) upheld the order. Lush, J., said: "As to the person who causes the extraordinary traffic, I think it is of no consequence whether the purchaser of the timber causes it by his own wagons or those of his contractor hired by the day or for longer periods, for it is equally by his order." This view, however, of the effect of the section was dissented from by Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J., in Lapthorn v. Harvey.

In Reg. v. Ellis, 30 W. R. 613, 8 Q. B. D. 466, a farmer purchased about sixty tons of manure at a place about four miles distant from his farm. His foreman employed the appellants, who were proprietors of traction engines and wagons, to cart the manure to his master's farm at the rate of 9d. per ton. The foreman pointed out to the appellants the place where the manure was to be deposited, but no further directions were given as to the mode in which it was to be conveyed. It was in evidence that the foreman employed the appellants knowing that they owned traction engines, and would be likely to use them in carting the manure, and because there was no other way of getting it carried within the necessary time. The road was the only road by which the spot indicated by the foreman for the deposit of the manure could be reached. The manure was carried by the appellants' engines and did damage to the highway. The appellants were held by the justices to be the persons "by whose order" the traffic had been conducted; and the Divisional Court thought there was sufficient evidence to justify this finding. In that case there was a special finding that the traffic was conducted by the order of the appellants. As to the first question raised by the case—viz., whether the sessions were right in holding that the appellants were the persons by whose order the traffic was conducted—all Field, J., says is that there was sufficient evidence that the traffic was conducted by order of the appellants. The question of the proper construction of the words of the Act of Parliament seems to have been scarcely argued, and not dealt with in the judgment except as I have stated. I cannot think this case an authority of much weight, and if it means what is suggested, I do not agree with it. It appears to me that the materials in question in this case were conducted by the order of Lord Gerard. If it had not been for the orders he gave to the persons who supplied the materials, these materials would never have passed over the road. They were persons merely employed to bring the materials, and were consequently put in motion solely by the order of Lord Gerard. All those persons had done was simply to quote a price at which they were prepared to deliver materials, and then Lord Gerard, knowing that they had quoted that price and that they meant to deliver by traction engine, and by the nearest and most convenient road, said, "Send me the materials." The sole and effective cause of these materials passing over the road was the order of Lord Gerard. Is it to be said, if I order a truck of coals from a coal merchant, and his wagons, owing to the excessive weight of the coals, do damage, that the damage is to be attributed to the order given to the carter by the coal merchant and not to my order, which is the effective cause of any action being taken by anybody? Take the illustration I suggested of a person himself, without any contractor, building a house in his park; he buys the different materials necessary for its construction from twenty different tradesmen, and the materials in the aggregate, by their excessive weight, cause damage to a road. It is impossible to say what particular portion of the materials caused the damage or by whom that portion was carried. But it was all ordered by the person building the house. In such a case, if the contention of Lord Gerard is right, the highway authority would be powerless and would have to look to twenty different persons without the means of discovering which was the offender. The object the Legislature had in view was to enable the highway authority to recoup the excessive expenditure not unfrequently occasioned by extraordinary and exceptionally heavy traffic arising from building and similar operations of a temporary kind and from other causes by which the road accommodation provided for all alike at the public expense is sometimes abused by individuals for their private purposes. The Legislature surely must have intended the person who by his initial order brought the excessive weight on the road to bear the burden of the damage, and not those who simply obeyed and acted in conformity with the order. I read "by whose order" as if it was "in consequence of whose order." This seems to have been the opinion of Lush and Bowen, JJ., in Williams v. Davies; it is the opinion of Cave and Wills, JJ., in the court below; and it is the view which I take of the meaning of the words "by whose order such weight or traffic has been conducted," as applied to the circumstances of this case. I think this appeal should be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J., read the following judgment:—This is an appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court as to the proper answer to be given to a question submitted for the opinion of the High Court by a special case stated by a court of quarter sessions. The question is whether, having regard to the findings in the case, the justices in quarter sessions were right in law in holding that Lord Gerard was not a person by whose order certain extraordinary traffic was caused by the carriage of the material ordered for works carried on by him at Eastwell-park. The traffic is to be taken to be extraordinary traffic within the meaning of the Highways and Locomotives Amendment Act, 1878, s. 23, and no question arises as to the amount to be paid by Lord Gerard if he is a person by whose order the traffic was conducted. The traffic treated as extraordinary traffic consisted in the carriage by traction engine over part of the Faversham and Ashford main road to Eastwell-park of materials to be used upon works being done by Lord Gerard in his park there under the superintendence of one Kavanagh, who is to be treated for the purposes of this case as the agent of Lord Gerard. If Lord Gerard had not wanted the material for the works that he was carrying on, the extraordinary traffic would not have been conducted, and he of course shared in the advantage derived from it, though the persons supplying the material and the traction-engine owners also had their shares. It is clear, however, both on authority and on the words of the Act, that the mere fact of the person deriving advantage from the extraordinary traffic is not sufficient to fix him with liability for the expenses. There was nothing illegal in the extraordinary traffic, and Lord Gerard cannot be held liable unless it was conducted by his order within the meaning of section 23 of the Act of 1878. To make that section applicable there must be, first, extraordinary traffic and expenses occasioned thereby; and secondly, some person by whom, in some reasonable sense of the words, the extraordinary traffic has been ordered to be conducted. If there be no such person, as, for instance, where the extraordinary traffic is made up of single loads of no excessive weight brought upon the roads by separate independent people, the result would be that no persons would be separately chargeable, and the expense of repairing the roads must fall as it would have done if the section had not been passed.

The question, then, being whether the traffic was conducted by Lord Gerard's order, it is material to observe that in the case and in the judgments of the Divisional Court the word "order" is used in a sense which, if not examined into, may occasion some ambiguity. The learned judges in the Divisional Court may have been, and for myself I think they were, right in the conclusion at which they arrived, that there was not as to any of the materials any contract by Lord Gerard to take, or by any person to supply, before the giving of what are called "orders" to deliver at Eastwell-park. In this view the so-called "orders" are in law nothing more than offers to accept at a price provisionally arranged and when delivered at Eastwell-park, the quantities of materials therein mentioned, if found to be according to samples previously exhibited, and no person was by contract or otherwise under any legal obligation to obey any of the so-called orders. Whenever they were acted upon, the persons to whom they were addressed found it to their interest to accept and act upon them. Assuming that traffic might, in a reasonable sense, be said to have been ordered to be conducted by the person who wanted the materials, if he gave directions for their being brought from one specified place to another, there is nothing like that in the present case. No one of the offers made by Lord Gerard specified any place from which the materials were to come, or the road by which they were to be brought. If the materials were according to sample it was a matter of indifference to Lord Gerard from what place or by what route they arrived at Eastwell-park, and he would not have been at liberty to refuse acceptance by reason of the place from which or the road by which they were brought. Until the materials were delivered at Eastwell-park and accepted as being according to sample, the property did not vest in Lord Gerard. If any materials had been rejected as not being according to sample, Lord Gerard could not have been held responsible for their carriage to and from Eastwell-park. He had nothing in law to do with the owners of the traction engines, who entered into their own contracts for the carriage of the materials to be tendered at Eastwell-park with the owners of them quite independently of Lord Gerard. It is, however, found in the case that Lord Gerard knew that the materials would be delivered by traction engine, and it is also found it would not have been practicable to deliver in any other manner at the prices named. It is not found, nor can it be reasonably inferred from the actual finding, that he knew from what place or by what road the materials would be delivered. The case itself shows that there was at least one road other than that in question by which some materials were and others might have been delivered at Eastwell-park.

In Lapthorn v. Harvey, 49 J. P. 709, Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J., sitting as a Divisional Court, held that a person who had contracted with a sub-contractor for the carriage of stone, leaving him to carry it as he pleased, was not liable for his having, by employing traction engines, conducted extraordinary traffic and occasioned damage within the meaning of the Act. It seems to me that this case can only be distinguished from the present in any way that might be unfavourable to Lord Gerard by the circumstance that there was one contract carrying the whole of the traffic, and that there was nothing in that contract from which it could be inferred that haulage by traction engine was at the date of it in contemplation of the parties sought to be made liable. On the other hand, the materials carried were the property of the persons sought to be made liable, who themselves contracted for the carriage of them; so that their connection with the carriage was closer there than that of Lord Gerard in the present case. In the later case of Hobbs v. Tunbridge Wells Local Board, 49 J. P. 679, heard before a court of petty sessions, the facts were substantially the same as in Lapthorn v. Harvey, except that the firm who contracted for the haulage were owners of traction engines. There does not appear to have been any finding that the local board knew that traction engines would be used. Lord Bramwell, however (who happened to be chairman of the sessions), in dealing with the case, refers to both these points in such a way as to make it reasonably clear that no such finding would have changed his view as to the applicability of the section. This decision was, of course, in no way binding on the Divisional Court, and cannot, indeed, be cited as an authority or as having more weight than an extra-judicial opinion of an eminent judge. It was not referred to in the judgments of the learned judges; but if the reasoning is sound it is very important for the decision of the present case. It seems to lay down that to contract for the carriage of heavy materials with traction-engine owners, not specifying or requiring that traction engines shall be used, is not to give an order for conducting the traffic within the meaning of the Act, though both parties to the contract might know well enough that traction engines would in all probability be used.

The learned judges in the court below seem to have thought that the principle of Lapthorn v. Harvey is only applicable where the traffic is conducted for the performance of a pre-existing contract. But I am unable to see how the legal position of a person, who by making one general contract gives occasion for the extraordinary traffic, can be better than that of one who gives a series of invitations to others for the delivery of materials the carriage of which in the aggregate constitutes the extraordinary traffic.

The case of Williams v. Davies, 44 J. P. 347, as reported, does not, in my judgment, afford any rule applicable to the present case. From the case there stated it appears that the defendants contracted with Davies (who happened to be the surveyor of the highway board) for the carriage of a portion of the timber at a certain rate per foot of timber; that in pursuance of the contract Davies, with his own carriages and horses, hauled a portion of the timber, and the defendants paid him the agreed price for the work done by him; that the defendants with their own carriages and horses hauled the remaining portion; that the total quantity of timber hauled was sixty-seven loads, but that no evidence was given or tendered as to how much was hauled by Davies and by the defendants respectively. Davies, by his certificate, certified that the defendants conveyed the timber with their horses and carriages, and by horses and carriages hired by them for the conveyance of such timber. The main question appears to have been whether or no the conveyance of the sixty-seven loads was extraordinary traffic. The judgment was delivered by Lush, J., and the only passage in the judgment which touches the present question is the following: "As to the person who causes the extraordinary traffic, I think it is of no consequence whether the purchaser of the timber causes it by his own waggons or those of his contractor, hired by the day or for longer periods, for it is equally by his orders." From this it would seem that the court took the view expressed in the surveyor's certificate, that the contract amounted to a hiring of the wagons, in which case the conclusion would be undoubtedly right. Whether this was the correct inference from the facts stated may be doubtful; but at any rate the judgment lays down no rule of law applicable to the present case. Here it is clear that Lord Gerard did not hire the traction engine or any of them. In Reg. v. Ellis, 30 W. R. 613, 8 Q. B. D. 466, material was carried from one fixed place to another, and there was only one road by which this could be carried.

The conclusion seems to be that on the balance of authority, as well as on the construction of the Act apart from authority, Lord Gerard did not do anything which could in law amount to an order for conducting this traffic or any part of it, and cannot, therefore, be held liable in respect of it.

HARRIS v. SLEEP. (a.)

Practice—Receiver—Salary—Security—Premiums paid to guarantee society—Liability.

Where in an action for dissolution of partnership one of the partners is appointed receiver, or receiver and manager, without a salary, and has to find security for his fidelity, he is properly allowed out of the assets the amount paid by him as premiums to a guarantee society for furnishing such security.

It is otherwise, however, where he is appointed with a salary, as in that case he is bound to pay out of his own pocket whatever expenses are reasonably incurred by him in finding security, whether by bond or sureties or through a guarantee society.

This was a summons in an action for dissolution of partnership to vary the master's certificate, the facts being as follows:

The plaintiff and the defendant had carried on a partnership business at Plymouth as makers of agricultural implements.

On the 25th of January, 1892, the usual judgment for dissolution and accounts was pronounced and the defendant was thereby appointed receiver and manager of the business on his undertaking to act without salary.

In pursuance of an order of the 26th of October, 1893, the defendant bought the business at a valuation. In the accounts which he brought in as receiver from the date of his appointment to the date of the purchase he claimed to be allowed two insurance premiums of £25 each, paid by him to a guarantee society under guarantee for his fidelity as receiver, the society becoming his sureties under a bond dated the 25th of February, 1892, for £5,000 given by him as receiver and manager.

The master, by his certificate made on the 22nd of February, 1897, allowed the two payments of £25.

The plaintiff now applied to vary the certificate by disallowing these two payments.

Renshaw, Q.C., and F. Thompson, for the plaintiff.—The practice is not uniform, and this is a case where such payments should not be allowed out of the assets, but should come out of the receiver and manager's pocket.

Warmington, Q.C., and Mark Romer, for the defendant.—The defendant was appointed as receiver and manager without a salary, and is entitled to be recouped out of the assets the amount he paid for obtaining his sureties.

KEKEWICH, J.—The question which arises is this: When a receiver or a receiver and manager is appointed with a salary, it is considered—and the practice is uniform—that he is bound to pay whatever expenses are reasonably incurred by him in finding security, whether by bond or sureties or through a guarantee society. About that there seems to be no question.

The question which arises here for the first time is, What ought to be done where a receiver or a receiver and manager is appointed without remuneration, but has to find security?

My senior master, Mr. Lionel Clarke, has here allowed the premiums which the receiver has paid to a guarantee society. He has done so after a consulta- with his brothers, and it seems to be the uniform practice in my chambers. It is suggested that there is a want of uniformity in the practice in other chambers. I might have referred the matter to a committee of the masters, but instead of that I have chosen to consult Mr. Burney and Mr. Church as representing the experience of other chambers. Mr. Church, notwithstanding his long experience, says that he cannot remember the question ever having occurred, but also says that he should allow the payment. Mr. Burney says that the case has occurred in his experience, and that the payment ought to be allowed.

I think, therefore, that there is not that want of uniformity which has been suggested, and therefore I allow these payments.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Freeman, for the illegitimate nephews and nieces.—It is true that the old cases are against illegitimates sharing (Bagley v. Mollard, 1 Russ. & My. 581; In re Hall, Branston v. Weightman, 35 W. R. 797, 35 Ch. D. 551; Megson v. Hindle, 28 W. R. 866, 15 Ch. D. 198), but the tendency of modern cases is in favour of illegitimates taking where it may be gathered from the will that such was the intention: Seale-Hayne v. Jodrell, [1891] A. C. 304, 40 W. R. Dig. 284. In that case a testator divided the residue of his estate among his "relatives hereinbefore named," and in his will he had called persons who were not legitimately connected with him his "cousins," and the House of Lords held that that was sufficient to indicate the intention that such persons and even their children should take under the term "relatives": In the Goods of George Ashton, [1891] P. 83, 40 W. R. Dig. 203. In re Fish, Ingham v. Rayner, 42 W. R. 520, [1894] 2 Ch. 83, only decided that where a legitimate relative sufficiently answered the description of a legatee given in the will, it was not to be said that because there was another person bearing the same name who was in the same degree of relationship to the testator, but illegitimate, there was a latent ambiguity in the will, so as to admit of extrinsic evidence being adduced to show that it was the illegitimate relative whom the testator intended to benefit. There the will itself contained no evidence of such intention: In re Brown, Walsh v. Brown, 62 L. T. N. S. 899, 38 W. R. Dig. 216; In re Deakin, Starkey v. Eyres, 43 W. R. 70, [1894] 3 Ch. 565; In re Bryon, Drummond v. Leigh, 30 Ch. D. 110, 34 W. R. Dig. 218.

Ryland, for legitimate nephews and nieces.—Smith v. Lidiard, 3 K. & J. 252. In Seale-Hayne v. Jodrell neither Bagley v. Mollard, nor In re Hall, nor Megson v. Hindle are referred to, and therefore they are not overruled by that case.

Cur. adv. vult.

KEKEWICH, J.—The sole question for decision is whether the defendant James William Robinson, who takes a legacy under the title of my wife's nephew James William Robinson, can share the residue given to "all and every the nephew and niece and nephews and nieces of my said wife," he being in truth not a nephew, but an illegitimate child of a deceased brother of the testator's wife.

There were other illegitimate children of the same brother, and these died in the testator's lifetime, and their issue may claim under an alternative gift, but this judgment is concerned only with James William Robinson. I have said that he was not a nephew, and that is undoubtedly true. The term nephew or niece as much postulates the marriage of the brother or sister parent of the person designated, before his or her birth as the term child postulates that of the testator himself, or other the person alluded to as father or mother. There is ample authority for this proposition if authority be needed. Therefore James William Robinson cannot take under the gift of residue standing alone, and what I have to decide is whether the language in which a legacy is given to him alters this interpretation.

I promised to study the many authorities cited before pronouncing judgment, and that has been done. The first to be mentioned is necessarily Bagley v. Mollard. It is distinctly and directly against the applicant: and it is only one example, though probably the most pointed example of authorities on that side, but it is only one of a class extending over a long period, see In re Hall, Branston v. Weightman. These authorities are not impugned by some of the later cases in which the subject has been discussed, but the later cases do seem more and more to open the door for the admission of those born out of wedlock, and in particular to sanction a construction in their favour if it can fairly be extracted from the language of the will. To this class belongs Hill v. Crook, 22 W. R. 137, L. R. 6 E. & I. App. 265. Lord Cairns, at pp. 282, 283, gives two possible cases. The first is out of the question here. Is the second applicable? Not so according to Bagley v. Mollard, and the weight of that authority must be removed before one can answer that question in the affirmative. It is said to have been removed by the decision in Seale-Hayne v. Jodrell. I confess to entertaining great difficulty in arriving at that conclusion. In that case both in the Court of Appeal and in the House of Lords the decision was rested on the particular language of the will in question, and there was undoubtedly language far more favourable to the illegitimate relatives than can be found here. It was urged by Mr. Renshaw that the first part of Lord Herschell's speech in moving the judgment of the House was independent of the words "hereinbefore named," but it is impossible to read that speech, or even that part of it as if those words had been omitted from the will. A similar remark applies to the language of Lord Hannen, and Lord Macnaghten dwells on the referential words. According to the report no cases were cited in the House of Lords, and I can hardly suppose that it was intended to overrule a series of authorities without mention of them. These authorities were cited in the Court of Appeal (38 W. R. 721, 44 Ch. D. 590), and except by insisting on the importance of construing each instrument by itself the members of the Court of Appeal did not endeavour to impugn them. It is useless to inquire what they would have done in the absence of the referential words, but Lindley, L.J., speaks of the difficulty as "a formidable one," p. 611 of 44 Ch. D.

But it seems to me that the judges have treated the decision in Seale-Hayne v. Jodrell as of wider application than unassisted I should be disposed to think it. That was apparently the view of Stirling, J., in In re Deakin, Starkey v. Eyres, though, as he was aided by surrounding circumstances, it may be not so clear an interpretation of the decision as it otherwise would have been. Yet referring to his earlier judgment in In re Brown, Walsh v. Brown, where Bagley v. Mollard and In re Hall, Branston v. Weightman were both cited, it is observed that the same learned judge came to a similar conclusion without the assistance of the House of Lords—that is, with only the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Jodrell, Jodrell v. Seale, before him. I must regard these decisions of Stirling, J., as authorities in favour of the applicant. There is also the judgment of the President of the Probate Division in In re Ashton. That was not argued on the authority of the old cases, which, indeed, were treated as supplanted by those of modern date, and the President's note of In re Jodrell, Jodrell v. Seale, [1892] P., at p. 88, shows that he considered it to be independent of the words "hereinbefore named," and on these facts I might safely disregard these judgments without want of respect to their learned authors. Falling back on the older cases never expressly overruled, never, so far as I am aware, commented on adversely by name, and frequently followed, my position would be unimpeachable.

But I cannot shut my eyes to the many judicial utterances pointing to a conclusion different from that of the older cases, and mainly dependent on the wholesome rule that for the construction of a will with a view to discovering the testator's meaning one must pay strict attention to the language of that one will, unfettered by rules—other than those of a technical character—which may have properly influenced the construction of another.

And, bearing that in mind, I cannot but recognize the consistency with the modern view of the judgments of the President and Stirling, J., or the inconsistency which a judgment on different lines would introduce. Even though a construction of this will, according to Bagley v. Mollard might be judicially sound, it would, I opine, start a wave of uncertainty in the current of authority, which it is a judicial duty to avoid. It being permissible to enlarge the class of nephews and nieces so as to include those who are illegitimate, if the testator has indicated his intention that this should be done, and especially if he has furnished a dictionary by means of which his language may be interpreted, I cannot hesitate to say that as regards James William Robinson the indication is here and the dictionary is forthcoming. All other questions must be left open. There must be an inquiry, the evidence on which I will endeavour to limit, so as to prevent the small fund vanishing in costs, and on that inquiry any other claims can be considered, and any other points can be raised and argued.

All that I decide is that James William Robinson, notwithstanding his illegitimacy, is included in the class of "my wife's nephews and nieces."

There is some evidence to show that this conclusion might be supported by surrounding circumstances, such as weighed with Stirling, J., in one of the cases above mentioned. Not much was made of this in argument, and it is better here to say no more of it than that it has not influenced my decision.

Section 7, sub-section (1), of the Finance Act, 1894, does not apply to cases falling under sub-section (7) (b) of the same section.

Petition of the third Earl Cowley under section 10 sub-section (1) of the Finance Act, 1894, from the decision of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

By his will dated the 27th of June, 1863, and proved on the 20th of August in the same year, the late Earl of Mornington devised his real estate to the use of trustees upon trust out of the rents and profits to pay the interest on certain mortgage debts (all since discharged) and to keep in repair and insured certain parts of his estate and to pay such parts of certain annuities bequeathed by his will as the income of his residuary personalty should be insufficient to pay (of which annuities two only were subsisting at the date of the death of the second Earl Cowley). Subject and charged as above mentioned, the testator's real estate was to be held upon trust for the first Earl Cowley for life and after his death for the second earl for life, and after the death of the second earl for the first and every other son of the second earl successively in remainder in tail male with remainders over. The will also gave powers to the tenants for life of jointuring and charging portions, and contained provisions for the sale of the settled lands and for application of the proceeds in the purchase of other lands to be similarly settled, or in investments in securities to be held upon the like trusts as if the same were laid out in the purchase of lands.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The first earl died on the 15th of July, 1884, and his eldest son, the second earl, thereupon succeeded in possession to the estates and interests conferred upon him by the above will.

By a deed-poll of the 1st of April, 1865, the second earl in exercise of his power of jointuring under the above will, appointed a yearly rent-charge of £500 to his wife Emily Gwendolen Countess Cowley for her life, if she should survive him, to be charged on the trust estates.

By virtue of divers indentures the life interest of the second earl in the trust estates (and certain policies on his life) became charged with payment to the London Assurance Corporation of several annuities during his life redeemable on payment of the principal sum of £64,248, and also with several mortgage debts amounting together to the principal sum of £80,000.

The petitioner was the only son of the second earl, and attained the age of twenty-one years in his father's lifetime on the 13th of January, 1887.

On the 14th of January, 1887, the second earl and the petitioner executed a disentailing deed (which was duly enrolled) whereby the interests in the trust property created by or under the powers of the above will and preceding the estate tail of the petitioner (except the life estate of the second earl) were preserved, and subject thereto the trust estates were limited to such uses and subject to such powers as the second earl and the petitioner should jointly appoint, and in default of such appointment to the use of second earl for life by way of restoration of the estate vested in him immediately before the execution of that deed with all powers annexed thereto, and after his death to certain uses to secure a jointure of £2,000 per annum to the Countess Emily Gwendolen and to secure portions and to enable the petitioner to create a jointure for his widow (if any) with remainder to the use of the petitioner in tail male with remainders over.

By deed-poll dated the 7th of June, 1888, the second earl (in exercise of his powers in that behalf) charged the trust property with the payment, on his death, of £10,000 and interest as the portion of Lady Eva Cecilia Wellesley.

In the year 1888 an arrangement was effected under which the Prudential Assurance Co. paid off the mortgage debts owing, and redeemed the annuities payable to the London Assurance Co. (taking transfers of their securities) and made a further advance to the second earl and the petitioner jointly, the total sum so paid or advanced by the Prudential being £210,000. That sum was secured to the Prudential by a mortgage of the 8th of June, 1888, to which the second earl, the petitioner, and the Countess Emily Gwendolen (who joined for the purpose of postponing her jointure) were parties. By this mortgage, after a joint and several covenant by the second earl and the petitioner to pay the principal sum of £210,000 and interest, the second earl and the petitioner in exercise of the power of appointment vested in them by the disentailing deed of the 14th of January, 1887, appointed, and also by virtue of their interests therein conveyed, the trust property to the Prudential in fee simple (subject to the annuities then subsisting under the will of Lord Mornington and to Lady Eva C. Wellesley's portion) by way of mortgage to secure the said principal sum and interest.

By a deed of re-settlement of the 9th of June, 1888, after recitals stating that part of the £210,000 advanced by the Prudential was applied in discharging incumbrances on the life estate of the second earl, and that the mortgage to the Prudential was executed by the petitioner on an express agreement that the second earl should join with him in executing the present deed, the second earl and the petitioner, in exercise of their joint power under the disentailing deed, appointed that (subject as in that deed mentioned and subject to the deed-poll of the 7th of June, 1888, and to the mortgage to the Prudential) the trustees should hold the trust property upon such trusts as the second earl and the petitioner should jointly appoint, and in default of such appointment upon trust that the petitioner should receive certain annuities during the life of the second earl, varying in certain events; and subject thereto in trust for the second earl for life by way of restoration of his life estate under the will of Lord Mornington, and after his death (after trusts for securing a sum for the benefit of Lady Eva C. Wellesley and a rent-charge to the countess) upon trust for the petitioner for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with remainders over. The resettlement also contained a provision to the effect that as between the second earl and the petitioner the second earl should, during his life, be primarily liable for the payment of the interest on the mortgage debt of £210,000.

By subsequent deeds the trust estates were further charged by the second earl and the petitioner to secure various sums expressed to be advanced to them by the Prudential.

The second earl died on the 28th of February, 1895. At that date the principal mortgage debt owing to the Prudential under the above mortgage and further charges amounted to £230,000, of which £199,987 11s. 8d. had been paid to or for the second earl, and £30,012 8s. 4d. to or for the petitioner.

At the same date the petitioner was by virtue of the provisions of the resettlement in receipt of annuities charged on the settled property amounting to £3,000.

The petitioner, as the person to whom property under the resettlement had passed on the death of the second earl for a beneficial interest in possession, and as accountable for the estate duty accordingly, duly delivered to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue an affidavit with a schedule annexed. Parts I. and II. of the schedule gave particulars of the trust investments and lands, the total principal value shown being £538,426 11s. 1d. Part III. contained "deductions from the principal value of property comprised in Parts I. and II.," and included five items. Items 1, 2, and 3 represented the capitalized values of the subsisting annuities under Lord Mornington's will and of interest payable during two joint lives on the consideration money received for the sale of an advowson, part of the trust estate comprised in that will. These items, together amounting to £9,140 17s., were allowed by the Commissioners. Item 4 was such part of the mortgage debt of £230,000 as was created wholly for the deceased's own use and benefit—viz., £199,987 11s. 8d. Item 5 was the capitalized value of the life annuity of £3,000 enjoyed under the resettlement by the petitioner at the death of the deceased—viz., £65,200. These two items were disallowed by the Commissioners. The net principal value chargeable with estate duty would be, on the basis of the deductions claimed by the petitioner, £264,098 2s. 5d., and according to the determination of the Commissioners, £529,285 14s. 1d.

The petitioner in his appeal claimed that the whole of the £230,000 secured on mortgage, and also the £65,200, the capitalized value of the annuities, ought to be allowed as deductions from the principal value of the estate.

Haldane, Q.C., and Henry Fellows, for the petitioner.—The whole of the mortgage debt of £230,000 ought to be deducted, or at least so much thereof as was received by the deceased or applied for his benefit. The mortgage and further charges were made upon the whole fee simple of the property under the paramount joint power of appointment reserved to the second earl and the petitioner by the disentailing deed and the resettlement. Consequently, the property passing on the death of the second earl (or deemed so to pass under section 2 (1) (b) of the Finance Act, 1894) was the equity of redemption only, and it is only upon the value of the property so passing that estate duty is chargeable: Finance Act, 1894, s. 1 (1). If the mortgage debt be not deducted the Crown will be receiving duty upon the interest of the mortgagees, which in no sense passed on the death. Sections 1 and 2 of the Finance Act are the sections which impose the tax, and the only question is what property passed or is to be deemed to have passed on the death within the meaning of these sections. The estate of the mortgagees did not pass, but the property subject to the whole mortgage debt did pass, and it is only on the value of the property less that mortgage debt that duty is payable. As to the part of the mortgage debt which was paid to or for the benefit of the second earl that is within the allowances permitted to be made by section 7 (1) of the Act. This sum was an incumbrance created by dispositions made by the deceased for full consideration wholly for his own benefit and took effect out of his interest. And the value of the benefit accruing from the cesser of the second earl's interest was the value of the whole property less the interest of the mortgagees (section 7 (7)). But it is not necessary to claim the benefit of the allowances under section 7, for the property taxable under sections 1 and 2 is the equity of redemption only. The cesser of the annuities mentioned in item 5 of the affidavit caused no benefit to accrue, because the petitioner, who was the annuitant, also took the estate upon which they were charged. The capital value of the annuities is not to be deemed to have passed under section 2 (1) (b).

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G. (Vaughan Hawkins with them), for the Crown.—The mortgage debts are not a proper subject for deduction. They are not a charge upon the whole property, for under the will and subsequent settlements the property could never be dealt with as a whole. The second earl and the petitioner could not charge the fee; the incumbrances created by them under the joint power in the disentailing deed must be read into that deed which created the power (Braybrooke v. Attorney-General, 9 W. R. 601, 9 H. L. Cas. 150; Attorney-General v. Chapman, 40 W. R. 79, [1891] 2 Q. B. 526), and they only affected their successive interests in the property. The interests in the property taken by particular persons are immaterial for the purposes of this Act. The whole property "passed" under sections 1 and 2, and the fact that there are charges on certain interests in it must be disregarded. The interest of the second earl extended to the whole income of the property (except for the small over-riding charges in respect of which deductions have been allowed), and this is the "value of the benefit accruing" within section 7 (7). The sum received by the second earl from the mortgagees cannot be deducted under section 7 (1) because the incumbrances did not take effect "out of his interest." Those words must mean "out of the interest which he transmits," not "out of the interest which determines on his death," which would be an absurdity; the second earl could not charge anything beyond his life interest; the charge on any subsequent interest must have been by the petitioner, and it cannot be contended that a mortgage debt created by a reversioner during the preceding life estate can be deducted from the value of the property passing on the life tenant's death. The £3,000 annuities ceased on the death of the second earl, and a benefit accrued to the property on their cesser; it is immaterial that in the particular circumstances the petitioner received no benefit; the value of the annuities passed on the death, and the Act imposes a tax on the value of property passing, and not on the interests of individuals in that property.

Haldane, in reply.—The doctrine applied in Braybrooke v. Attorney-General to cases under section 12 of the Succession Duty Act, and in Attorney-General v. Chapman to the particular circumstances of that case is wholly irrevelant here. The charges here are upon the whole fee simple of the property which the second earl and the petitioner were able to deal with under the joint power given to them by the disentailing deed. If the transaction had been a sale instead of a mortgage, and the proceeds of sale had been invested, it could not be contended that duty would be payable both on the estate sold and on the investments of the proceeds: here the interest of the mortgagees must be treated as if property to that extent had been sold.

Sir R. B. Finlay, in rejoinder.—The form of the mortgage of the 8th of June, 1888, shows that the charge was given on the successive interests; the prior charges on the second earl's life estate were kept alive, and the intention was that there should be no merger of the interests of the second earl and the petitioner.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 11.—The judgment of the COURT (POLLOCK, B., and BRUCE, J.), was delivered by BRUCE, J.—In this case a petition has been filed by the third Earl Cowley pursuant to rule 1 of the Rules of the Supreme Court made under section 10 of the Finance Act, 1894, for the determination of the amount of estate duty payable in respect of property which, within the meaning of the above Act, passed on the death of his father, the second Earl Cowley.

By the first section of the Finance Act, 1894, it is enacted that in the case of every person dying after the commencement of part 1 of the Act there shall, save as thereinafter expressly provided, be levied and paid upon the principal value, ascertained as thereinafter provided, of all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of such person, a duty called estate duty.

By the second section it is enacted, so far as material to this case, that property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include "(b) Property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased, to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest."

Section 7 contains provisions for determining value. The seventh sub-section of section 7 seems to us to contain the material provisions affecting the present case. By this "the value of the benefit accruing or arising from the cesser of an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased shall (a) if the interest extended to the whole income of the property be the principal value of that property; and (b) if the interest extended to less than the whole income of the property be the principal value of an addition to the property equal to the income to which the interest extended."

Now, it is admitted that property passed, or what is the same thing for present purposes, that property is to be deemed to have passed within the meaning of the statute on the death of the second Earl Cowley, and the whole contention has been as to the value of the benefit accruing or arising from the cesser of the interest ceasing on his death.

It has been admitted by the Crown that certain annuities charged on the estate by virtue of the will of William Richard Arthur Earl of Mornington, and numbered items 1 and 2 in Part III. of the schedule of the petitioner's affidavit, referred to in the petition p. 32, par. 32, and the capitalized value of certain interests referred to in item 3 of the same schedule, must be deducted in order to arrive at the value of the benefit accruing. The amount of these three items is £9,140 17s.

The principal dispute has arisen with respect to mortgages on the property amounting in the whole to £230,000. The question we have to determine is whether these mortgages are to be taken into account in assessing the value of the benefit accruing or arising from the cesser of the interest ceasing on the death of the second Earl Cowley. It is quite clear that the interest of the second earl extended to less than the whole income of the property. It extended only to the income of the property after payment of the sums payable in respect of the admitted items 1, 2, and 3 already mentioned. The question presents itself—if the income to which the interest of the deceased extended is to be taken as the income of the property after deducting the charges on the property 1, 2, and 3, why should not the income to which his interest extended be limited in like manner to the amount he was entitled to receive after the interest on the mortgages had been paid?

The argument of the Attorney-General was that the mortgages were not charges upon the property passing on the death of the second earl. He contended that so far as they were charges on the interest which expired on the death of the second earl they were charges on his life interest only.

But it seems clear that by the mortgages in question, the second Earl Cowley as tenant for life and the petitioner as remainderman conveyed or appointed to the mortgagees the whole of their respective estates, and therefore that the charges were charges on the fee simple of the estate and remained in force notwithstanding the death of the second earl, so that the charges were in no respect diminished by the death of the deceased.

With reference to this view of the facts the Attorney-General urged that the charges upon the property so far as they extended beyond the life interest of the second earl were not to be considered because they could not have been created without the concurrence of the third earl and were not, properly speaking, charges on the property passing. But we do not think it is possible to adopt this contention. The life estate of the second earl no doubt never passed, but it was an interest in property and that interest ceased on the death of the second earl, and this property, the interest in which was so determined, is to be deemed (section 2, sub-section 1 (b)) to pass to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest. The value to be determined in this case is not the principal value of the property, but the value of the benefit accruing or arising from the cesser of the interest which existed during the life of the second earl and ceased at his death. In dealing with interests ceasing on the death of the deceased the Legislature deals with interests which in fact do not pass although the property in which the interests subsisted is to be deemed to have passed to the extent above mentioned.

The value of the benefit accruing or arising by the cesser of an interest would be a difficult matter to determine had no rules been laid down in the Finance Act for estimating such value. But the 7th sub-section of the 7th section enacts that the value of the benefit to be determined by the cesser of the interest, in a case where the interest extended to less than the whole income of the property, is the principal value of an addition to the property equal to the income to which the interest extended. In other words, it is to be determined by ascertaining the value of the income to which the interest of the second earl extended. That income was the income which remained after satisfying the admitted deductions 1, 2, and 3, and the amount of interest due on the mortgages. The interest of the second earl was an interest for his life subject to the mortgages, and the mortgages undoubtedly remained subsisting charges at his death. The benefit accruing from the passing of the property was no more than the capitalized value of the income which the second earl actually had a right to enjoy. In other words, it was the value of the income to which the equity of redemption of the life estate of the second earl extended.

For the reasons we have given, we think the value of the benefit accruing or arising from the death of the second earl must be reckoned exclusively of the interest payable at the date of his death to keep down the mortgages and other charges.

In case an objection should be taken to this construction of the statute on the ground that it would lead to the result that in case of a mortgage on a life estate the value of the benefit arising from the cesser of the life interest must be taken to be based upon the income the life tenant received in his lifetime after the payment of the mortgages, we may observe that we think no such conclusion follows. The value of the benefit accruing from the cesser of an interest ceasing on death is to be measured by the extent to which a benefit accrues by the cesser of such interest, and in the case where the mortgage is on the life interest only, so that the charge ceases on the death, the interest ceasing on the death of the deceased would extend to the whole income of the property, because at that moment when the property is to be deemed to have passed the interest ceased to be incumbered. It seems to us that the language of the statute warrants a broad distinction being drawn between cases where the incumbrances cease at the death and cases where the incumbrances remain charges on the property after the death.

In the present case we do not think it necessary to consider whether the estates of the second and third earl merged; it is enough, we think, that the rights of the incumbrancers remained in force on the property after the decease of the second earl, and affected the interests then subsisting whatever those interests were.

We have not referred to sub-section 1 of section 7 because we do not think it applies to cases within sub-section 7 (b) of section 7. In cases where the principal value of the property is the measure of the amount of the duty to be paid either generally where the whole estate passes or in cases falling under sub-section 7 (a), the rule as to allowances laid down in section 7, sub-section 1, applies. But section 7, sub-section 1, has, we think, no application to a case falling under section 7, sub-section 7 (b).

A further question arises with respect to the capitalized value of certain annuities amounting at the death of the second earl to £3,000 per annum charged on the property and payable to the third earl during the life of the second earl. We think that no deduction can be allowed in respect of the value of these annuities because they they were not existing incumbrances at the moment of the passing of the property. It is true that the third earl is not a gainer by the extinction of these annuities because they were payable to him, they were charges for his benefit.

But they did not affect the value of the property passing and cannot be regarded as effecting a diminution of the income to which the interest of the second earl extended.

The result of our judgment is that we allow the second head of the petitioner's appeal which relates to the sum of £230,000 secured by mortgage. As to the fourth head of appeal, which relates to the sum of £65,200, the decision of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue will stand.

The costs of this appeal should be paid by the Crown.

RUTTER AND ANOTHER (Respondents) v. OVERSEERS AND PARISH COUNCIL OF CRAYFORD (Appellants). (a.)

Poor law—Rating—Property other than land—Land—Brickfield—43 Eliz. c. 2, s. 1—Lighting and Watching Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 90), s. 33.

By section 33 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 90, the owners and occupiers of houses, buildings, and property (other than land) rateable to the relief of the poor in any parish, shall be rated at and pay a rate in the £ three times greater than that which the owners and occupiers of land shall be rated at and pay for the purposes of the Act.

Held, that "property other than land" meant things ejusdem generis with "houses and buildings," and did not include a brickfield; and that a foreman's cottage together with all the sheds and machinery for brick-making erected on the property (at any rate so long as that property was assessed as a whole) must be considered as merely ancillary to the brickfield, and therefore the owners of the brickfield were not liable to be rated at the higher rate.

Case stated on an appeal to the Kent Quarter Sessions on a rating appeal in respect of rates made under section 33 of the Lighting and Watching Act, 1833, on a brickfield belonging to the respondents on this application who were the appellants in the court below.

The quarter sessions held that the brickfield was "land" and not "houses, buildings, and property other than land" within the meaning of the section, and directed that the owners of the brickfield should be rated at 2d. in the pound instead of 6d. as in the rate, and that the rate should be amended accordingly. On this decision the rating authority asked and obtained the statement of a case.

By the Poor Relief Act, 1601 (43 Eliz. c. 2, s. 1), the overseers of the poor are authorized to raise moneys for the relief of the poor "by taxation of . . . every occupier of lands, houses, tithes impropriate or propriations of tithes, coal mines, or saleable underwoods."

By the Lighting and Watching Act, 1833, s. 33, the overseers of the poor of any parish to which the provisions of the Act extend "shall, for the purpose of collecting, raising, and levying the rate necessary for the purposes of this Act, proceed in the same manner and have the same powers, remedies, and privileges for levying money for the relief of the poor of the said parish provided always that owners and occupiers of houses, buildings, and property (other than land) rateable to the relief of the poor in any such parish shall be rated at and pay a rate in the £ three times greater than that at which the owners and occupiers of land shall be rated at for the purposes of this Act."

The case stated that these brickfields had been rated as one property at 6d. in the £ as "brickfield, land used for pipes, and other lands." Of the land included in the assessment twenty-five acres were agricultural land, and as to this there was no dispute. The remainder of the property was used and occupied by the respondents entirely for brick-making. For the purposes of their business several engine-houses with engines and wash-mills had been erected on various portions of the property. On the surface of the ground tram-lines had been laid down by which the brick earth as excavated was conveyed to the wash-mills. The earth, after being treated there was conveyed by lines of pipes to sheds where it was made into bricks. There was also an open shed used as a wheelwright's shop and smithy, and a "tumble-down" stable. The foreman occupied a cottage on another part of the property, and there was also a wharf used for loading bricks into barges. On another plot, described as "hack-ground," was another engine-house with its coal-shed. The clay pits and moulders' huts, situated on one of the plots, consisted of a series of roofed buildings with open sides, containing fourteen machine mixers worked by an engine.

Morton Smith (with him Hohler), for the rating authority.—The quarter sessions were wrong in amending the rate. The present assessment is made on the property as a whole. Treated in that light, the whole must be considered as a commercial undertaking with business premises in which capital is invested for trade purposes. These works on the brickfield make it "property other than land," and it ought therefore to be rated at the higher rate. If the court be against this view of the facts, at all events the foreman's cottage, the engine-houses, the pumping-stations, the mills, and especially the wharf, should be separately assessed and the respondents should pay on that assessment at the higher rate.

Dickens, Q.C. (with him Tassell) contra.—The decision of the quarter sessions is right. Under the Act of Elizabeth a brickfield for the purposes of rating is "land." It is also land under the Act of 1833. The appellants have failed to show that the buildings erected by the respondent for the purpose of carrying on the works are of such a character as to convert, so to speak, this "land" into "property other than land." I submit that every building mentioned in the case or shown on the plan is merely ancillary to the brickfield, which can therefore only be rated as a brickfield—that is, as "land." Possibly the foreman's cottage and the various engine-sheds and mills might rightly form the subject of a separate assessment, and if so they might then pay a rate as "buildings," but that is not the question here, since the rating authority has thought fit to assess the property as a whole.

CAVE, J.—I think that the court of quarter sessions has come to a right decision on the case as it stands. They had only before them an assessment on the property as a whole, and treated as a whole it is undoubtedly land and not buildings or property other than land. Under the Act of Elizabeth making property rateable a distinction is drawn between "land" and "houses." In the Lighting and Watching Act a difficulty arises in certain cases in deciding at what rate property is to be assessed by the introduction of the word "buildings" into the corresponding section. In the present case the property consists of land with buildings thereon. Now, if it is right that it should be rated as buildings then it is liable to assessment at the rate three times as high as if it were assessed as land; and that is the question we have here to decide.

The judges have fluctuated in their decisions on the matter, having at first sought to find a reason for the distinction. At one time it was thought that a good ground of distinction could be found by attributing the meaning of "buildings" in the section to land used otherwise than for agricultural purposes. No doubt this arose from reference to the notion that land used otherwise than for agricultural purposes was intended by the framers of the Act to be rated at a higher rate, because it would derive greater benefit from the application of the Lighting and Watching Act than land in its ordinary agricultural condition did. But as the definition of property other than land in the Statute of Elizabeth included not only coal mines but saleable underwoods it soon became clear that such a principle of division could not be applied. In fact, it cannot now be said that the numerous authorities establish any further principle than this—that when it has been ascertained what was rateable as land under the statute of Elizabeth, then it is necessary to consider whether the property in question, although rateable as land under that statute, is really buildings or really land within the meaning of those terms in the Watching Act in order to determine whether it is liable to the higher or lower rate. But then there are cases where the object of rateability, though clearly land under the statute of Elizabeth, consists both of land and buildings—that is to say, is land covered with buildings. Here, if the land is accessory to the buildings, it must be rated as property other than land, and if the buildings are accessory to the land it must be rated as land. Thus, for instance, if the object of rateability be a plot of land on which a large warehouse has been erected with a courtyard attached for the convenience of carts delivering goods at the house, the land would be in such a case ancillary to the buildings. If there is a piece of land occupied as a farm with a small shed for horses to shelter in, such a building would be, on the other hand, ancillary to the land, and liable only to pay at the lower rate.

In this case the quarter sessions could hardly have come to any other conclusion than that which they came to, treating the assessment as a whole. But it may be that those who framed the rate were wrong, and that they ought to have divided up the assessment. As long as they rated it as one property, I entertain no doubt that the magistrates were right in the view they came to, and if I am asked whether the rating officers ought to have rated it as one complete thing, I am unable to give an answer from the materials I have before me, except as regards the house occupied by the foreman. The house is a house, and not a building other than a house, and if the house is not land, consequently it falls to be rated at the higher rate under the express words of the statute as being a house if it is to be taken separately. If it is to be "lumped" together along with a quantity of land, then I must of course ask myself which is the principal and which is the accessory, and there can be no doubt on the facts stated that the land would be the principal and this building, even although called a house, would be the accessory. Taking the brickfield as a whole, apart from the house, all the engine-houses and sheds are obviously ancillary to the use of the land as a brickfield. Very possibly, therefore, if these were rated separately and apart from the brickfield, their rateable value would be so reduced by their severance from the brickfield that it might be better policy on behalf of the rating authorities to leave them to be assessed as part of the land, but that is a question of common sense for the authorities themselves to decide. For these reasons, taking the brickfield as a whole, the magistrates were, in my opinion, right in reducing the rate, and the appeal must accordingly be dismissed with costs.

REG. v. THE CLERK OF ASSIZE, OXFORD CIRCUIT.
Ex parte DANIELL v. SAISE.
REG. v. THE SAME.
Ex parte TREE. (a.)

Coroner's inquest—Criminal law—Inquisition—Validity of—Quarries Act, 1887, s. 3.

An inquisition finding that the deceased met his death from injuries to his head and back caused by a fall into a quarry, and that by "the neglect of" three specified persons "to fence or cause to be fenced the said quarry the said" deceased person "fell therein, and that therefore the said" three specified persons "did feloniously kill the said" deceased, is bad upon the face of it, on the ground that, although it stated certain facts, it had not stated any facts showing that there was a duty on the part of the three specified persons to fence the quarry.

In this case two rules nisi were obtained to quash certain inquisitions and recognizances.

The facts of the case were these: One George Seabourne met his death on the 26th of December, 1896, by falling into a quarry upon which a highway known as Snuff Mills-lane at Stapleton abutted, but which was not properly fenced in.

From the evidence of the clerk to the urban district council given at the inquest it appeared that A. J. Saise, who was inspector of nuisances to the said district council, reported to that body that, under the Quarries Act, 1887, Snuff Mills-lane was insufficiently fenced, and that two letters of complaint as regards the safety of the said lane from different persons had been communicated to the council, and that in consequence a letter was sent, by order of the council, to the owners of the quarry, pointing out that the quarry required fencing off. The witness further stated that T. Tree, the managing director of the company that owned the quarry, subsequently told him that the dangerous places had been fenced.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The coroner's jury returned a verdict of manslaughter against E. T. Daniell, the chairman of the urban district council; A. J. Saise, the surveyor and inspector of nuisances; and T. Tree, the said managing director. The inquisition found that "the cause of Seabourne's death was injuries to his head and back caused by a fall into a quarry, and so the jurors do further say that by neglect of" the aforesaid persons "to fence or cause to be fenced the said quarry," the aforesaid persons "did felonously kill the said George Seabourne."

Thereupon two rules nisi to quash the inquisitions and recognizances were obtained on the ground that the inquisition was bad in law because it not disclose an offence on the part of the applicants.

The Quarry (Fencing) Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 19), s. 3, provides that a quarry within fifty yards of a highway, and not separated therefrom by a secure and sufficient fence "shall be kept reasonably fenced for the prevention of accidents, and unless so kept shall be deemed a nuisance liable to be dealt with summarily in manner provided by the Public Health Act, 1875."

Hon. A. Lyttelton, showed cause.—He contended that the inquisition was sufficiently stated, and cited Reg. v. Pocock, 17 Q. B. 34, and Reg. v. Ingham, 29 L. J. M. C. 18. The offence alleged contains all the constituents of manslaughter.

Danckwerts and Gwynne James, in support of the rules.

H. Sutton, for the Public Prosecutor.

WRIGHT, J.—I think this inquisition must be quashed. Clearly, if it had been simply found that the three defendants did felonously kill and slay the deceased person, it would have been enough, but I think it appears to be a general rule of criminal pleading, for which a good deal of support can be found in a number of references collected in Archbold's Pleadings and Evidence in Criminal Cases (21st ed., pp. 62, 229, and 230) that although a simple statutory form of indictment or inquisition may suffice, still, if the party chooses to resort to what may be called a special indictment or inquisition the case is altered, and then it appears that every part of the special indictment or inquisition which states the material elements of the offence charged must state it so as in law to state a sufficient matter to support conviction. Of course it is very seldom material, because in the great majority of cases now there is abundant power to amend, but unless that is amended it seems to be fatal on demurrer, and in a proper case upon an application to quash.

I should like to test it in this way. Supposing here at the trial the jury found a special verdict following the very terms of this inquisition, it would be entirely and obviously bad. It seems to me that is a very fair test to apply. There is no common law duty to fence a quarry which is not stated to be so situate as to be a public nuisance. There is no statutory duty to fence it unless it is within a certain distance of a highway, and there is no allegation that the defendants or any of them had any such relation to the quarry as to involve them in a personal liability to fence. Therefore, clearly a special verdict to this effect would have been entirely bad. I do not say that is an absolute test. I do not think it is, but it illustrates the kind of view that may be taken. Then in an ordinary case very likely this court might refuse to quash the inquisition. We are bound by the case of Reg. v. The Great Western Railway Co., 36 W. R. 506, 20 Q. B. D. 410, to hold that we sitting in this court are not in any way fettered by section 20 of the Coroners' Act. That only binds courts of assize and so on, but although we have abundant power to quash, we might refuse to exercise it unless we saw there was some substance in the case. Here unquestionably, as regards two of the defendants, there is a most serious defect in the charge against them. I do not think it can be contended for a moment that members of a district council or other body of that kind are liable to a charge of manslaughter simply because they have omitted to exercise powers vested in them to cause other people to fence places. If we thought there was no substance in the objection we should probably have left the matter to be dealt with by the judge at the assizes, who could have satisfied justice. But seeing that the case as against two of the defendants is one of such a character that it would be a gross injustice to make them appear at the assizes and stand their trial upon the coroner's inquisition, I think we ought to interfere and quash this inquisition upon the grounds that I have stated. The reasons I have stated apply equally to the defendant Tree as regards the power to quash, but, of course, his case may appear a different one in substance; I do not say it is. He is said to be chairman of the Quarry Co. It may be there is a case against him. Mr. Danckwerts says there is none. We cannot say there is none, and therefore nothing we say ought to prejudice the right of the Public Prosecutor, if he thinks fit to carry the case further against that defendant. I do not think either of us wish to say for a moment that there is or is not any case against him, but merely that he seems to stand on a different footing to the others. It follows that the recognizances must be quashed without reference to what the form of them is. I should not like to say anything about the form of the recognizance without considering it further, but it seems to be quite unusual to bind over the witnesses to prefer a bill of indictment. I do not remember seeing that in recognizances before. My recollection is that where there is a private prosecutor, then his recognizance is to prefer a bill of indictment, but I am rather inclined to think that the coroner, or whoever drew up these recognizances, has mixed up the two things together, the prosecutor's recognizance and the witnesses' recognizance.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is quite true that the inquisition contains words which, if they stood alone, would have been a good inquisition, but these words, I think, cannot be separated from the introductory part of the inquisition or from the statement which is coupled with the important words by the word "therefore." The inquisition undertakes or professes to show the particulars under which the duty arose, and it says that because that duty was not performed, therefore there was a felonious act, but the inquisition altogether neglects to set out in the early part of it any facts which impose a duty. The inquisition is as if it stood thus: "The deceased fell into a quarry and was found dead, and therefore the persons named in the inquisition did feloniously kill and slay the deceased." Where the inquisition does condescend to particulars, and when those particulars are insufficient to set out any legal duty or culpable negligence, it must be quashed as bad on the face of it.

With reference to the case against the owner of the quarry, I do not know that I need add anything to what has been said by my learned brother. I may say I understand it to be a general rule of law that a person is not to be held criminally responsible for the neglect of a subordinate, and if he could establish that although there was neglect to fence the quarry, it was not his neglect, but the neglect of a subordinate person, he has power to do so. Practice—Discovery of documents—Action for fraudulent conspiracy—Ord. 31, r. 12.

An order for discovery of documents may be made against a defendant in an action for fraudulent conspiracy. The objection that the production of any document would tend to criminate the defendant can be made by him in his affidavit in answer.

Allhusen v. Labouchere, 27 W. R. 12, 3 Q. B. D. 654, approved.

Appeal from an order of Grantham, J., at chambers.

The plaintiff, who was a shareholder in the Grosvenor and West-end Railway Terminus Hotel Co., brought the action on behalf of himself and other the shareholders in the company to recover damages.

The defendants were the company, the directors of the company, and certain tradesmen who had supplied the company with goods.

The plaintiff alleged that the defendants other than the company had conspired together to cheat and defraud the company, whereby the company had been damnified.

The plaintiff applied under ord. 31, r. 12, for an order directing Drew, one of the defendants, to make an affidavit of discovery of documents.

The defendant Drew opposed the application on the ground that such an order could not properly be made against a person who was charged with acts which might amount to a criminal offence. Grantham, J., made an order for discovery.

Drew appealed.

Pollard, for the defendant Drew.—The only cause of action in this case is conspiracy; therefore any document relating to the matter in question may tend to criminate the defendant, and he is entitled to take the objection at this stage of the proceedings. In Allhusen v. Labouchere, 27 W. R. 12, 3 Q. B. D. 654, which was a case of interrogatories, it was, no doubt, held that, where a party objected to answer an interrogatory on the ground that it might tend to criminate him, he ought to take the objection in his affidavit in answer, and was not entitled to have the interrogatory struck out as objectionable. But there is a distinction between interrogatories and discovery of documents. Where it is obvious that discovery of documents is only sought for the purpose of supporting an issue which may render the party liable to punishment, no order ought to be made: Redfern v. Redfern, 39 W. R. 212, [1891] P. 139; see also Ex parte Reynolds, 30 W. R. 651, 20 Ch. D. 294.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

J. Eldon Bankes, for the plaintiff.—According to the decision in Allhusen v. Labouchere and the general practice, the principle is that, where a person objects that answering a question or making discovery of documents may tend to criminate him, such objection ought to be taken on oath. The objection which the defendant here seeks to raise is really an objection to the production of documents. He ought to make an affidavit, and in his affidavit he can claim that he is not bound to produce any particular documents: see Seaward v. Dennington, 44 W. R. 696, and Webb v. East, 28 W. R. 336, 5 Ex. D. 108.

Pollard, in reply, cited East India Co. v. Campbel, 1 Ves. sen. 246; Cartwright v. Green, 8 Ves. 405; and Paxton v. Douglas, 19 Ves. 225.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is an action against several defendants for conspiracy to defraud. The plaintiff has taken out a summons asking for an order directing one of the defendants to make an affidavit of discovery of documents. An order made on such a summons is practically a question which has to be answered on oath—Have you any documents relating to the issue in the cause? If you have, give a list of them. The defendant contends that the court ought not to allow the question to be put. The plaintiff does not deny that the defendant may refuse to answer the question if he says on oath that an answer might tend to criminate him, but the plaintiff insists that he ought to be allowed to put the question. I think that in this matter we are bound by the authority of Allhusen v. Labouchere. It is said that that only decided the case of interrogatories specially so called. But in my opinion the decision is equally applicable to the case where a question is put in the shape of an order for discovery of documents. The decision is this, that, where the person to whom a question is put believes that an answer might tend to criminate him, he cannot object to the putting of the question, and his right of objection only arises when he takes the point by saying in his affidavit in answer—I decline to answer, on the ground that my answer might tend to criminate me.

It is argued that this decision has been overruled in Redfern v. Redfern. But in my opinion the Court of Appeal cannot have intended in that case to overrule Allhusen v. Labouchere, which was not even cited in argument. I think that Redfern v. Redfern was decided on certain peculiarities of divorce law, and must not be taken as a decision on the general law. Allhusen v. Labouchere is therefore still a binding authority, and the objection which the defendant seeks to raise cannot be taken at this stage. The appeal must be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an action for defrauding a company. The defendant Drew says that an order for discovery of documents ought not to be made against him, because he is not bound to criminate himself. In my opinion discovery of documents and discovery by way of answers to interrogatories on facts stand on the same basis; and whichever kind of discovery it may be, the only method of objection open to a person in the position of Drew is to answer on oath that discovery may tend to criminate him. There are four cases on the subject: Fisher v. Owen, 26 W. R. 581, 8 Ch. D. 645; Allhusen v. Labouchere, Webb v. East, and Seaward v. Dennington, two of them dealing with documents and two with interrogatories. They all show that the proper time for taking the objection is when the party comes to make oath. No case throws doubt on the rule except Redfern v. Redfern. There the decision was that discovery ought not to be required from a party to divorce proceedings, when it was sought for no other purpose than to prove such party guilty of adultery. But the question whether the respondent had been guilty of adultery was one which, by the Divorce Acts, could not be put to her even when she was in the witness box. The Court of Appeal did not in that case overrule any of the other cases.

CHITTY, L.J., concurred.

SPOKES v. GROSVENOR AND WEST-END RAILWAY TERMINUS HOTEL CO. (No. 2). (a)

Practice—Discovery of documents—Action by shareholder to recover damages for company—Company joined as defendant—Right of plaintiff to discovery from company—"Other party"—Ord. 31, r. 12.

Where a shareholder in a company brings an action on behalf of himself and the other shareholders to recover damages for the company, and the company is joined as a defendant to the action, an order may be made against the company at the instance of the plaintiff for discovery of documents, though no relief is sought against the company.

Appeal from an order of Day, J., at chambers.

The plaintiff, who was a shareholder in the Grosvenor and West-end Railway Terminus Hotel Co., brought the action on behalf of himself and other the shareholders in the company to recover damages.

The defendants were the company, the directors of the company, and certain tradesmen who had supplied the company with goods.

The plaintiff alleged that the defendants other than the company had conspired together to cheat and defraud the company, whereby the company had been damnified.

The plaintiff applied under ord. 31, r. 12, for an order directing the defendant company to make an affidavit of discovery of documents.

The defendant company opposed the application on the ground that, as no issue was raised in the action between the plaintiff and the company, such an order could not properly be made against them.

Day, J., made an order for discovery.

The defendant company appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 27.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment: This is an appeal against an order of Day, J., ordering the Grosvenor and West-end Railway Terminus Hotel Co. to make an affidavit stating what documents are or have been in its possession or power relating to the matter in question in the action. The question is whether the learned judge had jurisdiction to make the order, for, if he had, I do not doubt upon the facts before us that his discretion was well exercised. The action is brought by a shareholder on behalf of himself and other the shareholders in the hotel company against its directors and certain tradesmen of the company to recover for the company the damages it is said to have sustained by reason of its directors and the tradesmen having, as it is alleged, conspired together to cheat and defraud the company, whereby the company has been damnified. The proper plaintiffs in such an action would obviously be the company, but in the circumstances existing this is not possible, for the impeached directors who have the controlling power in the company do not assent to the company being made plaintiff, and without that assent the company cannot be made plaintiff. To obviate this difficulty it has for many years been the practice of the Court of Chancery in circumstances such as the present to make the company a party to the action as defendant, in which action the plaintiff shareholder asks for an order not that the damages recovered should be paid to him, but to the defendant company, and in this way the otherwise insuperable difficulty of maintaining the action is got over.

This is what has been done in the present case, and the order for discovery at the instance of the plaintiff shareholder against the company as being party to the action has been made by Day, J. That, in the circumstances of this case, the company is a necessary party to the suit I do not doubt, for without the company being made a party to the action it could not proceed. The point is now taken, not by the company, but in truth and in fact by the impeached directors, that as no relief is asked against the company it cannot be put under discovery, and some cases have been cited in support of this proposition which show that a person who is a mere witness cannot be made a party to the suit in order to obtain discovery from him. But this is not what has been done in the present case. The order under which Day, J., has acted is ord. 31, r. 12, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, which is as follows: "Any party may . . . apply to the court or a judge for an order directing any other party to any cause or matter to make discovery on oath of the documents in his possession or power." Why is not the company an "other party" within this rule? The company is defendant in the action in order that the action may be maintained, and to my mind is clearly a necessary party, which a mere witness certainly is not.

It is said that this court, in Shaw v. Smith, 35 W. R. 188, 18 Q. B. D. 193, has held that the company, in a case like the present, is not within the order, for to constitute an "other party" within the meaning of the order there must be "some right to be adjusted in the action between the company and the plaintiff" (per Lord Esher), or "some community of interest" (per Lindley, L.J.), or "some question in conflict in the action" (per Lopes, L.J.). These judgments were given in a case, not where discovery was sought between a plaintiff and a necessary defendant, but in a case where a question of discovery arose between two defendants in an action, which was a wholly different matter. No case has been cited in which ord. 31, r. 12, has been construed as above between a plaintiff and a defendant who is a necessary party to an action, and I think that the rule, upon its true construction, in a case like the present gives the jurisdiction to order discovery of documents, and that the order of Day, J., must therefore be upheld.

CHITTY, L.J., read the following judgment: This is an appeal by the defendant hotel company, or in their name, from an order made by the judge in chambers on the application of the plaintiff, whereby the appellants were ordered to make the usual affidavit of documents relating to the matters in question in the action. The action is brought by a shareholder on behalf of himself and other the shareholders in the company. It is founded on an alleged wrong done to the company. For such a wrong the company alone can sue at law, and the general rule is the same in equity. (See MacDougall v. Gardiner, 24 W. R. 118, 1 Ch. D. 13.) But equity has admitted certain exceptions to this general rule, one of which is that where a fraud is committed by persons commanding a majority of votes, the minority can sue by a shareholder. The principle of the exceptions is well illustrated by such cases as Atwool v. Merryweather, L. R. 5 Eq. 464n, decided by Wood, V.C., in 1867; Menier v. Hooper's Telegraph Works, 22 W. R. 396, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 350, decided by James and Mellish, L.JJ.; and Mason v. Harris, 27 W. R. 699, 11 Ch. D. 97, decided by the Court of Appeal. As was said by Sir George Jessel in Mason v. Harris, the reason for the exception is plain; unless it were allowed, it would be in the power of the majority to defraud the minority with impunity. On the allegations made in the statement of claim this case falls within Mason v. Harris. The substance of the case set up is a conspiracy on the part of the directors of the company and the manager and certain tradesmen to defraud the company by commissions, excessive charges for goods supplied, charges for goods not supplied, and other means; that the company have in fact been thereby defrauded; and that the persons implicated in the fraud have obtained the control of the company and a majority of votes, rendering it impossible to bring the action in the name of the company. The directors and others charged with the fraud are defendants. To such an action as this the company is a necessary defendant. The reason is obvious; the wrong alleged is done to the company, and the company must be a party to the suit in order to be bound by the result of the action and to receive the money recovered in the action. If the company were not bound, it could bring a fresh action for the same cause if the action failed and there was subsequently a change in the board of directors and the voting power. Obviously, in such an action as this is no specific relief is asked against the company; and obviously, too, what is recovered cannot be paid to the plaintiff representing the minority, but must go into the coffers of the company.

It was argued for the appellants that the company was made party for the purpose of discovery only, and authorities were cited to show that, where no relief is asked against a party, he cannot or ought not to be compelled to make discovery. But this argument and these authorities have no bearing on the present case, where, as already shown, the action cannot proceed in the absence of the defendant company, and the company is interested in and will be bound by the result. The order complained of was made under rule 12 of order 31. That rule speaks of "other party"; an order for discovery may be made against "any other party to any cause." It was argued for the appellants that the company was not any other party within the meaning of the rule, and the decision of this court in Shaw v. Smith was relied upon in support of the argument. But that case is clearly distinguishable. The question there was between co-defendants, and not, as here, between the plaintiff and a defendant. What the court was there considering was whether the term "any other party" meant "opposite party," the expression used in rule 1 of the same order, and whether it ought to be cut down so as to apply only to a party on the other side of the record. The court held that it ought not.

I am of opinion that this case falls within the express provisions of the rule in question, and that there was jurisdiction to make the order.

FRANKENSTEIN v. GAVIN AND OTHERS. (a.)

Practice—Discovery—Documents—Affidavit of documents—Objection to produce—Conclusiveness of affidavit.

In an action against directors for an alleged fraudulent misrepresentation in the prospectus of a company to the effect that more than 12,000 cyclists in London alone had enrolled themselves as annual subscribers to the company, the defendants made an affidavit of documents in which they said that they had in their possession 12,500 applications by persons wishing to be enrolled as annual subscribers to the company, but they objected to produce these documents on the ground that they formed part of the evidence supporting the defendants' case, and did not support or tend to support the plaintiff's case, and contained nothing impeaching the defendants' case.

Held, that, there being nothing to show that the affidavit erroneously represented or misconceived the nature of the documents, they were protected from production.

Appeal from Day, J., at chambers.

The action was brought against the directors of a company and the company for the return of the deposit paid by the plaintiff upon an application for certain shares in the company, the plaintiff alleging that he was induced to apply for the shares by, amongst others, a false and fraudulent representation in the prospectus issued by the directors that in London alone more than 12,000 cyclists had enrolled themselves as annual subscribers at £1 6s. per annum. The plaintiff also claimed rescission of the contract to take the shares and damages.

The defendants in their affidavit of documents stated that they had in their possession, amongst others, the following documents: "12,500 applications by persons wishing to be enrolled as annual subscribers to the company," but they objected to produce them "on the ground that they form part of the evidence supporting the defendants' case, and do not support or tend to support the plaintiff's case, and contain nothing impeaching the case of the defendants."

Day, J., reversing the order of the Master, refused to order inspection of the above documents.

The plaintiff appealed.

C. Gregson Ellis, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff ought to have inspection of these documents. They are the subject-matter of the action, and are the very documents about which the dispute in the action has arisen. The plaintiff alleges that they are not bonâ fide applications by persons to be enrolled as subscribers. They may be mere inquiries as to the terms of membership. The defendants have not stated that they intend to put them in evidence at the trial. He referred to Combe v. Corporation of London, 1 Y. & C. Ch. Cas. 631; Attorney-General v. Emerson, 31 W. R. 191, 10 Q. B. D. 191.

E. U. Bullen, for the defendant, was not called upon.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is an action in which the plaintiff charges the defendants, the directors of the company, with false and fraudulent misrepresentations. He alleges as one of the fraudulent misrepresentations a statement in the prospectus of the company that 12,000 annual subscribers had enrolled themselves in London alone. The defendants in their affidavit of documents state that they have in their possession applications from 12,500 persons wishing to be enrolled as subscribers, but they object to produce them upon the ground, in substance, that they relate to the defendants' case and not to the plaintiff's case, and contain nothing impeaching the defendants' case. What is the law applicable to that state of things? In Attorney-General v. Emerson this court, after citing the rule laid down by Knight-Bruce, L.J., in Combe v. Corporation of London, said that the documents were protected from production unless the court was reasonably satisfied, or reasonably certain, that the defendant had erroneously represented or had misconceived the nature of the documents as to which he was swearing. That reduces the question to this, whether we are reasonably satisfied that the defendants' grounds for objecting to produce the document are not correct. I see no reason to doubt that the documents cannot support the plaintiff's case, and can only support the defendants' case, and do not contain anything impeaching the defence. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

Will—Administrator pendente lite—Appointment by Probate Division—Suing administrator pendente lite in Chancery Division—Motion to stay action—Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), ss. 70, 71.

An administrator pendente lite of the personal estate of a deceased appointed by the Probate Division may be sued by creditors of the estate in the Chancery Division without leave.

Motion.

The defendant had been appointed by the Probate Division administrator pendente lite of the personal estate and receiver of the real estate in an action contesting the validity of the will of James Toleman. After such appointment the plaintiff, suing on behalf of himself and all other creditors, brought the present action by originating summons in the Chancery Division against the defendant as administrator of the estate of James Toleman for (1) an account of certain dealings between Toleman and the plaintiff with reference to certain building and financing operations; (2) as far as necessary administration of the estate and payment of what might be due to the plaintiff; (3) the appointment of a receiver; (4) an account of what was due to the estate of Toleman in respect of a mortgage from the plaintiff to Toleman, and that the mortgage might be redeemed, the plaintiff being willing and offering to redeem the same; (5) sale of the property comprised in the mortgage.

(a.) Reported by R. SILLEM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant had applied by motion in the Probate Division to restrain the present action, and on the motion, that court made an order giving leave to the defendant to defend the present action, and to apply for a stay therein, or to take such other steps as he might be advised; and under the present circumstances the court, without deciding whether or not leave was required, refused to give leave to the plaintiff to commence or continue proceedings in the Chancery Division against the administrator pendente lite and receiver, and refused also to restrain the plaintiff from suing the administrator pendente lite and receiver in the action In re Toleman, Westwood v. Booker; and the court gave leave to the administrator pendente lite to appeal from such refusal.

The present motion was by the defendant that all proceedings in the chancery action might be stayed, on the ground (1) that the action had been brought against the defendant solely in his capacity as administrator pendente lite appointed by the Probate Division in the exercise of its probate jurisdiction, and pending proof the will of James Toleman, and after notice to the plaintiff of the defendant's position, and without leave and in contempt of the Probate Division; (2) that in any case this action was frivolous and vexatious as against the defendant, who had no interest in the estate of James Toleman, and no rights in relation thereto except as such officer aforesaid.

The motion also asked for costs as between solicitor and client.

Ashton Cross and Priestley, for the motion.—The defendant as administrator is an officer of the Probate Division, and it is a contempt to sue him without leave (see section 70, Probate Act, 1857). An action cannot be maintained against an administrator ad litem to establish the title of the plaintiff as sole next-of-kin of an intestate (Dowdeswell v. Dowdeswell, 27 W. R. 241, 9 Ch. D. 294). Ellice v. Goodson, 2 Coll., at p. 9, gives the form appointing an administrator for the purposes of a suit in Chancery, and it is different from the form of appointment in the Probate Division. In Searle v. Choat, 32 W. R. 397, 25 Ch. D. 723, it was held that a receiver appointed by the court cannot be sued without the leave of the court. Moreover, the administrator is to act under the direction of the Probate Division, and cannot be called upon to account to a creditor in another court. [NORTH, J., cited Tichborne v. Tichborne, 17 W. R. 832, L. R. 1 P. & D. 730.]

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and J. M. Stone, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

NORTH, J., after stating the facts and referring to sections 70 and 71 of the Probate Act, 1857, said: In the Chancery Division a receiver may be appointed of the real or personal estate, but in the Probate Division under the Probate Act a receiver cannot be appointed of the personal estate, but an administrator is appointed, which is a much wider appointment. But as there is now a dispute pending as to the validity of the will of the testator the administrator is only appointed pendente lite. The idea that after that litigation is ended a creditor against the estate who had commenced an action against the administrator pendente lite would have to start de novo against the person found to be executor or against a general administrator seems to me to be wrong. If the proceedings are commenced against the administrator pendente lite they will be continued against the executor or against the full administrator when he is appointed. The administrator pendente lite has all the powers of a full administrator except the power to distribute the residue of the personal estate. Such an administrator stands no doubt in a peculiar position, and he can apply to the court for directions and can act under its direction; but to say that he is not in the position of a general administrator is to go beyond what the Act says. I think he can be sued. It would be monstrous if he could not, because while the parties are fighting as to who shall have control of the estate the Statute of Limitations might be running and the creditors would be left out in the cold.

In Tichborne v. Tichborne such an administrator was sued in the Court of Chancery, and a decree for administration was made. I am not prepared to say that on the hearing of the originating summons I should give the plaintiff the relief for which he asks. It might be that the court might give the relief, but on the other hand the court might think it better to order the summons to stand over until a full administrator had been appointed. That is a matter of discretion to be dealt with as it arises, but I see no reason why proceedings on this summons should now be stayed.

Motion refused with costs.

SPILLER v. TURNER. (a.)

Company—English company trading in colony—Preference and ordinary stockholders—Dividend duty imposed by Colonial Legislature—Incidence of duty.

An English company originally formed in 1841 by a contract of copartnership, and afterwards incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Act, 1856, carried on business in a colony; and, under the powers conferred on it by its original contract of copartnership, created, guaranteed 5 and 6 per cent. preference stock entitled to cumulative payment of interest in priority to its ordinary stock.

The Colonial Legislature imposed a "dividend duty" on the dividends and interest paid on the capital of the company employed in the colony.

Held, that the contract between the various classes of shareholders was an English contract, and therefore that an Act passed by the Colonial Legislature would not affect the rights of the preference stockholders not domiciled in the colony, and that, consequently, the preference stockholders were entitled to receive their interest in full, and that the duty thereon must be paid out of the general assets of the company.

This was a special case stated in pursuance of R.S.C., ord. 34, to obtain the decision of the court as to the manner in which (1) the dividend duty payable to the Government of the Colony of Queensland under the Dividend Duty Act of 1890 of the Legislature of that colony, and (2) the income tax payable to the Government of the Colony of New South Wales under the Land and Income Tax Assessment Act of 1895 and the Income Tax Act of 1895 of the Legislature of that colony—so far as such dividend duty and income tax respectively were imposed upon or payable in respect of the interest payable to the holders of the guaranteed preference stocks, both 6 per cent. and 5 per cent., of the Scottish Australian Investment Co. (Limited) ought, between the different classes of holders of stock (ordinary and preference) of the defendant company, to be borne and paid.

(a.) Reported by C. C. HENSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action was brought by the plaintiff Spiller on behalf of himself and all other holders of consolidated ordinary stock of the company against the defendant Turner, who was by order authorized to defend on behalf of himself and all other holders of the guaranteed preference stocks, both 6 and 5 per cent., and the company.

The defendant company was originally formed by contract of a copartnership in 1841, and was on the 27th of October, 1856, duly registered under the provisions of the Joint-Stock Companies Act of 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 47), and therefore, by virtue of sections 177 and 196 of the Companies Act of 1862, became governed by the provisions of the Act of 1862, save as otherwise provided by section 196 of that Act.

The provisions of the contract of copartnership so far as were material to the present case were shortly as follows: By article 1 it was provided that the object and business of the company should be the acquisition of and trading in land and real or personal property, as therein provided, in Australia and other British Colonies. By article 2 it was provided that (inter alia) the capital could be increased by the issue of new shares either upon the same footing as, or with any special or other preference or priority over, the original shares as therein provided. And it was declared that the company should be deemed to be established in England, and that the principal office or place of business should be in the City of London, and that the directors might appoint branch offices in Australia and certain other colonies as they might think fit.

By article 6 it was provided (inter alia) that the directors should possess all usual powers, including powers for appointing agencies in the Australian colonies.

By article 16 provision was made for the determination by the directors, after striking the half-yearly balance, whether any or what half-yearly dividend should be paid, and what sum should be set aside for forming a reserve fund.

By article 22 it was provided that any clauses and conditions of the contract might be rescinded, varied, or added to by such a majority of the stockholders as therein mentioned.

The capital of the company, which originally consisted of £100,000 in shares of £1 each, and which was subsequently converted into "stock," was from time to time increased, and on the 28th of April, 1865, as set forth in paragraph 7 of the special case, in pursuance of a resolution passed by the company, £200,000 6 per cent. guaranteed preference stock was created and issued on the following conditions: that such stock should "bear and be entitled to in perpetuity a guaranteed interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, and" should "have priority in all respects, and as well in respect of principal as interest and arrears of interest (if any) of all stock of the company, and should be transmissible and transferable in the same manner and according to the same regulations and provisions as the other stock of the company, but so that the holders of such stock" should "not in respect thereof be entitled to vote or be qualified to be elected as directors of the company," and certificates for the same under seal of the company were duly issued. In a similar manner, in June, 1879, a sum of £200,000 "5 per cent. guaranteed preference stock" was created, holders of which it was provided, subject only to the 6 per cent. preference stock, should be entitled to receive in perpetuity interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum out of the profits of the company accrued and undivided from time to time when such interest became due, and also to receive any arrears of interest out of profits accrued and undivided subsequent to the date when such arrears became due in preference and priority to any payment out of such profits to the holders of the ordinary stock of the company, and also in the event of the dissolution of the company to receive payment of their principal and all interest and arrears thereof (if any) then due out of the assets of the company in preference and priority to any distribution of such assets among the holders of the ordinary stock of the company, but the holders of such 5 per cent. guaranteed preference stock should not in respect thereof be entitled to attend or vote at any meeting of the company or be qualified to act as directors of the company or to any other privilege or benefit as stockholders of the company other than such as was expressly given by the resolution. And it was provided that the resolutions with respect to such newly-created stocks should form part of the company's regulations or contract of co-partnership, and that such regulations or contract should be read subject thereto, and should be, and thereby were, altered accordingly.

By resolutions of the company in May and June, 1884, a further sum of £200,000 5 per cent. guaranteed preference stock was created and issued on the same footing and conditions as the last issue, and certificates for this and the preceding issue were, under seal of the company, duly issued to all the 5 per cent. preference stockholders, containing a statement of the conditions under which the stock was issued. In 1892 the contract of copartnership was, in exercise of the power therein given, altered so as to increase the company's capital which, at the time this action was brought, amounted to £1,500,000, of which had been issued £200,000 6 per cent. preference stock, £400,000 5 per cent. preference stock, and £500,000 ordinary stock.

The company was never registered or incorporated in or under the laws of any colony in Australia. The head office had always been in London, but the company since its formation had always, and still, carried on its authorized business in the colonies of Queensland and New South Wales and other colonies of Australia, and had thereby made profits.

On the 6th of November, 1890, the Queensland Legislature passed an Act intituled "an Act to impose duties in respect of dividends," by which it was enacted (inter alia), section 2: "In this Act 'company' includes every incorporated company or association wheresoever and howsoever incorporated, associated, or formed, and whether under the laws of Queensland or under the laws of any country, and whether under a statute, letters patent, charter, or otherwise, which carries on business in Queensland." (The section also defined "manager" as "the person whose name is notified to the colonial treasurer as the manager of the company under the provisions of the Act.")

Dividend was defined as meaning "every sum of money intended to be paid or credited to or distributed among any members or in any company except in a winding-up or on a reduction of capital, and whether it is called by the name of dividend, bonus, profit, interest, or any other name.

Section 3 provided that "every company carrying on business in Queensland which has not its head office or chief place of business in Queensland is to have a manager residing in the colony and a principal office at which any writ, notice, or other instrument affecting the company may be delivered."

Section 8 provided that "companies which have not their head office or chief place of business in Queensland shall, on or before the 1st of April in each year, by a statutory declaration by their manager, forward to the colonial treasurer particulars of (inter alia) the amount of all dividends declared by the company during that year, and the dates when they were respectively declared, and shall at the same time pay to the colonial treasurer a duty equal to the sum of 1s. for every 20s., and a proportionate sum for every part of 20s., or of so much of the total dividends declared by the company during the year as is proportionate to the average amount of the capital of the company employed in Queensland during the year as compared with the total average capital of the company during the year."

A "manager" for the purposes of this Act was appointed by the company, and he, in accordance with the provisions of the Act, in 1891, 1892, 1893, 1894, and 1895 duly made a return to the colonial treasurer of the average amount of the assets of the company in Queensland during that year, and the amount of all dividends declared by the company on its ordinary stock, and at the same time paid to the colonial treasurer a duty equal to 1s. on every 20s. of so much of the total dividends declared by the company on its ordinary stock as was proportionate to the amount of capital employed by the company in Queensland as compared with its total capital, but no return was made or duty paid in respect of interest paid to preference stockholders.

In an action brought in 1895 by the Attorney-General of Queensland the Supreme Court of Queensland delivered judgment in April, 1896, by which the court found that dividend duty on the interest on the preference stock was payable since 1890, and a sum of upwards of £3,500 was paid by the company as such duty due from 1890 to 1895.

From 1896 the company duly paid Queensland dividend duty upon the interest payable to preference stockholders as well as on dividends paid on ordinary shares.

Down to the 1st of January, 1896, the defendant company has paid to the holders of the said 6 per cent. guaranteed preference stocks, and to the holders of the said 5 per cent. guaranteed preference stock, the full amount of the interest payable in respect of such stocks respectively with a deduction only of the income tax payable under the Income Tax Acts of the United Kingdom, and without any deduction in respect of the said Queensland dividend duty. Since the said 1st of January 1896 the defendant company had not paid the interest on the said preference stocks in full, but had deducted therefrom the amount of the dividend duty paid under the Act of 1890 to the Government of Queensland in respect of such interest, and had placed the amount so deducted to the credit of a suspense account to abide the decision of the court upon the questions raised in this action.

The questions submitted for the opinion of the court were:

1. Whether the defendant company is entitled to deduct from the interest payable to the holders of the guaranteed preference stocks, both 6 per cent. and 5 per cent., of the defendant company not only the income tax payable under the Income Tax Acts of the Imperial Parliament of the United Kingdom for the time in force, but also (1) the dividend duty payable in respect of such interest or of part of such interest to the Government of the Colony of Queensland under the Queensland Act mentioned in paragraph 14?

2. In what manner as between the different classes of holders of stocks ordinary and preference of the defendant company the dividend duty ought to be borne and paid?

3. Whether the defendant company is entitled to deduct from the interest which will in the future become payable to the holders of the guaranteed preference stocks, both 6 per cent. and 5 per cent., of the defendant company the arrears of the dividend duty paid by the defendant company to the Government of Queensland in respect of interest paid to the holders of guaranteed preference stocks as mentioned in paragraph 22, or whether such arrears ought to be charged to the reserve fund or to future revenue of the company?

4. In what manner as between the different classes of the holders of stocks both preference and ordinary of the defendant company, the arrears of the dividend duty paid by the defendant company as mentioned in paragraph 22 ought to be borne and paid?

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Upjohn, for the plaintiff.—The preference stockholders are co-partners with the ordinary stockholders in a business intended mainly to be carried on in Australia, consequently they intended to be and are bound by Australian enactments. There are considerable assets in Australia. The "interest" payable to the preference stockholders is really "dividends," and as such should bear a proportionate share of the payment of dividend duty, which should not be thrown entirely on the ordinary shareholders.

Renshaw, Q.C., and McSwinney, for the preference stockholders.—This is a question of construction of the contract of partnership, and the rule of construction is the contract itself read by the light of surrounding circumstances: Stevens v. South Devon Railway Co., 9 Hare 313; Henry v. Great Northern Railway Co., 6 W. R. 87, 1 De G. & J. 606; Sturge v. Eastern Union Railway Co., 7 De G. M. & G. 158, 3 W. R. Ch. Dig. 33; Matthews v. Great Northern Railway Co., 7 W. R. 233; Jacobs v. Credit Lyonnais (London Agency), 32 W. R. 761; 12 Q. B. D. 589. The rights of the parties to an English contract cannot be varied by Colonial legislation. Again, would it be a good defence to an action on the contract to plead the payment of the Colonial tax as a discharge? Smith v. Buchanan, 1 East 6, "It is impossible to say that an Act made in one country can be ruled by the law of another," &c. (Lawrance, J.). The plea there, was discharge of the whole, here it is of discharge pro tanto. Bartley v. Hodges, 9 W. R. 693, 1 B. & S. 375 (Whitman and Blackburn, JJ.); this was a colonial case, and Whitman, J., said that a foreign country was on the same footing as a colony—e.g., Maryland is on the same footing as Victoria: A. Gibbs & Sons v. Société des Métaux, 25 Q. B. D. 399, 39 W. R. Dig. 57.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., in reply.—According to the judgment of Bowen, L.J., in Jacobs v. The Credit Lyonnais (London Agency), it is a question of intention as to being subject to the laws of a foreign country. In this case the money is paid here, but the operations are carried on in Queensland, though the partners and the capital are English, the profit is made in Queensland. There is in the contract evidence of intention to be bound by the laws of Queensland, so the cases cited against us do not apply: Sirdar Gurdyal Singh v. Rajah of Faridkote, [1894] App. Cas. 670; Bank of Australasia v. Nias, 16 Q. B. 717.

KEKEWICH, J.—The plaintiff's case rests on an argument of this character. He says that the class which he represents, the ordinary stockholders, and the class represented by the defendant Turner—that is to say, the 6 per cent. and 5 per cent. guaranteed preference stockholders, whatever their rights may be—are copartners in a concern, one of the essential conditions of which is that the business shall be carried on in the colony of Queensland, and that, therefore, they both recognize the colony of Queensland as having some legislative powers over them, and that no one of them can complain as against the other that those legislative powers have been exercised in such a way as to be to the detriment of one or the other; that they are both bound by the legislative provisions of the colony, and must submit to them whatever may be the consequences. That argument seems to me to rest on a fallacy.

The contract which I have to consider is not the contract of copartnery in that sense—namely, the contract that the business shall be of a certain character, and shall be carried on by certain persons under certain conditions in certain places including the colony of Queensland. What I have to consider is the contract constituted by the resolutions of the company, a contract inter se of the ordinary shareholders on the one hand and the guaranteed preference stockholders on the other. That contract is set out as regards one class (and I need not quote it as regards the other class) of guaranteed stockholders in the resolution of the 28th of April, 1865. What the contract is I will consider immediately. But it seems to me that establishes the right of the two classes of shareholders inter se, and that it is quite immaterial, for the purpose of considering that, to consider the rights of the shareholders as a body against the company or the powers of the company to carry on business or to submit itself to the law of any colony. I have to construe this contract—that is to say, I have to ascertain what are the obligations and privileges of the parties to this contract. I must look at it according to the rules applicable to such a case as this, from two points of view. First, where was this contract entered into? In England. It is an English company, and this is an English contract. The locus contractus is in England. Therefore, if there is nothing more to vary that conclusion the rights of the parties must be considered by English law.

But it is said that I ought to regard the place of fulfilment, that I ought to ascertain what is the locus solutionis, and consider whether the lex of that locus ought not to be applied. There, again, there can be no doubt that the locus solutionis is England. The company have their domicil here, the money is to be paid here, it is here where the stockholder would sue for his interest or dividend or whatever it may be properly called, here he would enforce his rights either against the company or against his brother stockholders, and here he would get a part of that enforcement. It follows therefore that, from whichever point of view I look at it, it is an English contract to be construed in accordance with English law. What avails it then that a Colonial Legislature has said that that contract between the stockholders shall not be performed, but that the preference stockholders shall receive, instead of the six per cent. stipulated for in the contract, some lesser sum—e.g., six per cent. with a deduction on account of dividend duty? The preference stockholder may insist upon his rights under the English contract, and can snap his fingers at the Colonial Legislature; subject, of course, to this, that the company, being bound by the enactments of the Colonial Legislature, the preference stockholder may not obtain payment as soon as he otherwise would. That seems to me to be the effect of the cases cited, to which I will not further refer.

That being so, it is immaterial to consider whether the percentage payable to preference stockholders is interest or dividend. For purposes of taxation by the Colonial Legislature it is certainly dividend, and they may treat it as they please. As at present advised I think that here it is not dividend, but interest as distinguished from dividend; but it seems to me immaterial, for whether it be called by the one name or the other, if once it is decided what the rights of the contracting parties are, the phraseology in which those rights are expressed is of no importance. It appears to me that the guaranteed preference stockholders, as they are called, having stipulated to have 6 per cent., with certain priorities and rights, paid to them, are entitled now to enforce that contract, and say that the 6 per cent. shall be paid, and it is no answer to them to say that the Legislature of Queensland has taxed the company and made them pay a certain sum, which has to be calculated with reference to the 6 per cent. The amount, no doubt, has to be calculated on that basis; but, nevertheless, it is not to be deducted from the 6 per cent., notwithstanding that the Colonial Legislature has enacted that it is to be deducted, because those legislative provisions are of no avail against the provisions of the contract in this country. The question submitted in the special case, whether the defendent company is or is not entitled to make any deduction in respect of the colonial tax, must be answered in the negative; but in view of the suggestion that stockholders domiciled in Queensland may be bound by the Colonial Act, and therefore not be in the same contractual position as other stockholders, I think the judgment ought to be expressed to be without prejudice to any question affecting stockholders who may be domiciled in Queensland.

Summons.

By an indenture of ante-nuptial settlement, dated the 30th of June, 1836, and made between the Marquis of Bristol of the first part, Lady Georgiana E. C. Grey (then Hervey) of the second part, the Hon. and Rev. John Grey of the third part, and trustees of the fourth part, the Marquis, who was the father of Lady Georgiana E. C. Grey, the intended wife, settled a sum of £13,000 £3 per Cent. Bank Annuities as her portion, and the said John Grey, who was the intended husband, settled a life policy for £5,000. The trusts of the settled property after the marriage were as follows: As to the £13,000 Bank Annuities (hereinafter called the £13,000 fund), to pay out of the annual produce £100 a year pin money and the premiums on the £5,000 policy, and, subject to the above payments, to pay the income to the husband for life, then to the wife for life, and, subject thereto, the corpus to go to such children of the marriage as the husband and wife by deed, or the survivor by deed or will should appoint, and in default of appointment or in case of an incomplete appointment to the children of the marriage equally, but no child taking under any appointment to be made in exercise of the power or powers thereinbefore contained should be entitled to any unappointed part of the said £13,000 fund without bringing the appointed share or shares into hotchpot. And as to the £5,000 assured by the policy (hereinafter called the £5,000 fund), upon trust to pay the income to the wife for life, and subject thereto the corpus to go to such children of the marriage as the wife should by deed or will appoint; and in default of appointment, upon such and the same or the like trusts, for such and the same or the like intents and purposes, and with, under, and subject to the same or the like powers, provisoes, and agreements as were thereinbefore declared concerning the £13,000 fund after the decease of the survivor of husband and wife and in default of appointment by them and the survivor of them—except that the ultimate trust of the £5,000 (i.e., in the event of there being no children of the marriage) was for the husband absolutely.

On the 15th of January, 1869, the wife died without having exercised either jointly or separately any power of appointment.

There were three children of the marriage—viz., Frederick T. Grey, the defendant Mary C. Grey, and Charles F. Grey.

The husband by two several deeds dated respectively the 15th of February, 1871, and the 10th of August, 1878, appointed out of the £13,000 fund the sums of £1,800 to Miss Grey, £637 to Charles F. Grey, and £1,000 to Frederick T. Grey, and by his will dated the 25th of July, 1895, appointed out of the same fund £9,000 to Miss Grey. These appointments, with losses on changes of investment and costs, exhausted the £13,000 fund.

On the 11th of November, 1895, the husband died.

The £5,000 being unappointed, this summons was taken out by the trustees of the settlement for the determination of the question whether in distributing the funds subject to the trusts thereof the £13,000 fund and the £5,000 fund were to be treated as one aggregate fund for the purposes of hotchpot and divided accordingly, or whether the £5,000 fund was to be treated as a separate and independent fund and divided irrespective of the appointments of the £13,000 fund.

Younger, for the trustees and one son.

Vaughan Hawkins, for another son.—The appointments must be taken into account in dividing the policy moneys on the principle of construction laid down in Hindle v. Taylor, 4 W. R. 62, 5 De G. M. & G. 577, pp. 593, 594, and followed in Trew v. Perpetual Trustee Co., 43 W. R. 636, [1895] A. C. 264. In In re Perkins, 41 W. R. 170, North, J., treated three funds as aggregated for the purpose of hotchpot, though there was only one hotchpot clause, and that came immediately after the gift of the first fund. In Montague v. Montague, 15 Beav. 565, there were two funds, and the trusts were declared by two separate deeds, which is a different case.

They also referred to Davidson's Conveyancing, 3rd ed., vol. 3, Part I., pp. 170, 171.

P. Stokes, for the daughter, was not called upon.

ROMER, J.—I do not see my way to hold that the funds settled by this settlement, the £13,000, and the policy moneys, are to be regarded or can be regarded as one for the purpose of the hotchpot. Clearly I would not hold that the trusts of the £5,000 in default of appointment are to be governed by reference to the appointments of the £13,000 if I did not also hold on the other hand that the trusts of the £13,000 in default of appointment must be governed by reference to what was done with regard to the £5,000. Now, the trusts of the £13,000 are themselves very clear, and this is a case of a deed and not a case of a will, and it appears to me it would be a very strong thing indeed for me in this settlement to say that I can alter the trusts of the £13,000 by reason of the subsequent trusts as to the £5,000. The fact is that in this settlement the two funds are really quite distinct. The sources from which they come are different. The trusts of the two funds are essentially different, and the ultimate trusts are especially of necessity different. I cannot help thinking that when reference is made, in dealing with the policy moneys, to the £13,000 trusts, as to what is to happen with the fund in default of appointment, when the children take, that the trusts of the £5,000 are only expressed in a short form by reference to the £13,000 in order to save the necessity of repeating them, and not with an intent to aggregate for the purposes of the settlement the two funds and as it were to make them one.

The cases which have been cited do not enable me and would not justify me in dealing with these two funds as one for the purpose of the hotchpot clause. Of course Hindle v. Taylor was a case of a will, and the case of a will dealing with charges, and so was the case of Trew v. Perpetual Trustee Co. The principle of those cases is, I think, well set forth, if I may say so, by Lord Hobhouse in his judgment in the latter cast, [1895] A. C. p. 268. He shows that the cases he was dealing with were cases refering to charges or matters in the nature of charges. He says this: "But in the first place their lordships cannot accept the proposed canon of construction in any sense which would give to it the general effect of multiplying charges upon the trust estate or trusts in the nature of charges. Of course such may be the intention or effect of a particular will, but in the absence of anything in the will to show such an intention the rule is that the court will not impute it to the testator." I quite agree that where in the will you have trusts declared of one property with reference to the trusts that are previously or subsequently declared of another property then in construing the will you will, so far as possible at any rate, treat the two funds as identical, at any rate for the purposes of not multiplying charges or trusts in the nature of charges; but I think it is limited to that. No case that has been cited before me refers to a case of a hotchpot clause except one, and that is the case before North, J., of In re Perkins. There North, J., came to the conclusion that what the testator had done was in effect for all purposes to make three funds, though separately referred to, held upon identically the same trusts, and North, J., held that that will was to be construed exactly as if the testator had simply repeated or referred to the three funds, and then proceeded to declare the trusts of them in the same way. The trusts in that case of the three funds were to be identical.

Now, in the case before me the trusts with reference to the £5,000, so far as material, are not upon the same trusts, but "such and the same or the like trusts and subject to the same or like powers, provisoes, and declarations." As I have already said I cannot gather from this settlement that there was any intention that for the porpose of this settlement the two funds were to be treated as one fund. So that the case relating to a will before North, J., does not apply to the case now before me. Really the case now before me is much more like the case of two funds declared by two separate deeds where the second deed declares the trusts of the second fund by reference to the first. In fact it is more like the case of Montague v. Montague. For these reasons I hold that the two funds must be treated as distinct for the purpose of provisions of the hotchpot clause.

EDWARDS v. STEEL, YOUNG, & CO. (a.)

Shipping—Masters and seamen—Leaving seamen abroad—Maintenance and passage home—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 186, sub-section 2 (d).

The plaintiff, a seaman, was living at West Hartlepool, and shipped from that port for a voyage to Madeira and other foreign ports under articles which provided that he might be discharged at a port in the United Kingdom or at a port on the continent of Europe between the Elbe and Brest at the master's option. He was discharged at Antwerp, where, in accordance with the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, the master and crew went before the British consul for the purpose of paying off, and the master left the whole matter in the hands of the consul, who provided the plaintiff with a passage to Grimsby. Section 186 (2) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, provides that where the service of any seaman belonging to any British ship terminates at any port out of her Majesty's dominions the master shall give to that seaman a certificate of discharge, and shall also, besides paying his wages, provide him with, amongst other alternatives, (c) "a passage home," (d) "or deposit with the consular officer . . . such a sum of money as is by the officer . . . deemed sufficient to defray the expenses of his maintenance and passage home."

Held, that the plaintiff had been provided with a "passage home" within the meaning of section 186. A passage home does not necessarily mean a passage to the port at which the seaman was originally shipped. Here it was not necessary to provide maintenance during passage home, as the master, by leaving the whole matter in the consul's hands, had satisfied sub-section 2 (d). Section 186 (4) (a) does not make expenses incurred by a seaman wages, but merely recoverable as wages. Section 134 therefore did not apply here.

Commercial case.

In this case the plaintiff, a seaman, sought to recover from the defendants, shipowners, passage money home, maintenance, and wages. The plaintiff resided at West Hartlepool, and on the 31st of July, 1896, he entered into a contract at that place with the defendants to serve as a seaman on board the ss. Capenor belonging to them, at the rate of £4 per month and rations, and he shipped as such seaman on board the said vessel for a voyage to Madeira and other ports.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister at-Law.

The articles provided that the sailors named in the articles agreed to serve on board the ship on a voyage from West Hartlepool, via Bristol Channel, to any port or ports, place or places, not exceeding 75 degrees north and 20 degrees south latitude, trading as might be required within such limits for any period not exceeding one year, and back to a final port of discharge in the United Kingdom, or on the continent of Europe between the Elbe and Brest, inclusive, at master's option. The Capenor sailed to Madeira and Pensacola, and the 26th of November, 1896, she arrived at Antwerp, and on the following day the plaintiff was discharged and was paid his wages up to such date before her Majesty's consul at that port.

The master had an interview with the British consul with regard to the discharge of the crew, and, according to the master's account of the interview, it was arranged that the crew should be sent by steamer to Grimsby, and that he (the master) should give to the consul a guarantee for the expenses of sending the crew home.

The plaintiff alleged that before he received his money or signed anything he requested to be sent back to West Hartlepool, and that he also asked for maintenance from Antwerp to that place. This, however the defendants denied.

The master provided the plaintiff with an order for a voyage, but without saying anything as to rations, to the port of Grimsby, and the articles were endorsed by the consul as follows: "I hereby certify that . . . have become discharged at this port by mutual consent with my sanction, and that the master has provided passages to England for those members of the crew who do not rejoin the ship."

On the 28th of November the plaintiff sailed on board the ss. Ashton, and arrived at Grimsby on the 29th and at West Hartlepool on the 30th. During his voyage from Antwerp the plaintiff had to pay for his own maintenance. The plaintiff thereupon brought this action to recover maintenance and lodgings at Antwerp from the time of his discharge to his departure for Grimsby, also maintenance on the voyage from Antwerp to Grimsby and train fare from that town to West Hartlepool. His claim was based upon the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, the material provisions of which are as follows: Section 134 (c): "In the event of the seaman's wages or any part thereof not being paid or settled as in this section mentioned, then, unless the delay is due to the act or default of the seaman or to any reasonable dispute as to liability or to any other cause, not being the wrongful act or default of the owner or master, the seaman's wages shall continue to run and be payable until the time of the final settlement thereof." 186 (2): "The master shall also, besides paying the wages to which the seaman or apprentice is entitled, either —(a) provide him with adequate employment on board some other British ship bound to the port in her Majesty's dominions at which he was originally shipped, or to a port in the United Kingdom agreed to by the seaman; or (b) furnish the means of sending him back to some such port; or (c) provide him with a passage home; or (d) deposit with the consular officer or merchants as aforesaid such a sum of money as is by the officer or merchants deemed sufficient to defray the expenses of his maintenance and passage home."

Robson, Q.C. (J. D. A. Johnson with him), for the plaintiff.—The words "provide him with a passage home" in section 186, sub-section 2 (c) means providing him with sufficient means to get to the actual place where he was engaged from and originally shipped. "Home" does not mean any port in the United Kingdom. It is not sufficient to put a seaman on board and make no provision for his maintenance. The master must provide maintenance for him whilst on the voyage home. The expenses the plaintiff was put to are recoverable as wages under section 186, sub-section 4 a. He had therefore not received his full wages on his discharge, and these continue to run under section 134 until such time as he does receive them.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. (Lewis Noad with him), for the defendants.—"Home" means any port in the United Kingdom. The master here did all that was necessary under section 186, sub-section 2. He placed the matter in the hands of the consul, who made what order he thought was right and proper under the circumstances, and the plaintiff and the other seamen accepted the vouchers for the passage to Grimsby and made no objection. As regards the claim for wages under section 134, that cannot be maintained. That section only applies to wages proper of seamen and not to expenses incurred by seamen after they have been paid their regular wages and discharged the ship.

COLLINS, J.—This is an application by a seaman to be reimbursed the expense of maintenance before he started from Antwerp on his journey to England, and for his maintenance during the passage home, and also for the railway fare between Grimsby, the port at which he arrived from Antwerp in England, and the port of West Hartlepool, from which he was originally shipped. He also claims a sum per diem from the date of his return to England up to the settlement on the ground that under the particular provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act the unpaid sum which he claims for maintenance and railway fare are wages, and as such come under the provisions of that section, and that he is entitled to be paid so much per day until he is actually paid.

Now, the seaman in question was shipped at West Hartlepool under articles which provided that he was shipped "on a voyage from West Hartlepool via British Channel to any port or ports, place or places, not exceeding 75 degrees north and 20 degrees south latitude, trading as may be required within such limits for any period not exceeding one year and back to a final port of discharge in the United Kingdom or on the Continent of Europe between the Elbe and Brest, inclusive, at master's option." Therefore the ship was entitled to discharge itself within the limits named or in the United Kingdom. If the plaintiff had been ultimately conveyed to the port at which he ultimately arrived and if he had been conveyed on the voyage and discharged there—viz., at Grimsby he would have had nothing to complain of because Grimsby, being a port in the United Kingdom, was one of the ports at which he agreed the voyage might terminate and that he should be discharged.

What happened was this. The ship was discharged at Antwerp. The work that was required on the ship was completed on the night of Thursday, the 26th inst. The seamen were allowed to remain on board until Friday, the account for their wages in the meantime having been given them, and an appointment made to pay them off the next day at the consul's office. Accordingly, on the next day the master attended before the consul for the purpose of paying off the crew, and his evidence is that before paying off the crew, there was a conversation between him and the consul in which the consul said that he would pay the crew off on the day named if the master would pay for the passage home or give a guarantee.

The master gave a guarantee, that is to say, he undertook that whatever sum of money the con required would be paid, and according to his evidence from and after that time he left the matter wholly in the hands of the consul.

The consul, according to the master's evidence, arranged with the men not only to pay off their wages, but to provide for their arrival at home, and accordingly, in the end he gave to all of them a passage to Grimsby. The consul accordingly made out vouchers that entitled all the crew to be taken to Grimsby, and he sent in a bill for the whole account which was at once paid by the master.

The vessel for Grimsby did not start till the next day, which involved one day's maintenance of the plaintiff prior to getting on board the ship. We are told that the passage provided did not embrace food on that passage, and, further, when the ship arrived at Grimsby the plaintiff had to pay his railway fare from Grimsby to Hartlepool.

Now, the question is whether the captain or the owners have done everything that the section of the Merchant Shipping Act, which applies to the case, enacts they must do. That section is the 186th. Clause (b) is the first one that applies to the case. "Where the service of any seaman or apprentice belonging to any British ship terminates at any port of her Majesty's dominions"—that is not the case here, because it was at Antwerp—"the master shall give to that seaman or apprentice a certificate of discharge in a form approved by the Board of Trade." That has nothing to do with this. Now comes sub-section 2, "The master shall also, besides paying the wages to which the seaman or apprentice is entitled, either (a) provide him with adequate employment on board some other British ship bound to the port in her Majesty's dominions at which he was originally shipped, or to a port in the United Kingdom agreed to by the seaman; or (b) furnish the means of sending him back to some such port; or (c) provide him with a passage home; or (d) deposit with the consular officer or merchants as aforesaid such a sum of money as is by the officer or merchants deemed sufficient to defray the expenses of his maintenance and passage home." Now, the plaintiff says that none of those provisions have been complied with—that all that was done was to give him a passage, or to give authority to the shipowner to carry him from Antwerp to Grimsby, and that no provision was made for his maintenance either before or during the voyage, nor for his carriage to his ultimate destination. Mr. Walton contends that the obligations are satisfied in taking each of the three out of the four sub-divisions. He says that under three of them he has an answer. He says first of all, in reference to (a) that the alternative of providing him with adequate employment on board some other British ship bound to the port in her Majesty's dominions at which he was originally shipped became impossible, because there was no ship on which they could find him employment, "or to any port in the United Kingdom agreed to by the seaman." That was not possible, because there was not any ship available for the purpose. The alternative there then is an alternative between a ship going to the port from which the seaman was originally shipped and a ship going to a port in the United Kingdom agreed to by the seaman. Then we come to clause (b) which is an alternative, "or furnish the means of sending him back to some such port." He could not be sent back as a person employed, therefore he has to be sent back by the master "furnishing the means of sending him back to some such port." That, it is intended, is either the port from which he was originally shipped, or a port in the United Kingdom agreed to by the seaman; that is to say "some such port" covers the ports named in the preceding sub-division. Mr. Walton says, if that be the construction, he has complied with it, because Grimsby is a port in the United Kingdom, and, in fact, it was a port agreed to by the seaman, inasmuch as by the articles, if you look at the substance of the matter, the man is not entitled to be put in a better position than he would have been if the voyage which he originally contracted to perform had been performed. One of the alternative methods he might have performed would have resulted in his being landed at Grimsby, and if the master puts him in the same position as if he were discharged at Grimsby, or finds means for his getting to Grimsby, that is within the meaning of the section which says "furnish him with the means of going back to such port"—that is, to an agreed port. That argument so far is addressed only to the place to which he is entitled to be sent. Mr. Walton also contends that he has complied with sub-section c and with sub-section d. By sub-section c the owner is to provide him with a passage, and Mr. Walton says on the true construction of this section a passage home embraces a passage to a port in the United Kingdom, and a fortiori to a port agreed upon in the United Kingdom, but whether agreed upon or not he says the passage home would be, on the true construction of this section, a passage to Grimsby, which, of course, is a port in the United Kingdom, apart from the fact that it is a port agreed to by the seaman. Then, further, he relies on sub-section d. He says that in effect the master here did deposit or give what was equivalent to a deposit with the consul's officer or the merchant such a sum of money as was by the consul deemed to be sufficent to pay the expenses of maintenance and passage. That section throws on the consul the burthen of assessing the sum which in his judgment is necessary to fulfil both those provisions, namely, maintenance and passage home, and by giving the consul a free hand in the matter he was absolutely relieved from any further responsibility.

It is contended by the plaintiff that in point of fact there was no deposit, and there was no deposit; inasmuch as one has to look at the object of these provisions, the real point appears to be, Was the consul furnished with the means of doing that which he had to do? If he was perfectly satisfied with the solvency of the person he was dealing with, I cannot suppose that the section would be deemed not to be applicable because he did not insist on payment of the deposit. I think if he waived the deposit he took upon himself the responsibility of dealing with the matter under that section, as the captain clearly invited him to do.

Now, in the view that I take of this case, I do not think it really necessary for me to decide all the points that have been raised in the course of the discussion, but as they have been a great deal argued I propose to give an opinion upon some of them.

I think myself that the case falls within sub-section d. I think that in effect the undertaking made by the captain at the instance of the consul to do all that the consul required in the way of repaying the consul all that he demanded for sending the crew home is a compliance with the provisions of sub-section d, and I think the evidence of the master, which I accept in preference to the evidence of the two sailors, satisfies me that the real negotiations as to where the crew should go and what should be done were conducted, not by the master himself, but by the consul with the seamen. If that be so, it is quite clear that the consul gave the men all he conceived necessary to defray the expenses of maintenance and the passage home, and whatever amount he demanded the captain was prepared to pay, and did pay. Therefore it appears to me that the case does fall under sub-section d, and that the master is protected by what the consul did.

But even if I should be wrong on that point, and if I should hold that there must be a prepayment in order to bring the case within that section, nevertheless I have come to the conclusion that the passage back to Grimsby was, in the circumstances of the case, a passage home.

Now, the view put forward by the plaintiffs must go thus far, or it does not go far enough—viz., that the "passage home" in the two sub-sections in which it is used must mean a passage to the port to which he was originally shipped. If they cannot carry it that far, they cannot carry it far enough. Now, I do not think that it is meant to bear that interpretation if you read the sub-sections through, although I quite admit that it is absolutely impossible to put an interpretation which would give equal effect to the words in all the sub-sections. But I think I am justified in saying that "passage home" does not, according to the section, necessarily mean a passage to the port at which the seaman was originally shipped.

Then comes sub-section b, which deals with the case of the master not finding employment for him, then he must furnish the means of sending him back to some such port. That leaves us where we were. It is either of two things. The master must either find employment for him to the port where he was shipped or to an agreed port in the United Kingdom, and if the master does not do that he must furnish him with the means of sending him back to one of those places or provide him with a passage home. If home meant the port where he was originally shipped, I must suppose the Legislature would have said so. I cannot conceive any reason if that was the limited meaning they intended to put on the word, why they should not have said so. Then in sub-section d the words are "passage home," and not "passage to port where originally shipped."

Now, some light is also thrown on the meaning of "passage home" by section 191, which deals with a different set of circumstances, but which also shows what the Legislature had in its mind when dealing with "passage home," because to this extent at all events it seems clear that it does not mean "passage to the port where the seaman was shipped." This section deals with the case of shipwrecked seaman and so on, and then in clause (b) the section says: "Seamen and apprentices to the sea-service being subjects of her Majesty who have been engaged by any person acting either as principal or agent to serve in a ship belonging to the Government or to a subject or citizen of a foreign country, and are in distress in any place abroad." Then sub-section 2 says: "For the purpose of providing a distressed seaman with a passage home the authority shall put him on board a British ship bound either to the United Kingdom or to the British possession to which the seaman belongs (as the case requires) which is in want of men to make up its complement." That means that he is to work his passage to the destination. That is all for the purpose of providing a seaman with a passage home, and a passage home is provided by giving him the means of getting to the United Kingdom or to the British possession—not to a particular port in the United Kingdom or to a particular port in the British possession to which the seaman belongs—in a British ship that is in want of men to make up its complement. Then comes the other alternative—"or if there is no such ship then the authority shall provide the seaman with a passage home as soon as possible in any ship British or foreign bound as aforesaid." It is not bound to any particular port, but "booked to either the United Kingdom or to the British possession to which the seaman belongs."

Therefore, I cannot find in this Act of Parliament that by the word "home" the Legislature means the port from which the seaman was originally shipped. Then short of that what does it mean? I do not think I am called upon to give a general definition on the matter; it is enough for me to say that clearly in this case, Grimsby being one of the ports in the United Kingdom within the ambit of the original contract is a port to which they were entitled to send him. I think, apart from the Consul's discretion, which I have dealt with under sub-section d, the passage to Grimsby was a "passage home."

With respect to the question of maintenance on the way and before, I think that that must stand on sub-section d, because I think, apart from sub-section d, the passage home would embrace such a reasonable sum as was necessary to keep the man alive on the passage. I don't think it would be satisfied by delivering him as a dead carcase at the port of origin; and furthermore, I think also that the owners would be obliged to keep him alive until he started on the passage, and therefore it would embrace the maintenance until he was put on board before his passage home. So that if it were not for sub-section d I should be obliged to hold here that there was a small sum to be paid for the maintenance until he started for Grimsby, and also for the maintenance during the passage to Grimsby. But holding as I do that the case come under d, I think the consul has fixed the sum which measures the obligation of defendants. Of course that would be an answer in itself.

As to the other point made by Mr. Robson as to wages, I will deal with that also. It seems to me the provision which makes these expenses recoverable as wages does not in the slightest degree constitute them wages or make them anything more than they are; therefore it does not give the right which it conferred with regard to wages properly so called by the 134th section—viz., of their running on until they are actually settled. Section 186, sub-section (4) (a), merely provides that these particular expenses are to be recovered in the same way as wages. There are summary procedures and other legal incidents attached to them, but they are not constituted wages, and they cannot be considered as going on de die in diem in a case where it is clear they are not wages, and where such wages as were due were satisfied.

My judgment, therefore, must be for the defendants.

Ex parte HARRIET GALLARD v. STRETTON'S EXECUTORS. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Purchase by a partner of a member of the committee of inspection of part of the bankrupt's estate—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), r. 316.

A sale by the trustee in bankruptcy of part of the estate to a partner of one of the members of the committee of inspection cannot be set aside as being either directly or indirectly a sale to a member of the committee of inspection within rule 316; nor can it be set aside as being contrary to the earlier practice in bankruptcy law.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

down in Ex parte Moore, 30 W. R. 123, which did not allow a trustee to sell any part of the estate to his own partner.

Motion by Miss Harriet Gallard, a creditor in the bankruptcy, for a declaration that the sale by the trustee, to J. H. Stretton of certain property of the bankrupt for £225 was contrary to the provisions of rule 316. "Neither the trustee nor any member of the committee of inspection of an estate shall, while acting as trustee or member of such committee, except by leave of the court, either directly or indirectly, by himself or any partner, clerk, agent, or servant, become purchaser of any part of the estate. Any such purchase made contrary to the provisions of this rule may be set aside by the court on the application of the Board of Trade or of any creditor."

The bankruptcy in this case took place in 1887.

The bankrupt had been engaged in building and land speculations at Brighton in conjunction with Stretton, Williams, and Vaughan.

Vaughan became bankrupt in 1885, when Stretton acquired his interest in the speculations.

As soon as Gallard became bankrupt one Harris communicated with Stretton, and with the trustee in Vaughan's bankruptcy, and it was arranged that Harris should be trustee in Gallard's bankruptcy, that Mr. Hunt, of the firm of Ashurst, Morris, & Crisp, a son of Williams, and Mr. Hilliard, a partner of Stretton, should form the committee of inspection, and that Ashurst, Morris, & Co., should act as solicitors in the bankruptcy. Stretton, being a creditor for £5,000, had sufficient voting power to obtain the carrying out of this arrangement.

During the course of the bankruptcy Miss Gallard made a bid of £200 for a certain property forming part of the bankrupt's estates; whereupon Stretton offered £225 for a portion of the same property. Hilliard, Stretton's partner, without informing Miss Gallard of the advance on her bid, induced his colleagues on the committee of inspection to accept Stretton's offer, and the property was sold to him by the trustee.

Miss Gallard now moved against Stretton's executors to have the sale set aside as contrary to rule 316.

The case was argued on the 1st, 2nd, and 15th of March, and during the course of the argument counsel for the applicant were allowed to amend their notice of motion and to allege that the sale was contrary to the practice existing before the date of rule 316, and further, that on the facts of the case it was fraudulent.

The following considered judgment was delivered on the 30th of March.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—In my judgment this sale by the trustee was not contrary to the provisions of rule 316 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886. I am of opinion upon the evidence before me that Hilliard, the partner of Stretton, who was the purchaser, had no interest directly or indirectly in the purchase of this property. It seems to me to have been a purchase by Stretton on his own account, and I do not think that the partnership firm had, as between themselves and Stretton, any interest in the purchase. It was a purchase by Stretton on his own account, and not for the benefit of the firm.

In my judgment such a purchase does not fall within the words of rule 316, which, I think, only covers cases where a purchase is made directly or indirectly by a trustee or member of the committee of inspection.

It has been urged, however, that so to construe the rule would be inconsistent with an established rule in bankruptcy that there cannot be a sale to a partner of the trustee. This seems to be the rule laid down in Ex parte Moore, 30 W. R. 123. But I do not think that this entitles me to amplify a rule, the words of which are clear. It is said that the words "by his partner, servant, clerk, or agent" are unnecessary if they are only instances of indirect purchase, and that the meaning is that a purchase by a partner, clerk, agent, or servant, or a person standing in such a relation to a trustee or member of a committee of inspection should be deemed to be an indirect purchase by such trustee or member of a committee even though there is no proof that the purchase was in any way for his benefit. I cannot come to this conclusion, even though the rule so construed might be, as I think it would be, a salutary rule and in accordance with previous bankruptcy practice. [His lordship then went on to find on the facts that the sale had been fraudulent as against Miss Gallard, and granted her an inquiry as to the damage she had sustained thereby.]

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, A. L. Smith, and Rigby, L.JJ.) — Feb. 26; March 2, 4, 5, 19.

In re WRAGG (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Contract with vendors—Payment in fully paid-up shares—Property sold of less than nominal value of shares—Stamp duty—Apportionment of value of items of property sold—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 25.

Where a limited company purchased property, and paid the agreed price in fully paid-up shares, the contract of sale being duly registered before the issue of the shares pursuant to section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, the vendors cannot be made liable as contributories in the winding up of the company, merely on the ground that the value of the property sold was less than the full nominal value of these shares.

The above-named company, which was formed for the purpose of taking over the business of coach proprietors and livery stable keepers belonging to E. J. Wragg and J. B. Martin, was registered under the Companies Act on the 9th of January, 1894, with a capital of £20,000 divided into 2,000 shares of £10 each. By a contract dated the 10th of January, 1894, and duly registered pursuant to section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, it was agreed that Wragg and Martin should sell to the company the goodwill of the business, premises, plant, &c., for £46,300, which was to be paid as to £7,000 in cash, as to £3,000 in first debentures, as to £6,300 in second debentures, as to £10,000 by the transfer to the company of two mortgages for that amount on the property conveyed, and as to the balance of £20,000 in fully paid-up shares in the company.

By clause 3 of the contract the said sum of £46,300 was allocated thus: to goodwill, £6,000; to freeholds (including mortgages for £10,000), £12,000; to leaseholds, £500; to stock-in-trade, £27,300; to contract rights, £250; to other property, £250.

The said sum of £46,300 was duly paid to the vendors in the manner provided by the contract.

Subsequently the company was ordered to be wound up.

One of the books of the company contained an account headed "Purchase of Business," in which the value of the stock at the time of the company's formation was set down at only £15,375. On the other hand, this account showed an item which did not appear in the contract—viz., balance to goodwill account, £11,647.

This was a summons by the official receiver and liquidator of the company, asking that it might be declared that the nominal amount of the shares standing in the names of Martin and Wragg was unpaid, and that Martin and Wragg were liable to pay the nominal amounts thereof, and that they might be ordered to pay within four days of the service of the order.

The summons having been dismissed by Vaughan Williams, J., the liquidator appealed.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., Buckley, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the appellant.—Though this precise question may not have arisen before, the principles on which it is to be decided are well established. The value of the stock-in-trade, which is put in the agreement at £27,300, appears from the company's books to have been only £15,375. The item "balance to goodwill account" there introduced really represents nothing, and was merely put in to bring up the total to £46,300. There is thus a deficiency in the value of the property sold to the company of about £11,000, and the shares should be treated as not paid up by that amount. The Companies Act, 1862, does not alter the liability of a shareholder to pay for his shares, but only limits it: Oakes v. Turquand, 15 W. R. 1,201, L. R. 2 H. L. 325. A company cannot issue shares at a discount, even though there is a contract registered under the Act of 1867: In re Almada and Tirito Co., Allen's case, 36 W. R. 593, 38 Ch. D. 415; Ooregum Gold Mining Co. v. Roper, 41 W. R. 90, [1892] A. C. 125. A mere improvident bargain entered into by a company would not necessarily be invalid; but a company cannot knowingly issue shares as fully paid-up in exchange for property of less than their full value: In re Eddystone Marine Insurance Co., 41 W. R. 642, [1893] 3 Ch. 9; Elkington's case, 15 W. R. 665, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 511. The appellant does not impeach the contract of sale.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Ward Colridge, for the respondent Martin.—There is no ground for saying that the alleged deficiency of £11,000 should be set against the shares rather than against the cash and debentures. The company agreed to accept property capable of valuation as of a certain value, and to pay for it in part by the issue of these fully paid-up shares, and the agreement is not impeached. The shares cannot therefore be treated as not fully paid up, and the respondent made liable as a contributory: In re Heyford Co., Pell's case, 18 W. R. 31, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 11; In re Heyford Ironworks Co., Forbes & Judd's case, 18 W. R. 302, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 270; In re Baglan Hall Colliery Co., 18 W. R. 499, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 346. This is not affected by the later decisions in In re Almada and Tirito Co. and Ooregum Gold Mining Co. v. Roper. [LINDLEY, L.J., referred to Chapman's case, 43 W. R. 553, [1895] 1 Ch. 771, and In re Empire Assurance Co., Leeke's case, 19 W. R. 300, L. R. 11 Eq. 100.] It is for the appellant to show that the transaction is illegal: Hire Purchase Furnishing Co. v. Richens, 36 W. R. 365, 20 Q. B. D. 387. This they have not done, and it must therefore be presumed to be legal.

Eve, Q.C., and Carrington, for the respondent Wragg.—There is no reason why the vendors should not make a profit on their dealing with the company. The apportionment in clause 3 of the contract was made solely with a view to reducing the amount of duty payable under section 59 of the Stamp Act, 1891, duty being payable thereunder in respect of goodwill, but not in respect of stock-in-trade.

Finlay, S.G., in reply.—The suggestion last made is tantamount to saying that the parties to the contract have committed a fraud upon the revenue. The value of the goodwill was truly stated in the contract to be £6,000, but the evidence shows that the value of the stock-in-trade was there overstated by £11,000. As regards the law the pith of the whole matter is contained in Ooregum Gold Mining Co. v. Roper, where it is laid down that the transaction will not be impeachable if the company honestly regarded the consideration given as representing the nominal value of the shares in cash. In face of the evidence it cannot be said that they did so here. The cases cited on the other side do not touch the point.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The liquidator contends that the shares issued to Martin and Wragg were improperly issued as fully paid up, and cannot be properly so treated. No attempt has been made to impeach or set aside the agreement. Nor, having regard to the decision of the House of the Lords in Salomon v. Salomon & Co., ante, p. 193, [1897] A. C. 22, is it possible to hold that agreement invalid, on the materials before us. The company, although a small one, promoted by the vendors and managed by them, must be treated as competent to buy the property which it was formed to acquire, and to take it at the price named by the vendors. The only question is whether the shares issued as fully paid up in part payment of the price can be treated as fully paid up. Before examining the law upon this point I will state the grounds on which the appellant contends that they cannot. It appears from the books of the company that the stock-in-trade, which by clause 3 of the agreement is taken to be worth £27,300, was entered as of the value of £15,375 only, and it is contended that the paid-up shares given to the vendors must be attributed in part at least to this difference of £11,000 odd. In other words, it is contended that the company ought to be treated as having issued shares to the nominal amount of £20,000 (the rest of the £27,300 being cash or debentures) in payment of goods of much less value—viz., of the value of £15,000 odd only—as both vendors and buyers well knew. I am quite unable to take this view of the contract. I will assume that the stock-in-trade was worth only £15,000—i.e., that it would not have fetched more in the market. There was no agreement to buy the stock-in-trade at that price, and to pay for it in shares of a larger nominal amount. The third clause in the agreement was merely inserted for stamp purposes. It was absolutely useless and meaningless for any other purpose. No evidence is required to prove it. No lawyer accustomed to the preparation of deeds can fail to see why it was inserted or its legal effect. Stamp duty had to be paid on so much of the £46,300 as was liable to duty, and duty was payable in respect of so much of this sum as was attributable to the goodwill, and in respect of the freeholds and leaseholds and of nothing else. These were valued at the respective sums mentioned in clause 3; £27,300 remained and the stock-in-trade remained, and the £27,300 was attributed to that. I do not say that this was right, but whether right or wrong the third clause does not in any way alter the real agreement between the vendors and the company. The real agreement was that the vendors should sell and that the company should buy the various properties mentioned in the schedule to the agreement for one sum of £46,300, which apparently was £11,000 more than could have been obtained from any other purchaser. But the parties did not appropriate any part of the purchase-money to any definite part of the property purchased nor is the court at liberty to do so. It would be wholly wrong to treat the agreement as one to pay £27,300 for stock-in-trade, valued as between the vendors and the company at £15,375, and to attribute the whole of the share capital to the purchase of that particular item. To do this is to fasten on the parties a contract which they never made and one, moreover, which would entirely defeat their intentions if the appellant is right in his contention.
